

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT.

IN THE
THIRD SESSION OF THE THIRTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND.

EIGHTEENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V.

FIFTH SERIES—VOLUME 208.

SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1927.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 27th June, 1927.

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

London County Council (General Powers)
Bill,

Southern Railway Bill,

Lords Amendments considered, and agreed to.

Aberdeen Urban District Council Bill
[Lords],

As amended, considered; to be read the Third time.

Fleetwood Urban District Council Bill
[Lords],

Read a Second time, and committed.

West Cheshire Water Board Bill [Lords],

To be read a Second time upon Wednesday.

Wallasey Corporation Bill [Lords] (by Order),

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

INDIA.

CURRENCY.

2. Sir FREDRIC WISE asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether in spite of the amount of deflation in the Indian currency of approximately £10,000,000 from 31st March to 15th June 1927, he can state the estimated amount it will still be necessary to deflate in the next three months so that the market rate of exchange will be nearer the official rate?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Earl Winterton): No, Sir. The action of the currency authority in regard to expansion or contraction of the currency depends in India, as elsewhere, on developments that cannot be predicted. It cannot, therefore, be assumed that there will necessarily be any further contraction of currency in India during the next three months.

Sir F. WISE: Does my Noble Friend realise that the market rate has not reached the official rate up to the present time?

Earl WINTERTON: Yes, Sir.

SUGAR INDUSTRY (RESEARCH).

3. Mr. KELLY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in 1925-26 India imported 738,224 tons of refined sugar as against 670,965 tons in the preceding year; and whether it is proposed to set up a sugar research institute with a view to expanding the production and refining of sugar in India in order to make India self-supporting in this direction?

[Mr. Kelly.]

Earl WINTERTON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. A scheme for the establishment of a sugar research institute was laid before the Government of India some years ago. The Government of India intimated last year that they did not know when they would be in a position to give effect to the scheme, which involved a heavy outlay.

Mr. KELLY: Is the Department here in touch with India, to see whether this matter is being proceeded with, even in face of the heavy outlay?

Earl WINTERTON: That is really a matter for the Government of India. The hon. Gentleman is probably not aware that a great deal is being done now to increase the production of sugar in India, and also to improve the quality of the sugar grown.

BUNGALOWS, MANDAPAM HEALTH RESORT (INDIANS).

4. Mr. KELLY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that Mr. V. S. Subramaniya Iyer was at the Mandapam health resort refused permission by the station master to occupy part of one of the two bungalows at that place, in spite of the fact that advertisements were displayed asking the public to travel to that health centre at cheap return rates; that Mr. Iyer was informed that the bungalows were meant only for Europeans and Americans and were not available for Indians; and whether any steps are being taken, or are contemplated, to deal with this racial discrimination?

Earl WINTERTON: I have no information as to the occurrence of any such incident.

Mr. KELLY: Will the Noble Lord make some inquiry regarding this discrimination?

Earl WINTERTON: No, Sir; it is not a matter for the Secretary of State, but is purely a matter, if it occurs, for the local authorities.

DETENUS, BENGAL.

5. Mr. THURTELL asked the Under-Secretary of State for India if his Department is in possession of the name of the terrorist organisation with which the prisoners detained under the Bengal Criminal Ordinance Act and Regulation 111 of 1918 are said to have been connected?

Earl WINTERTON: Yes, Sir.

6. Mr. THURTELL asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Bengal Gaols Inquiry Committee recommended that the political prisoners should be removed from gaols altogether; and whether it is proposed that separate gaols should be constructed for them, or what action it is proposed to take in the matter?

Earl WINTERTON: The Committee recommended, from the point of view of their inquiry, that detenus should be removed from gaols altogether, though they specified other alternative arrangements. The interval since their Report was made has been too short to enable me to say what action is proposed to be taken.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: Is my Noble Friend aware that in the same Report it is stated that these political prisoners are allowed to play badminton and tennis, and enjoy amenities that are not granted to other prisoners, and has not such special treatment a very demoralising effect on the other prisoners?

Earl WINTERTON: I am aware that the Committee reported that the conditions under which these detenus are kept in ordinary gaols are demoralising to the other prisoners, and for that reason they recommended that they should be removed elsewhere.

PORT TRUST SERVICE.

7. Mr. THURTELL asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether any steps have been taken, or are in contemplation, to carry out the resolution moved in the Council of State in 1922 by Sir P. C. Sethna, and accepted by the Government of India, regarding the Indianisation of the higher grades of the Port Trust Service?

Earl WINTERTON: My Noble Friend has no information on the subject.

ARMY CLOTHING FACTORY, MADRAS.

8. Mr. W. BAKER asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether it is the intention of the Government of India to abolish the Army clothing department at Madras and to hand the work over to private contractors; and whether he will ascertain the reason for the wholesale dismissals from that department at the beginning of June?

Earl WINTERTON: The Administration Report of the Ordnance and Clothing Factories for 1924-1925 contained a recommendation that the clothing factory at Madras should be closed. I am not aware that wholesale dismissals have taken place, but if the hon. Member wishes I will make inquiry.

POSTAL SERVICES.

9. Mr. W. BAKER asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can give particulars of the representations made to the Government of India by the All-India Postal Union, Madras Circle; whether he will state the present starting pay of postmen, overseers, sorters, head postmen, and departmental branch postmasters, and the leave and pension rules applicable to the men in the lower grades of the postal services; and whether the Government of India intend to introduce a uniform scale of pay for postmen for the whole of India and Burma, with suitable local allowances?

Earl WINTERTON: No, Sir. The conditions of service of these grades are within the discretion of the Government of India, and my Noble Friend is not disposed to call for any report on the matter from them.

INDIA HOUSE, LONDON.

13. Colonel DAY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India when it is anticipated that the new India House in London will be completed?

Earl WINTERTON: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on the 9th May to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Kelly).

Colonel DAY: Has work been started on this building?

Earl WINTERTON: The hon. Member asks in his question when the work will be finished. That question I answered on the 9th May.

Colonel DAY: Can the Noble Lord say whether work has been started?

Earl WINTERTON: Perhaps the hon. Member will put down another question as to that.

MERCANTILE MARINE.

14. Mr. WALLHEAD asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware of the desire in India for the creation of an Indian Mercantile Marine; whether the Government of India and the Secretary of State have considered the Report of the Mercantile Marine Committee; and whether it is proposed to take any action on that Report?

Earl WINTERTON: The answer to the first two parts of the question is in the affirmative. It has been decided to establish a training ship at Karachi. The training ship is expected to be in working order in September next.

FOREST DEPARTMENT.

15. Mr. WALLHEAD asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the net profits from the working of forest departments in India in 1924-25 was Rs.21,400,000, showing a yield from forests of about 2 annas per acre; that about one-fifth of British India, approximating to 250,000 square miles, is covered by forests, but of this only about 100,000 square miles are under intensive management; that it has been calculated that if by proper development the yield was increased, as it can be, to Rs.3 per acre the total income would amount to about Rs.400,000,000 per annum; and, in view of the fact that, with the exception of Bombay and Burma, forests are a reserved subject, any steps are being taken, or are proposed to be taken, to develop this source of income for India?

Earl WINTERTON: The answer to the first two parts of the question is in the affirmative. The calculation in the third part of the question has been brought to my notice before. The steps that have been and are being taken to develop this source of revenue for India are described on pages 261 to 265 of the Report on the Moral and Material Progress of India during 1925-26. As the hon. Member is no doubt aware the progress in forest development is necessarily slow and the authorities who look forward to a revenue of Rs.400,000,000 no doubt recognise that many years' work will be required before this result can be attained. The revenue has nearly doubled since 1913-14.

[Earl Winterton.]

KHYBER PASS (TRIBAL UNREST).

1. Sir ROBERT THOMAS asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he has any statement to make regarding the unrest in the Khyber Pass district?

Earl WINTERTON: The only tribal unrest in the neighbourhood of the Khyber Pass calling for any special notice recently has been in the Mohmand country, where early in June a force of hostile Mohmands attacked clans friendly to Government and threatened an incursion into British India. The Government of India took defensive measures in the shape of bombing operations, which were entirely successful in dispersing the hostile tribesmen, and it was reported a day or two later that the situation was now practically normal. No importance other than local is attached to the disturbances.

CROWN COLONIES (COMMERCIAL AVIATION).

16. Mr. HAYDAY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies what concession has been granted to private companies to operate commercial aircraft in the Crown Colonies?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Ormsby-Gore): No private company has at present any concession for operating commercial aircraft in any non-self-governing Colony.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

EMPIRE MARKETING BOARD (GRANTS).

19. Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies what sum has been allotted from the £1,000,000 grant to the Empire Marketing Board to the marketing of British barley?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: No grant has been specifically made in regard to the marketing of British barley, but I am informed that the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries is conducting an investigation into the marketing of cereals, as part of the work now being carried out with the aid of the grant of £40,000 a year which has been made to the Ministry by the Empire Marketing Board.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the British grower of barley is the hardest hit of almost any arable producer, and will he do what he can to assist him to find fresh markets, if possible?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I think that if my hon. and gallant Friend will put a question of that kind to the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries it will be easier. The Marketing Board only make grants when the matter is put up to them through the appropriate Department. Any case for the improvement of the marketing of a particular home product would come to us through the Ministry of Agriculture.

Captain CROOKSHANK: Is it the policy of the Board to make specific grants for specific commodities, or is it merely general?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: In the main, it is general.

20. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in connection with the grant of £1,000,000 to the Empire Marketing Board, what sum has been allocated to protect the interests of home producers in England and the direction in which this sum is being spent; and how much money has been allocated for the assistance or fostering of British deep-sea fishing?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: A grant of £40,000 per annum has been made available from the Empire Marketing Fund for the improvement and development of the marketing of home agricultural products in England and Wales. This grant is being administered on behalf of the Board by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries. The Ministry's programme of work includes the investigation of marketing conditions, the publication of reports on marketing, and the practical demonstration of improved methods of packing, grading, etc. Demonstrations on these lines are being given in the present summer at a number of agricultural shows in various parts of the country. The Ministry has also made grants for such purposes as the standardisation of cheese and the development of grading and packing stations for fruit and vegetables. With regard to the last part of the question, the Board has undertaken to contribute a sum not exceeding £1,500 during the current year towards the cost of experiments carried out by the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research into the long-distance transport of fish. The Imperial Economic Committee is at present investigating fishery problems, and the Board awaits the issue of its Report and recommendations before making any further grants.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that £1,500 is a suitable amount, out of £1,000,000, for one of our great industries, namely, deep-sea fishing?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: Oh no, I do not wish to be taken as saying that at all. As the hon. and gallant Member is aware, the Board, before doing anything in this matter, must be advised by the Imperial Economic Committee. The Imperial Economic Committee has in hand an ad hoc investigation into Empire fish as a whole—Canadian fish, British fish, and all the rest; and when we get their Report as to what assistance can best be given, and all the data, we shall be in a position to consider what grant may be desirable.

Sir ALEXANDER SPROT: Will any part of this grant be spent in Scotland?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research covers the whole of Great Britain. This is a question more particularly in regard to the long-distance transport of fish, which is a very difficult problem, and, if it is solved in the case of England, it will be solved in the case of Scotland.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to see that the same amount of money is spent in advertising British products as in advertising Colonial products, as the money is found by the British taxpayer?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: From the very first the Empire Marketing Board has made it clear that Great Britain is within the Empire.

Mr. R. MORRISON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a definition of what is Empire fish, as distinct from other fish?

23. Captain AUSTIN HUDSON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the advertisement hoardings of the Empire Marketing Board have been placed in parks, commons and open spaces in London; that these boards spoil the appearance of these green places and interfere with the enjoyment of them; and whether he will take steps to have them removed to more suitable sites?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, and I should like to take this opportunity of saying how grateful I am to my Noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works and the various local authorities who have assisted the Empire Marketing Board by giving permission for the display of their posters where ordinary advertisements would not be allowed. In reply to the second and third parts of the question, I believe the House will agree with me, that the display, on specially designed frames, of these posters by leading British artists, does not spoil the appearance or interfere with the enjoyment of the open spaces where they are exhibited. No site of this description is selected in any part of the country without the fullest consultation with and the prior concurrence of the authority within whose jurisdiction the site lies. But I need hardly add that if in any case it is found that there exists a substantial and well-founded complaint that any of the Board's special hoardings are interfering with the public enjoyment, the matter will be very carefully considered and steps taken to secure an alternative site.

Captain HUDSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that one of these boards has been put in the middle of Clapton Common?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I shall be very glad to receive any representations from the Clapton authorities in the matter.

Colonel DAY: How many of these boards are put up?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I think about 500 are put up and altogether there are to be 700.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Does the right hon. Gentleman know that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and he is not likely to get complaints though the public eye may be offended?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: We make it perfectly clear before any of these boards are put up that the local authority who is responsible for what should or should not be accepted in any open space is consulted and its concurrence obtained.

Sir HARRY BRITTAIN: Is it not a fact that these designs are artistic and have created the greatest interest wherever they have been put up?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: We are not only encouraging marketing, but also employing first-rate British artists.

EMPIRE BRANDY.

25. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department the amount of brandy produced during each of the last five years in Palestine, Australia and the Union of South Africa; and whether these countries impose any restrictions as to maturity before brandy can be exported?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I have been asked to answer this question. I regret that the information at my disposal does not enable me to state the amount of brandy produced in the countries in question but only the amount of locally produced brandy exported from those countries. I will circulate the figures in the OFFICIAL REPORT. In reply to the last part of the question, Section 12 of the Spirits Act, 1906, of the Commonwealth of Australia provides that no spirits distilled in Australia may be delivered from the control of the Customs unless they have been matured in wood for a period of not less than two years. In the Union of South Africa a maturity of three years is required by Customs regulation. I regret that I have no information as to the provisions, if any, which are in force on this point in Palestine.

Mr. HARRIS: Does this Empire Marketing Board propose to ask people to drink Empire brandy, and, if so, can they guarantee its quality?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The Empire Marketing Board does not aim at advertising specific commodities but, generally speaking, it would be to the advantage of this country and of our overseas possessions if people would consume British Empire wines, and brandy would be included under that heading.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware whether Empire brandy is sold in the bars of the House of Commons?

Following are the figures:—

Export of brandy (domestic produce only) from the Commonwealth of Australia, the Union of South Africa and Palestine.

Commonwealth of Australia:

Year.	Gallons.
1921-1922	1,420
1922-1923	1,319
1923-1924	453
1924-1925	410
1925-1926	411

Union of South Africa:

Year.	Gallons.
1922	1,347
1923	761
1924	788
1925	3,151
1926	1,943

Palestine:

Year.	Litres.
1924	34,378
1925	32,129
1926	30,869

Note.—The corresponding figures for the years 1922 and 1923 in regard to Palestine are not available in the Colonial Office.

DOMINIONS.

27. Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department the proportion of the total import and export trade of each of His Majesty's Dominions which was done with the United Kingdom in each of the last three fiscal years?

Mr. SAMUEL: The answer consists of a tabular statement of figures. Perhaps the hon. Member will, therefore, agree to its circulation in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the answer:

The following statement shows the trade of each of the Self-Governing Dominions and of India with the United Kingdom expressed as percentage proportions of their total trade, during each of the last three trade years, calculated from the particulars published in the official returns of those countries. The figures relate to merchandise only, i.e., not including gold.

Country.	Total Imports (Merchandise).			Domestic Exports (Merchandise).
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
	Years ended 31st March.
Dominion of Canada	1925. 19.0	1926. 17.7	1927. 15.9	1925. 37.0	1926. 38.6	1927. 35.7
	(Imports for consumption.)
	Years ended 30th June.
Commonwealth of Australia	1924. 45.3	1925. 47.1	1926. 43.5	1924. 39.6	1925. 43.7	1926. 43.6
	Years ended 31st December.
Dominion of New Zealand	1924. 47.8	1925. 48.7	1926. 45.7	1924. 81.5	1925. 81.2	1926. 79.5
	Years ended 31st December.
Union of South Africa	1924. 51.5	1925. 49.9	1926. 48.9	1924. 59.2	1925. 56.3	1926. 55.9
	Years ended 31st December.
Irish Free State	1924. 81.1	1925. 81.1	1926. 75.6	1924. 98.1	1925. 97.2	1926. 96.6
	Years ended 30th June.
Newfoundland	1924. 22.6	1925. 31.2	1926. 21.0	1924. 31.9	1925. 31.6	1926. 23.4*
	Years ended 31st March.
British India (sea-borne trade)	1925. 54.8	1926. 51.9	1927. 47.8†	1925. 25.3	1926. 20.7	1927. 21.2

* Inclusive of Re-exports.

† Not including Government Stores, full particulars regarding which are not yet available.

— ECONOMIC CONFERENCE (RECOMMENDATIONS).

56. Mr. RUNCIMAN asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will have prepared a statement showing how far the policy of Great Britain is in harmony with the findings of the Economic Conference?

Mr. A. M. SAMUEL (Secretary, Overseas Trade Department): I think it is well known to the House that British policy and practice in matters of commerce is in general accord with the recommendations of the Economic Conference. Those recommendations fall broadly under the following heads:

As regards liberty of trading, it has for many years been the practice of this country to accord national treatment to all ships, and to afford to the citizens of all countries the widest facilities for carrying on their trade in this country. Moreover, the British Government has taken an active part in promoting, and has consistently adhered to, all the conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations to this end.

As regards Customs administration, Great Britain has adhered to the Customs Formalities Convention, and does not discriminate against any foreign country; and we are ready to take part in any international discussions on the possibility of simplifying the nomenclature.

As regards the scale of tariffs, it will be agreed that a distinction must be drawn between revenue duties counter-vailed by excise and duties into which a [Mr. Samuel.] protective element enters. In this respect, Great Britain may certainly claim a considerable lead, since these latter duties, as the British delegation pointed out, only apply to some 2 or 3 per cent. of British imports.

The Conference also laid stress on the importance of most-favoured-nation treatment in the widest sense. This again is in conformity with British practice, as exemplified in the whole range of our commercial treaties. Those treaties also provide in many cases, as recommended by the Conference, for the settlement of matters of dispute in the last resort by the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Will the hon. Member consider the issue of the statement in parallel columns of the final recommendations of the Economic Conference and the statement that he has now given in rather general form, for more precise use?

Mr. SAMUEL: The recommendations of this Conference are so many and so important that I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not press for any definite or immediate reply, because replies might be given which might have to be qualified afterwards and they might put my right hon. Friend into the position of having said something about which he has not had full time for consideration.

Mr. CRAWFORD: Will the hon. Member press on the Government the importance, at a time when all the European nations are tending more towards a policy of freedom of trade, that the Government's policy should not be directed in the opposite direction?

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Will the hon. Member, when he is considering the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Swansea (Mr. Runciman) for information in parallel columns, also give us the list of the 5,000 articles which at present are taxed for protective purposes?

MAINTENANCE ORDERS (DOMINIONS AND COLONIES).

21. Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies which parts of the Empire have now passed reciprocal legislation in connection with the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920; and whether those parts of the Empire which have not yet passed such legislation have announced their intention of doing so in the near future?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: Legislation reciprocal to the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, has been passed throughout Australia, in New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, in all the Colonies not possessing responsible Government and in all British Protectorates. In Canada the question of such legislation is one which falls within the jurisdiction of the several Provinces, and it is understood that the Provincial Governments are not at present prepared to take steps for the passage of such legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Will the right hon. Gentleman make representations to the Provincial Governments of Canada as to the great hardship this country is suffering from the failure to pass the necessary legislation?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: We cannot make representations direct to the Provincial Governments, of course, but the matter is under the consideration of the Dominion Government.

KENYA (KILINDINI HARBOUR).

22. Sir SYDNEY HENN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a definite agreement has been arrived at in connection with the control and working of Kilindini Harbour; and when a copy of that agreement will be published?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The heads of the agreement were published in the Press on 11th May. I will place a copy of the agreement itself in the Library of the House.

LAND PURCHASE, SOUTHERN RHODESIA (NATIVES).

24. Mr. W. BAKER asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received representations urging him to agree to the surrender by the natives of Southern Rhodesia of the right which they possess under Article 43 of the Constitution to purchase land in Southern Rhodesia upon the same terms as the white settlers; and whether he will give an assurance that in the event of the constitutional right being surrendered a much larger area than the suggested allotment of 8,000,000 acres for purchase by the natives shall be set aside in order to see that adequate provision is made for the future development of the native people?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: My right hon. Friend is not in a position to add anything to the reply made to the hon. Member on 26th May except that he understands the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly have now adopted a resolution approving generally the principles of the Report of the Land Commission with the exception of the recommendation relating to so-called "neutral areas."

FRANCE (COAL IMPORT LICENCES).

26. Mr. ERNEST BROWN asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department whether he will now make any further statement as to the method of working the licence system under the French embargo scheme affecting imported coal, or whether there is any prospect of the abolition of the scheme?

Mr. A. M. SAMUEL: Our Ambassador has been informed by the French Government that restrictions are now only being applied to coal required for administrative and public services, i.e., Government Departments, railways, gas and electrical works. The amount of reduction effected is 250,000 tons per month and is being applied to coal from all sources. Licences for the importation of coal from this country for the first three months of the operation of the restrictions have now been issued to an amount exceeding 3,000,000 tons. The French Government are not yet in a position to state for how long the restrictions will be maintained.

Mr. BROWN: How recent is the hon. Gentleman's information, and what are all the sources?

Mr. SAMUEL: We received a telegram from His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris this morning, therefore the information is up-to-date. What I meant by all sources is this. The reduction referred to in the reply includes coal from German trade sources and, I believe, from German Reparation sources.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

ST. STEPHEN'S HALL (PAINTING).

34. Mr. COUPER asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether it is proposed to remove the painting depicting the Unknown Warrior's Grave from St. Stephen's Hall; and, if so, whether it will be placed in some other part of the House of Commons where it would be of ready access to the public view?

35. Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether he is aware that it is proposed to move the picture of the Burial of the Unknown Warrior into the King's Robing Room and place it so as to hide a very beautiful piece of tapestry; and whether, if it is necessary to move the picture at all, he will take steps to have it placed in a position to which the public has more easy access.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Captain Hacking—for The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS): The picture in question will, with the consent of the Lord Great Chamberlain, be placed for the time being in the King's Robing Room, in a position where it will not affect the tapestry. The decision to place the picture in the Robing Room, which is the first apartment on the line of route followed by visitors to the Houses of Parliament, was reached after very careful consideration, and my right hon. Friend is unaware of any more suitable position.

Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE: Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that this room is not open to the public at all when the House is not sitting, and is only open to those who go round with Members of the House, and that no one will have a chance of seeing the picture at all?

Captain HACKING: My hon. and gallant Friend is mistaken. The Robing Room is open on Saturdays for visitors without Members being present.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that the removal of this picture from St. Stephen's Hall is very unpopular?

Captain HACKING: It would not fit in with the scheme of pictures in St. Stephen's Hall, which are to be unveiled on Tuesday, and that is the only reason it had to be removed. It is out of no feeling of disrespect to the artist or the donor or anyone connected with the picture. We are trying to find the best alternative position.

Mr. HAYDAY: I would like to ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman not to take the decision to place the picture in the King's Robing Room as a definite decision, for I heard many adverse comments this morning when showing parties round, the feeling being that such a national picture deserves a more suitable place.

Captain HACKING: I was very careful in my answer to say that the picture would only be in the Robing Room for the time being. If any hon. Member has any suggestions to make as to a better position for this picture, my right hon. Friend will be prepared very carefully to consider such suggestions.

Mr. E. BROWN: Does not the hon. and gallant Gentleman think a permanent place in Westminster Hall would afford the greatest access to the public to view the picture, and that it would not interfere with any scheme of decorations at all in the building?

Captain HACKING: That position has been suggested to my right hon. Friend. The only drawback I can think of at the moment is that Westminster Hall is not heated, and it is possible that the picture might in consequence be damaged, but that alternative position will be taken into consideration.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Can my hon. and gallant Friend say who has the final say in the removal of any gifts by Members of this House to any other section of the Palace at Westminster?

Captain HACKING: In my reply I said that with the consent of the Lord Great Chamberlain it had been placed in the present position. There are several people who always are consulted in connection with the position of the pictures, but I think I am right in saying that the Lord Great Chamberlain is primarily responsible.

Sir WILLIAM LANE MITCHELL: Is the picture depicting the Speaker being held down in the Chair opposite where the Speaker's Chair used to stand to be replaced again?

Captain HACKING: No, Sir. That picture is now in Committee Room No. 14.

Sir W. LANE MITCHELL: That is a downright shame!

Captain HACKING: Again, I understand there is a probability of Room No. 14 being placed in the grand tour of the Houses of Parliament.

Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE: Is my hon. and gallant Friend aware that this picture is of much more interest to the public than most of the pictures are, and will he not consider putting it in the place of some other pictures, even if it does not match the decorations?

Captain HACKING: I am afraid it is too late to do anything in relation to the present scheme in St. Stephen's entrance —[Hon. Members: "Why?"] —but from the point of view of prominence, perhaps it would satisfy the House if it were placed in Westminster Hall. That position will certainly receive consideration.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: Can my hon. and gallant Friend say why these removals were made without any consultations with Members of the House?

Captain HACKING: I do not think it is necessary to ask permission of Members of the House, but I may add that their wishes will be given every possible consideration.

Sir WILLIAM DAVISON: Is there any Committee of Members of the House of all parties to consider the removal of any pictures from one part of the House to another?

Captain HACKING: No, Sir, not at present.

SESSIONAL ORDER (METROPOLITAN POLICE).

Mr. MOSLEY: I desire to ask your guidance and ruling, Mr. SPEAKER, on a question relating to a Sessional Order of this House. The Order in question was passed by the House on Tuesday, 8th February, and addressed to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis in the following terms:

"That the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis do take care that during the Session of Parliament the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House."

This afternoon it was the experience of several of my hon. Friends and of myself that we found all the main roads leading to this House obstructed by the order of the Commissioner of Police. This was a situation which could easily be understood if it had escaped the handling of the police. The crowd was not drawn across the road; it was merely lining the road; and the only obstruction to the passage of Members of Parliament was the obstruction of the police themselves. A cordon of police was drawn across at least two of the main roads and, I am informed, other roads, and on inquiry being made we were informed that the Commissioner of Police had closed these roads even to Members of Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: What the hon. Member has said is the first I have heard of any failure to carry out the Sessional Order of the House. My experience is that when an hon. Member informs the police that he is a Member of Parliament proceeding to the House, way is at once made for him. If there has been any failure in that respect I will personally undertake to look into it.

Mr. MOSLEY: May I at once say, on that point, that it was always my experience, when previously a Member of this House, that that information conveyed to the police permitted of a passage immediately, but this afternoon I and another hon. Friend of mine did so inform the police and were still refused a passage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I can only think that because of the multifarious duties that the police have to perform, there are occasionally those who are not aware of the general rule. I am sure it was not the Commissioner of Police who was responsible. The hon. Member having drawn attention to the matter, I will see that the Order of the House is carried out.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir G. DALRYMPLE-WHITE: Would it be in order for the traffic to be stopped for Members of Parliament proceeding to the House if it interfered with a procession such as that which has taken place to-day? May Members still claim the right to drive through?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would rather deal only with an actual fact which has been brought to my notice.

Mr. AUSTIN HOPKINSON: Is it not the case that the Order in question applies to Members themselves and not to their motor cars?

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: May I say that there was no difficulty for those who were in time?

Mr. THURTLÉ: Supposing that on this occasion the ancient right of Members to free access to this House has been interfered with, can you say what means we have of obtaining redress against such infringement of our right?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir William Joynson-Hicks): On a point of Order. Before you, Mr. Speaker, are asked to decide a hypothetical question as to whether the rights of Members have been interfered with or not, as there is a Minister in this House responsible for the actions of the police, might it not be desirable that the question should be addressed to me in order that I might ascertain and report to the House what the facts are?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a certain duty cast upon me by the Order of the House. Of course, I shall take care not to act until I am made fully aware of the whole matter. All I can say at the moment is that, a complaint having reached me from the hon. Member for Smethwick (Mr. Mosley), I will see that it is looked into.

Mr. MOSLEY: I thank you.

Mr. HOPKINSON: May we have a ruling on the point which I have raised, namely, that this privilege is only personal to Members of the House, and does not apply to any motor car or other conveyance in which they happen to be driving?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think it does. An hon. Member might claim to come in a caravan.

Mr. MOSLEY: The point of privilege which I raised related also to the experience of hon. Friends of mine who were on foot, and who were still refused entrance.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps hon. Members concerned will acquaint me with the facts.

Mr. HARDIE: May I do so now?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think it is necessary now; but with regard to the actual facts of any such incident, I should like to have them in writing so that I may thoroughly investigate the matter.

Mr. HARDIE: Remarks have been made from the other side which imply certain conditions upon Members who are so concerned. I did not know what the reason for the crowd was on the road which I generally use, and I would not have minded going round two or three miles had it been something of importance, but when I learned the cause—[HON. MEMBERS: "Order!"]

Sir CLEMENT KINLOCH-COOKE: May I say that I arrived at the House exactly as the procession came along the street, and I found no difficulty in getting into the House, and I was on foot.

Mr. HARDIE: This was before the procession and before the House was open. The gate by which we come in every day was locked.

TITHE ACT, 1925.

23. Major Sir GRANVILLE WHELER asked the Minister of Agriculture whether, as there is no Minister responsible to the House of Commons for the actions of Queen Anne's Bounty with respect to the administration of the Tithe Act, 1925, he will consider the desirability of introducing legislation for this purpose?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Guinness): The Tithe Act, 1925, entrusted to Queen Anne's Bounty certain duties in regard to the collection and ultimate redemption of ecclesiastical tithe rentcharge. The Bounty have for many years past dealt with redemption and allied questions affecting such tithe rentcharge, and I see no reason why their administration in regard to matters which are domestic to the Church should be subject to constant review in this House. I am not prepared, therefore, to introduce legislation of the kind indicated by my hon. and gallant Friend.

Sir G. WHELER: Is it a fact that a very large number of tithepayers are now brought in under the control of Queen Anne's Bounty under the new assessment who never were so closely connected with Queen Anne's Bounty before, and should they not have some right of redress if anything goes wrong?

Mr. GUINNESS: That is true, but Parliament was no doubt aware of the large area to which Queen Anne's Bounty was to be applied, and I think my hon. and gallant Friend will recognise that at first, when the change over takes place, a certain amount of inconvenience is inevitable, and as there may be a special distribution in July, Queen Anne's Bounty are doing all they can to mitigate the loss.

AGRICULTURE.

LIVE AND DEAD MEAT (PRICES).

31. Mr. DREWE asked the Minister of Agriculture the average price of fat cattle and sheep in our principal markets last week, six months ago, and a year ago?

Mr. GUINNESS: With my hon. Friend's permission, I will circulate in the OFFICIAL REPORT a statement giving the desired particulars.

Following is the statement:

The average of the prices of first and second quality fat cattle and sheep at representative markets throughout England and Wales in the weeks ending 1st June, 1927, 1st June, 1926, and 1st December, 1926, were as follows:

Week ending.	Per live cwt.	Fat Cattle.		Fat Sheep.
		Approximate equivalent per lb. estimated dressed carcass weight.		Per lb. estimated dressed carcass weight.
		s.	d.	s.	d.
1st June, 1927	49 4	0	9½	1	0½
1st Dec., 1926	47 2	0	9	1	0½
1st June, 1926	54 3	0	10½	1	1

30. Mr. DREWE asked the Minister of Agriculture the average retail price of beef and mutton in our principal towns last week, six months ago, and a year ago?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of LABOUR (Mr. Betterton): I have been asked to reply. With the hon. Member's permission, I will circulate a table in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

Average retail prices (per lb.) of specified descriptions of beef and mutton, as calculated from returns furnished by those shopkeepers, in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, who supply information to the Ministry of Labour relating to the prices charged to working-class families:

	1st June, 1927.		1st Dec., 1926.		1st June, 1926.
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
Beef, British :
Ribs ...	1	4½	1	5½	1	5½
Thin Flank ...	0	9½	0	9½	0	9½
Beef, Chilled or Frozen :
Ribs ...	0	9½	0	10½	0	10
Thin Flank ...	0	5	0	5½	0	5½
Mutton, British :
Leg ...	1	6½	1	6½	1	7½
Breast ...	0	10	0	10½	0	10½
Mutton, Frozen :
Leg ...	0	11½	0	11½	1	0
Breast ...	0	4½	0	5½	0	5½

• MERCHANDISE MARKS

29. Brigadier - General CLIFTON BROWN asked the Minister of Agriculture what foreign agricultural products have been considered for marking by the Committee set up under the Merchandise Marks Act; when will this Committee report on these products; and whether he can give producers of British eggs any idea as to the date when unmarked foreign eggs will be prohibited from coming into this country?

Mr. GUINNESS: Four applications in respect of currants, raisins and sultanas; eggs; meat, including bacon and ham; and honey have already been submitted to the Committee. The case of imported oatmeal is also under consideration. I regret that it is not possible for me to give the dates on which the Reports of the Committee may be expected. As regards the last part of the question, I am unable to pre-judge the recommendations of the Committee.

COMMISSIONERS OF CROWN LANDS.

32. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Minister of Agriculture what funds the Crown Lands Office has at present at its disposal; what is the capital value of the present investments held by the office and the approximate annual income from these investments; what is the acreage of the land now administered by the office; how much has been bought and sold, respectively, during the last five years; and the total amounts realised and expended on the sale or purchase of land?

Mr. GUINNESS: The cash value of the securities held by the Commissioners of Crown Lands is £2,457,193; and the approximate annual income therefrom is £115,699. Exclusive of copyholds, held of the Crown, foreshores and areas in which the Crown owns the minerals but not the surface, the landed property extends to 226,000 acres, of which 108,000 acres are agricultural land, 6,500 acres are under timber and 81,800 acres of unenclosed wastes are subject to common rights. During the last five years about 9,900 acres of land have been sold, producing £458,000; and about 7,800 acres have been purchased at a cost of £356,000.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: In view of these very large sums at the right hon. Gentleman's disposal and the very heavy transactions which have taken place, would he consider the purchasing of 50 acres of land near Stonehenge which are threatened with building operations?

Mr. SPEAKER: That matter does not come within this question.

EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATIONS.

37. Mr. CECIL WILSON asked the Minister of Labour whether he can state, with regard to the 2,403 employers' associations concerned with labour matters, whether these associations exist for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between masters and masters, or for improving conditions, or the conduct of any trade or business, or for what purpose they exist, and in what way and for what purpose the Ministry come in contact with them; and whether, in regard to the 100 principal associations, he can give the same information regarding membership, income, expenditure, and funds as is given in the Eighteenth Abstract of Labour Statistics in regard to 100 principal trade unions?

[Mr. C. Wilson.]

Mr. BETTERTON: The employers' associations enumerated in the Ministry of Labour's 'Directory of Employers' Associations, Trade Unions, etc., are those which are known by the Department to concern themselves in some way with matters relating to the employment of labour. The Ministry of Labour comes into contact with many of them in the conduct of Departmental business, for example, in connection with negotiations and the collection of statistical and other information as to conditions of labour. I am unable to give the information asked for as to the membership and finances of these associations. Such of them as are registered trade unions are included in the Annual Report of the Registrar of Friendly Societies.

Mr. WILSON: Will the hon. Gentleman say what was the character of the negotiations which took place?

Mr. BETTERTON: Negotiations generally in which we assist in the settlement of disputes. We obtain statistical and other information of the kind indicated in the question, where we can, in order to place them in our records.

Mr. MACKINDER: Can the hon. Gentleman say who is the authority who decides whether or not these associations are trade unions, registered or unregistered.

Mr. BETTERTON: I cannot answer that question without notice, but any registered association under the Friendly Societies Act must comply with the rules laid down by the Registrar.

Mr. MACKINDER: I am not asking that. Who is the authority who decides whether they are trade unions, registered or unregistered?

Mr. BETTERTON: That question, again, I cannot answer without notice.

Mr. MACKINDER: What is the authority that decides whether or not they are trade unions? I ask for the purpose of information.

Mr. BETTERTON: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put that down in the form of another question.

CONTRIBUTORY PENSIONS ACT (EX-SERVICE MEN).

40. Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY asked the Minister of Health if he is aware that cases have arisen where ex-service men of 100 per cent. disability pension have subsequently died from a disease not attributable to service and, as they were unemployable and uninsurable, the widows and orphans are not eligible for benefit under the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925; and whether he will consider bringing such cases within the Act of 1925?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Sir Kingsley Wood): I would remind my hon. and gallant Friend of the special provisions which were inserted in the Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, to enable ex-service men to secure the benefits of the scheme. One of these provisions had the effect of giving to those who had served for not less than 104 weeks in the late War the necessary qualifications for becoming voluntary contributors under the Act, if they were not required to be insured thereunder, while another was designed to facilitate payment of the contributions of voluntary contributors who were in receipt of war pensions. My right hon. Friend is afraid that no further concession is possible.

HOUSING.

RURAL WORKERS ACT.

41. Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE asked the Minister of Health what number of local authorities have decided to put the Housing (Rural Workers) Act into operation?

Sir K. WOOD: Proposals have so far been submitted by 38 county councils and seven other local authorities under the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, and others have schemes under consideration, but have not yet actually submitted proposals.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (EMPLOYÉS).

42. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Health the number of houses erected by county councils for their employés in each year from 1920 to 1926, inclusive?

Sir K. WOOD: With the consent of the hon. Member, my right hon. Friend will circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT, giving the information desired.

Following is the statement:

The following statement shows the numbers of houses erected by county councils or Joint Boards in England and Wales for their employés, with State assistance, under the Housing Acts, during each year ending in March, 1920, to 1927:—

Year ending in March.				Number of houses.
1920	2
1921	80
1922	350
1923	79
1924	16
1925	16
1926	75
1927	92

AGRICULTURAL PARISHES (RENTS).

43. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Health the average rent at which houses in agricultural parishes under the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1924, are let; and the number of land workers who have obtained houses under that Act?

Sir K. WOOD: Statistics are not available giving the information desired by the hon. Member. I would point out, however, that houses erected under the 1924 Housing Act have to comply with the conditions as to rentals prescribed by the Act.

Mr. BROWN: Can the hon. Gentleman inform me of the approximate average?

Sir K. WOOD: No, Sir. I think the hon. Gentleman will find that that question—perhaps I can send the reply to him as it gives some examples—was answered a few weeks ago.

Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE: Is it not a fact that a rent of 30s. a week, plus rates, has been asked?

Sir K. WOOD: I would not care to commit myself to a general statement of that kind, but there are instances that have already been furnished to Members of the House.

CEMENT.

44. Mr. DENNISON asked the Minister of Health what is the average amount of cement used in the building of a subsidy house; how much foreign cement has been used during the 12 months ending May in the building of subsidy houses; how much cheaper per ton is the foreign cement compared with Scotch manufactured cement; and will he consider the advisability of withholding the subsidy where foreign cement is used?

Sir K. WOOD: It is estimated that, on an average, about 2½ tons of cement would be required in the construction of a brick subsidy house, in cases where cement is used. I have no information as to the quantity of foreign cement used in the building of subsidy houses. According to recent quotations in Glasgow, the price of Scottish cement (blast furnace) was 47s. 6d. per ton, as compared with 47s. for foreign cement. As regards the last part of the question, Section 10 of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1924, provides that, in approving proposals for the construction of houses, the Minister of Health shall not impose any conditions which would prevent the materials required being purchased in the cheapest market at home or abroad. My right hon. Friend has, therefore, no power to carry out the suggestion of the hon. Member, but the Government have urged local authorities to arrange that all contracts for or incidental to works carried out by them should, in the absence of special circumstances, be placed in this country.

Colonel DAY: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether it is not a fact that a great deal of foreign cement is used in these houses?

Sir K. WOOD: No, Sir; I cannot say that.

Mr. HARRIS: Are not these houses quite expensive enough without adding to their cost by insisting on British-made materials?

CHILD LABOUR.

45. Mr. CECIL WILSON asked the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the joint committee of the Industrial Conference of 1919 expressed the opinion that child labour was bad in principle and tended in practice to decrease the chances of adult employment, and that, consequently, the age at which a child should enter employment should be raised; and whether, in view of these expressions, it is proposed to take any general action to give effect to the unanimous recommendation of the conference.

[Mr. C. Wilson.]

Mr. BETTERTON: I have been asked to reply. I am aware of the recommendation to which the hon. Member refers. Since 1919 the employment of child labour has been further restricted under Statute, and in particular by the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act, 1920. The question of what action should be taken in the future is largely bound up with that of the school-leaving age in regard to which I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my Noble Friend the President of the Board of Education on the 16th June, 1927, to the hon. Member for Houghton-le-Spring (Mr. R. Richardson).

Mr. WILSON: Will that mean, as far as the Government are concerned, leaving the applications entirely to the local authorities who desire to put it into operation, and that nothing further is contemplated?

Mr. BETTERTON: I think that question should be addressed to the President of the Board of Education. If the hon. Member looks at the very long answer which he gave on the 16th June, he will see that he dealt with it.

COAL MINING INDUSTRY (GLAMORGANSHIRE COLLIERIES).

47. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Secretary for Mines whether he is aware that 2,500 men employed at six collieries in Glamorganshire have received 14 days' notice to terminate their agreements; and will he ascertain from the firm concerned whether any steps can be taken to avert these discharges?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Colonel Lane Fox): I have seen a statement to this effect in the Press, but I understand on inquiry from the company concerned that they still hope, if the state of trade permits, to continue working on day-to-day contracts after the notices have expired.

Mr. MORRISON: In view of the fact that these six collieries belong to Baldwin's, Limited, cannot the hon. Member ask the Prime Minister whether he can use his influence—

HON. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. E. BROWN: Has this anything to do with the French embargo?

Colonel LANE FOX: Yes, Sir. It is attributed partly to the French embargo and partly to the depression in the iron and steel trade.

Mr. PALING: Is it not a fact that men are getting notices like these throughout the length and breadth of the land, including the best districts such as South Yorkshire?

Colonel LANE FOX: Not for the same reason.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman suggest to the proprietors of these collieries trying to work on the one-shift system, instead of two shifts which we find in some parts of the country, is the best way of keeping the men together?

Colonel LANE FOX: Hon. Members can rely upon the Government doing the best they can at the moment.

Mr. PALING: Is the Government's "best" likely to be no better than it was last year?

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Is it not a fact that a great many new coal sources were opened up on the Continent last year on account of the coal strike which have not yet been shut down and that that is responsible for a good deal of the trouble?

ROYAL NAVY.

MESSING ARRANGEMENTS, PORTSMOUTH (PETTY OFFICERS).

48. Sir BERTRAM FALLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that because an irregularity occurred in the administration of the petty officers' mess in the Royal Naval Barracks, Portsmouth, that mess has been placed on the general messing system against the wishes of the members of the mess; and whether the privilege of petty officers making their own messing arrangements is now withdrawn?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Lieut.-Colonel Headlam): I am having inquiries made and will let my hon. and gallant Friend know as soon as they are completed.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: On a point of Order. May I draw attention to the spelling of "Royal Naval Barracks" in this question as it appears on the Order Paper? Is it not usual to use capital letters for the words "Royal Naval"? Can this be altered in the OFFICIAL REPORT?

Mr. SPEAKER: I will look into the matter.

INVALIDED RATINGS.

49. Sir B. FALLE asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty the number of ratings invalided from the Royal Navy in the year ending 31st March, 1927; and the numbers invalided for tuberculosis and for nephritis and other kidney and bladder troubles, respectively?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The figures for the year ending 31st March, 1927, are not available, but during the year 1926 (1st January to 31st December), 1,725 ratings were invalided. In the same period the number invalided for tuberculosis was 197, but the figures for nephritis and other kidney diseases and bladder troubles will not be available for some months.

SHERIFF COURTS AND LEGAL OFFICERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

50. Mr. HARDIE asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to proceed with the further stages of the Sheriff Courts and Legal Officers (Scotland) Bill?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Major Elliot): As matters stand, my right hon. Friend fears that no further progress can be made with the Bill until the Autumn. He hopes that it may be possible to pass the Bill in the limited time then available, and that hon. Members in all parts of the House will be prepared to facilitate its progress.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is the hon. and gallant Member aware that the Bill will go through without any opposition if the Government will take into consideration the harsh treatment being meted out to a few old servants?

Major ELLIOT: My right hon. Friend is well aware of these allegations of harshness, but they did not convince the Treasury officials during the tenure of power of the hon. Member's own party.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Apart from that party debating point, is the hon. and gallant Member not aware that these grievances have been specifically brought to the notice of his Department, and cannot he take steps to get them remedied?

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Is he not aware that the fees charged in the Sheriff and the Small Debts Court were materially added to, and that it will make it more difficult for poor people in Scotland to get access to the Courts, and that the fees were raised for the purpose of paying proper salaries to the officials, and they have not been used for that purpose?

Major ELLIOT: These are matters for debate, and it will be improper for me now to go into them. If hon. Members oppose the passage of the Bill, it will not pass, and these gentlemen will not get any redress.

Mr. HARDIE: May the House know what has been done with the funds which have been collected in adding to the fees? If they have not been given to the officials, who has got them; have they been handed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. Members must not argue the matter.

TELEPHONE SERVICE (FLATS, SOUTH KENSINGTON).

53. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the demand made by the owner of a block of flats known as Warwick Chambers, South Kensington, for the immediate removal by the Post Office of all telephones connected to the tenants occupying flats in the said building; and whether he will see that no steps are taken by his Department to deprive the tenants who have agreements with the Post Office of their telephones?

[Sir W. Davison.]

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir William Mitchell-Thomson): I am advised that the landlady in this case is acting within her legal rights in requiring the removal of the telephone at the flats, and I have no option but to comply. Provision is made in the subscribers' agreements for summary termination if way-leave difficulties arise. I regret the unfortunate position in which the tenants find themselves, and I am considering the possibility of introducing legislation to meet such cases.

Sir W. DAVISON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that several of these tenants have had agreements with the telephone department of the Post Office for many years, and has any reason been given to the Post Office for this very high-handed action on the part of the landlord?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, and to the second in the negative.

Colonel DAY: Must the Post Office authorities remove any telephone wires when a landlord asks them to do so?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I should require notice of a general question like that.

RUSSIA.

BRITISH TRADE (PASSPORTS).

54. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the statement of His Majesty's Government that no obstacle would be placed in the way of legitimate trade between this country and Russia, he will state the procedure for business men or their agents wishing to visit Russia for purposes of business; whether the Norwegian Government will obtain visas for these British subjects, in view of his statement that British passports are no longer endorsed valid for entry into Soviet territory; and whether he will state what should be the procedure for British subjects to obtain visas for Russia?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson): I have ascertained that the Soviet Government state that applications for visas for Russia should be made to the Soviet representative in Berlin.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: What is the object in not making the passports valid to Russia when people wish to go there for legitimate business? Does the hon. Member not see that it makes it difficult for business men to get their visas?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: It has been stated already that we are very anxious not to interfere with legitimate trade between this country and Russia. But it would be very unusual to give passports to a country with which we have broken off diplomatic relations. In the second place, if we gave passports we could not possibly guarantee the safety of the people who received them.

ARCOS, LIMITED.

62. Mr. REMER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can make a statement as to the number of foreign employes of Arcos, Limited, who still remain in this country?

Captain HACKING: I would refer my hon. Friend to the statement which the Home Secretary made on Thursday last in reply to questions by my hon. and gallant Friends the Members for Romford (Mr. Prys) and Bath (Captain Foxcroft).

Mr. CLYNES: Does that reply include the number of aliens who have been required to leave the country?

Captain HACKING: Yes, as far as Arcos is concerned. My right hon. Friend stated that 350 were employed in Arcos, and that 48 of these have left or are about to leave.

BRITISH CHILDREN (VISIT).

65. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Home Secretary whether he is aware that the six British children who were refused passports to go to Russia to study Soviet methods have now left London for Petrograd on a Soviet-owned steamship; whether the emigration officer consented to their departure; and what steps the Home Office proposes to take to prevent such occurrences in the future?

Captain HACKING: I am informed that the children in question sailed in the Soviet s.s. "Youshar" on Tuesday evening. The law places no restriction upon persons leaving this country and therefore neither the Home Secretary nor his officers had any power to intervene and no consent was required. Passports were refused to those who did not already possess them because the Government were not prepared to facilitate their journey.

Sir W. DAVISON: Having regard to the large powers which the State possesses to protect children's bodies from contamination does not my right hon. Friend think it desirable that their minds should also be protected from contamination?

LEAGUE OF NATIONS (CHINA).

55. Lieut.-Colonel Sir FREDERICK HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether China is still an effective member of the League of Nations; by whom that country is represented at the Geneva Conference; whether such delegate is acting on instructions received from the Cantonese Government or the Government centred at Peking; and if he can indicate, for the information of the House, what measures have been taken by the League with the object of remedying the existing conditions in China, with their reactions in other parts of the world?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: China is still a member of the League of Nations, and is represented on the Council by Mr. Chu. Mr. Chu was appointed by the Peking Government. As regards the last part of the question, I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the replies given on the 16th of February last by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to the questions asked by the hon. Members for Penistone (Mr. Rennie Smith) and Peckham (Mr. Dalton). The hon. Members were then referred to the letter addressed by His Majesty's Government to the League of Nations on the 8th of February, stating that they deeply regretted that there did not appear to be any way in which the assistance of the League in the settlement of the difficulties in China could be sought at present. The letter added that if any opportunity should arise of invoking the good offices of the League His Majesty's Government would gladly avail themselves of it.

EDUCATION.

NURSERY SCHOOLS.

58. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education the number of nursery schools aided or maintained by local education authorities which are recognised by the Board of Education; and have any recognised nursery schools been opened or closed during the lifetime of His Majesty's present Government?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Lord Eustace Percy): There are at present recognised by the Board 26 nursery schools, of which 11 are provided by local authorities. Of the 15 voluntary schools, all but one are aided by the local authority. Two nursery schools have been opened and three have been closed since the present Government assumed office.

Mr. HARRIS: Are we to understand that the closing of these nursery schools is due to the fact that the Board of Education are not favourable to them?

Lord E. PERCY: It is not due to that cause. I do not know what the particular cause is in this case.

Colonel DAY: Is the President of the Board of Education encouraging the opening of those schools which have been closed?

Lord E. PERCY: If the hon. Member wants to know anything more about these particular schools, perhaps he will put down a question.

TEACHERS' SALARIES.

59. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education whether the arbitration award by Viscount Burnham on the scales of salaries for teachers in public elementary schools included a provision that existing teachers should not receive a less rate of salary as from 1st April, 1925, than they were receiving on the 31st March, 1925; whether the Board are aware that teachers absent from school on account of ill-health for periods which involve a loss of pay are liable to have their salaries reassessed and reduced; whether such reassessment of salaries is approved by the Board; and whether, if the complaints of teachers with regard to this matter are substantiated, the Board will make representations to the arbitrator on this subject?

[Mr. Harris.]

Lord E. PERCY: The interpretation of the award is a matter which rests with the Burnham Committees. The particular decision referred to by the hon. Member is based on the principle that teachers with the same qualifications and service should receive the same salaries, and I see no ground for suggesting its reconsideration.

Mr. HARRIS: Are we to understand that the Burnham Committee is sitting permanently to interpret its decisions, or does the Board of Education take over their functions?

Lord E. PERCY: No. It is a Committee of the Burnham Committee which sits, and as far as I know is ready to go on sitting in connection with the award.

Mr. HARRIS: Does this Committee sit in connection with the Board of Education or does it interpret the award independently?

Lord E. PERCY: It is in touch with the Board of Education, but the Burnham arrangement is one between the local authorities and the teachers, and is naturally interpreted by a Committee representing these two parties.

MENTALLY DEFECTIVE CHILDREN.

60. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education what are the terms of reference to the Departmental Committee appointed by the Board to consider matters relating to mentally defective children; has the Committee taken any evidence from witnesses; when is the Committee likely to make its Report; and, having regard to the fact that the development of schools for mentally defective children is being held up pending the findings of the Departmental Committee, have the Board any intention of asking for an interim Report?

Lord E. PERCY: As regards the first part of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by me on the 24th March last to the hon. Member for West Newcastle (Mr. Palin), a copy of which I am sending him. I understand that the Committee have not called witnesses, and that they hope to be able to report early next year. There appears, therefore, to be no occasion to ask them to consider making an interim Report.

Mr. R. MORRISON: In view of the uncertainty of a large number of local authorities as to what exactly is the policy of the Board of Education towards the provision of special schools for mentally defective children, can the right hon. Gentleman facilitate the issue of this Report or make some further statement in order that local authorities may know what they are expected to do?

Lord E. PERCY: The hon. Member is entirely mistaken. There is no uncertainty in the mind of local authorities, and any local authority which wishes to consult the Board can do so at any moment.

Mr. MORRISON: Am I to understand that the President of the Board of Education wishes local authorities to feel that no further provision should be made for special schools for mentally defective children?

Lord E. PERCY: The hon. Member is not to understand that. He is to understand that local authorities are free to consult with the Board in connection with any project they have in mind for the provision of special schools for these children.

Mr. MORRISON: Is it not the case that a considerable number of local authorities have submitted plans for these special schools for mentally defective children, and, as they have not met with the approval of the Board, they are in some doubt on the matter?

Lord E. PERCY: After the communications they have had with the Board, I do not think they can be in any doubt at all.

NEWPORT SECONDARY SCHOOL (JOAN ROGERS).

61. Mr. GROVES asked the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the action of the Newport Education Authority in excluding from the Newport secondary school Joan Rogers, a 15 years old girl, on the ground that she is unvaccinated; and whether, in view of the ruling of the Board in the year 1909 and of the action it has taken in other similar cases, he will intervene on behalf of this schoolgirl and secure her re-admission to the school?

Lord E. PERCY: My attention has already been called to this case by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport (Mr. Clarry). I understand that the local authority excluded this girl from school on the advice of the school medical officer acting in conjunction with the borough medical officer of health, owing to the prevalence of smallpox in the area outside the borough in which the girl lives, but that they are prepared to re-admit her to school provided that her parents are willing to allow her to live within the borough so long as the epidemic continues. In these circumstances, I do not think that I should be justified in interfering with the action taken by the authority on the recommendation of their competent medical advisers.

Mr. LANSBURY: May I ask whether this action does not really override the Act of Parliament, which enables the parents of a child to decide whether or not it shall be vaccinated?

Lord E. PERCY: It is entirely open to the parents to decide whether a child shall be vaccinated. The law does not enforce any other parent, or those responsible for the children of other parents, to expose other children to the risks.

Mr. LANSBURY: Is it not the law that this child is to be permitted under the conditions that prevail in Newport to attend at this school, and are not the authorities using their power to prevent the child getting the education to which she is entitled? Does not the law allow those who object to vaccination to mix with those who support vaccination?

Lord E. PERCY: As far as I can understand the hon. Member, the answer to all three parts of his question is "No."

ARRESTS FOR DEBT.

63. Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary whether any facilities exist in the Metropolitan area to enable persons arrested for non-compliance with a judgment order for debt on a Saturday to satisfy the demands of the same during that day, so as to avoid their retention in prison until the following Monday?

Captain HACKING: Reasonable facilities are afforded to a debtor to satisfy a judgment debt. The procedure for securing discharge on payment varies according to the Court concerned. If the hon. Member will put down a question regarding the particular class of case he has in mind, my right hon. Friend will answer it.

WOMEN POLICE.

64. Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary the present total establishment of women police employed in the Metropolitan police area, the districts where these officers are on duty, and the annual cost?

Captain HACKING: There are at present two inspectors, five sergeants and 42 constables of the Women Police employed in the Metropolitan Police District. They are allocated for duty in the various parts of the district as may be required. The total cost of the Women Police for the year 1926-27 was approximately £9,400.

Colonel DAY: Do I understand that these officers have no regular places of duty, but are sent about the West End of London?

Captain HACKING: They are attached to certain districts, but are frequently moved about as necessity arises.

SMALL-POX AND VACCINATION.

66. Mr. GROVES asked the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the refusal of certain London magistrates to take statutory declarations under the Vaccination Act, 1907; and whether he has taken action in the cases that have been brought to his notice?

Captain HACKING: In the case of Metropolitan Police Magistrates two complaints of the nature referred to have been made to my right hon. Friend within the last year, and in both instances he found on inquiry that the facts were in-[Captain Hacking.] accurately represented and that there had been no refusal on the part of the magistrate. Complaints of the conduct of individual Justices of the Peace other than Stipendiary Magistrates are a matter for the Lord Chancellor rather than for my Department.

Mr. PALING: Where there is a genuine case of a man refusing to sign these application forms will the Under-Secretary state what the procedure is?

Captain HACKING: The hon. Member must communicate with the Lord Chancellor.

46. Mr. GROVES asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that the fatal case of small-pox from King Henry's Road, Hampstead, removed to the Dartford small-pox hospital, was a woman who had been vaccinated in infancy and re-vaccinated at the age of 11 years; and whether he can state the source of infection in this case?

Sir K. WOOD: My right hon. Friend is informed that this woman, who was 40 years old at the time of death, was said by her mother to have been unsuccessfully vaccinated in infancy, and was not re-vaccinated at the age of 11, her history in that respect having been confused with that of her sister. The source of infection has not been traced.

CURRENCY.

68. Sir F. WISE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the pre-War currency per head of the population and the currency per head of the population on the 31st March, 1927 (notes and gold)?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): With my hon. Friend's permission, I will circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

ESTIMATED CURRENCY PER HEAD IN THE UNITED KINGDOM AND IRISH FREE STATE.

	30th June, 1914.		31st March, 1927.
	Amount.	Per head.	Amount.	Per head.
	£	£ s. d.	£	£ s. d.
Bank of England Notes (a) ...	29,784,000	12 11	81,703,000	1 13 11
Currency Notes	—	—	288,067,000	5 19 6
Gold Coin	122,000,000(b)	2 13 5	—(c)	—
Silver Coin	34,000,000	14 9 {	52,000,000(d)	1 1 7
Bronze Coin			8,000,000	3 4
Total	186,784,000	4 1 1	429,770,000	8 18 4

(a) Excluding notes held in the Bank of England Reserve and, in 1927, in the Currency Note Reserve.

(b) Estimate used by Cunliffe Committee (par. 13 of Interim Report).

(c) The amount of Gold Coin which may be in the hands of the public is unknown.

(d) Excluding Silver Coin held in Currency Note Reserve.

69. Sir F. WISE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the recent Whitsuntide demands brought the Treasury note issue to within about £1,000,000 of the fiduciary maximum, if he will consider setting up a Committee to consider this technical financial problem?

Mr. McNEILL: No, Sir. There is nothing abnormal in the fiduciary circulation approaching the maximum at holiday time and there is no special problem involved therein.

AFFORESTATION.

36. Captain GARRO - JONES (for Sir R. THOMAS) asked the hon. Member for Monmouth, as representing the Forestry Commission, whether he will consider the possibility of extending the policy of afforestation now being pursued by his Department with a view to relieving present unemployment as well as replacing the national timber resources?

Sir LEOLIN FORESTIER-WALKER (Forestry Commissioner): No distinction is now made between the Forestry Commission's normal and relief work, the latter being met by adjustment of policy which included the adoption of an annually expanding planting programme. The Seventh Annual Report of the Forestry Commissioners, recently published, dealing with forest policy shows that the present position is not satisfactory and sets out some of the chief considerations which have to be borne in mind in laying down the future forest policy of Great Britain.

SAFEGUARDING OF INDUSTRIES ACT (IRON AND STEEL).

57. Mr. REMER (for Sir FRANK MONDERSON) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the continued depression in the heavy industries and the increase in volume of imports of manufactured steel and iron goods, he will consider safeguarding this industry under the Safeguarding of Industries Act?

Mr. SAMUEL: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the President of the Board of Trade to the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. Dixey) on 16th June, of which I am sending him a copy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT HUTCHISON: May I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury what Votes he proposes to take on Wednesday?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Commander Eyres Monsell): The Estimates for the Ministry of Health and the Dominions Office will be considered in Committee of Supply on Wednesday.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES),

STANDING COMMITTEE A.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee A: Major Sir Granville Wheler; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Ellis.

Report to lie upon the Table.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

Boys.

Mr. C. EDWARDS asked the Minister of Labour the number of boys who have left school each year since 1921; the numbers of those who have found work; and the total number of boys who left school during that period and have never been employed?

Mr. BETTERTON: Information in reply to the first part of the question is given below.

Statistics as to the proportion of boys leaving school since 1921 who have found work is not available. Some information, however, bearing on the subject is contained in the Report of an Inquiry into the Personal Circumstances and Industrial History of a representative number of juveniles registered for employment in June and July, 1925. I am sending the hon. Member a copy.

The following is the information regarding school leaving:

The numbers of boys who are recorded as having left public elementary schools in England and Wales for employment, during each of the years ended 31st March, 1921-1926, inclusive, were as follows:

1921-1922	227,683
1922-1923	256,715
1923-1924	254,356
1924-1925	273,789
1925-1926	276,751

The numbers of boys who are recorded as having left secondary schools on the grant list in England and Wales, during or at the end of the school year (31st July), excluding those known to have entered other secondary schools and those whose parents removed from the district, were as follows:

1921-1922	33,019
1922-1923	35,754
1923-1924	35,839
1924-1925	34,920
1925-1926	34,217

As regards Scotland, it has not been possible in the time available to obtain figures regarding boys only: the following figures relate to boys and girls who finally left grant-earning day schools in Scotland during each of the years ended 31st July, 1921-1926, inclusive:

1921-1922	91,883
1922-1923	91,933
1923-1924	93,549
1924-1925	91,937
1925-1926	88,497

BENEFIT DISALLOWED (MINERS).

Mr. C. EDWARDS asked the Minister of Labour whether his attention has been drawn to the numerous cases in which miners have been refused extended benefit on the ground that they are not making reasonable efforts to obtain employment; whether he is aware that in the majority of such cases it is a matter of common knowledge that at all the collieries in the neighbourhood large numbers of those normally employed in the colliery are out of work, and that to visit such collieries in search of work would be useless; and whether he will take steps to revise the Regulations as to the evidence required in such cases to prove that reasonable efforts have been made?

Mr. BETTERTON: These disallowances of benefit are imposed in almost all cases on the recommendation of rota committees, who have knowledge of local circumstances such as those referred to in the question, and I know of no reason for supposing that such circumstances are not taken fully into account.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

WAGES AND PRODUCTION.

Mr. E. BROWN asked the President of the Board of Trade the amount of wages paid per £1,000 of production, in the years 1924, 1925, and 1926, respectively, in the following trades and industries: agriculture, mining, iron and steel, ship-building, brewing and distilling, cotton, woollen, lacemaking flour milling, and electrical appliances?

Mr. SAMUEL: I regret that I am not at present in a position to give information of this character. At a later date, when it becomes possible to make comparisons of the census of production figures and the figures of wages paid to workpeople collected by the Ministry of Labour, it is hoped to publish information of this kind in respect of 1924. For the other years mentioned particulars are not available.

CONDENSED MILK.

Brigadier-General CLIFTON BROWN asked the President of the Board of Trade what is the number of factories in this country manufacturing condensed whole milk and separated or skimmed milk powders; how many employes do they employ; and how many tons of condensed milk and how many tons of separated or skimmed milk powder are manufactured in this country annually?

Mr. SAMUEL: I regret that the information asked for is not available, except as regards the quantity of condensed milk produced in this country in the year 1924. This latter figure will be ascertained in due course from an examination of the census of production returns, and will be published, when available, in the series of census of production reports issued each week in the "Board of Trade Journal."

POLICE (UNFOUNDED COMPLAINTS).

Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary the number of unfounded complaints of incivility on the part of individual officers of the Metropolitan Police Force received for the 12 months ended to the last convenient date?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: To give figures would require a search through the records, which I do not feel justified in asking the police to undertake.

COAL TRADE DISPUTE (CONVICTIONS).

Mr. RHYS DAVIES asked the Home Secretary the total number of persons convicted, fined, and imprisoned, respectively, under the Emergency Powers; and the number, if any, still in prison at any given recent date, showing males and females, respectively, in each instance?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: The figures asked for in the first part of the question were given in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. Beckett) on 25th May. (OFFICIAL REPORT, Cols. 2009-10.)

The number of persons detained for offences arising out of the emergency is 36, all of whom were convicted under the ordinary law and not under the Emergency Regulations. All are males; 10 are serving terms of penal servitude, 25 are in prison and one is in a Borstal Institution.

BOOKMAKERS (PROSECUTIONS).

Colonel DAY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions have been instituted by the Inland Revenue authorities against persons for carrying on the business of bookmakers without a licence in contravention of the Finance Act, 1926?

Mr. McNEILL: Up to 31st May, 139 persons were prosecuted for carrying on business as a bookmaker without having in force a proper certificate.

SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE DEBTS.

Sir H. FOSTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now able to state the position of matters in reference to the indebtedness of Yugoslavia to this country; the amount of such debt; and whether any arrangement has yet been come to for the liquidation of the debt?

Mr. McNEILL: The amounts of the debts of the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government to this country as on 31st March, 1927, are as follow:

	£
War Debt	29,492,000
Relief Debt	2,687,000
Debt for repatriation of Serbian nationals	187,000

No arrangements have yet been come to for the liquidation or funding of these debts, but I am informed that the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government are about to submit fresh proposals for a settlement.

SILK AND ARTIFICIAL SILK TAXES.

Mr. REMER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the total amounts of Customs and Excise revenue received by the Treasury from silk and artificial silk in February, March, April and May, 1927, under the various headings of these taxes, including the amount of drawbacks refunded in the same months?

Mr. McNEILL: The information requested by my hon. Friend is contained in the following table:

STATEMENT showing the Total Amounts of Customs and Excise Revenue derived from the Taxes on Silk and Artificial Silk during each of the Months from February to May, 1927, inclusive.

Month.	Silk (Imported).				Artificial Silk (Imported).
	Cocoons and Waste.	Raw.	Yarn.	Tissues.	Waste.	Singles Yarn and Straw.	Doubled or Twisted Thread.	Tissues.
1927.	£	£	£	£	£	£	£	£
February	7,343	11,264	17,420	251,485	166	15,969	545	92,640
March ...	4,880	13,588	16,436	309,789	596	20,124	278	123,468
April ...	11,388	9,504	19,485	257,897	674	13,733	653	116,788
May ...	11,850	13,669	16,940	225,484	915	24,296	Deduct 22*	117,252

Month.	Articles made wholly or in part of Silk or Artificial Silk.	Total Customs Receipts.	Deduct Drawbacks.	Net Customs Revenue.	Net Excise Revenue from Artificial Silk Yarn and Waste.	Total.
1927.		£	£	£	£	£
February	108,134	504,966	52,182	452,784	67,207	519,991
March ...	152,150	641,309	72,464	568,845	64,316	633,161
April ...	114,450	544,572	48,268	496,304	91,894	588,198
May ...	111,005	521,389	87,767	433,622	68,212	501,834

* Excess of repayments.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS (MARRIAGE GRATUITY).

Miss BONDFIELD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what is the number of women, higher clerical officers, executive officers, lower clerical officers, superintendents of typists, shorthand-typists, copying typists, and writing assistants, respectively, who have been granted marriage gratuities since 1920?

Mr. McNEILL: The following particulars are available as to the number of resignations with marriage gratuity among established women staffs in the financial years 1923-24 to 1925-26 inclusive:

Executive grades	5
Clerical grades	764
Writing assistants	320
Typists and shorthand-typists, etc.	344
				—
Total				1,433

The particulars as to executive and clerical grades include certain posts above the basic grades and cannot be divided in the manner indicated in the question under reply. Figures for earlier years are not available.

NEW FOREST (TIMBER SALES).

Sir H. CROFT asked the hon. Member for Monmouth, as representing the Forestry Commissioners, how many oak and beech trees of 100 years old and more have been cut in the New Forest since 1st January, 1926; what has been the total number of cubic feet sold; and the average price per cubic foot received for their sale?

Sir L. FORESTIER-WALKER: 15,856 oak and beech trees of 100 years old and more have been cut in the New Forest since 1st January, 1926; many of these trees were in a very unhealthy state following repeated defoliation by caterpillars; 206,584 cubic feet have been sold, and the average price per cubic foot received for their sale was for the oak 10d. and for the beech 4d.

INDIA.

WORKMEN'S STRIKE, ROYAPURAM.

Mr. SCURR asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can give any particulars regarding the strike of about 1,000 workmen employed in the public works department workshop, Royapuram, Madras, on 31st May?

Earl WINTERTON: My Noble Friend has not yet received any detailed information regarding this strike.

Mr. SCURR asked the Under-Secretary of State for India the position of the strike at Massey and Company's iron works, Royapuram, Madras; and whether there has been any extension of the strike to other allied industries?

Earl WINTERTON: According to a report received from the Government of India, about 600 workmen of Messrs. Massey and Company's engineering workshops struck work on the 25th May as a protest against the dismissal of 30 men. The management is said to have decided to close the works department indefinitely. I have no information in regard to the last part of the question.

DR. MOONJEE.

Mr. SCURR asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that an order, under Section 144 of the Criminal Proceedings Code, has been served on Dr. Moonjee by the District Magistrate, Surat, prohibiting him from addressing or attending any public meeting in Surat or within a radius of five miles; and whether he can state the reason of the issue of such an order?

Earl WINTERTON: I have seen this fact reported in the Press. I have no definite information as to the reason for the order, but have little doubt it was due to the apprehension that Dr. Moonjee's speeches as President of the Hindu Mahasabha would exacerbate Hindu-Moslem relations.

CHOPWELL WOODS (EMPLOYMENT STATISTICS).

Mr. WHITELEY asked the Minister of Agriculture the number of men employed in the Chopwell Woods, County Durham, the number of hours worked per day, and the rate of wages paid per day or week?

Sir L. FORESTIER-WALKER: I have been asked to reply. The number of men employed by the Forestry Commission in the Chopwell Woods is 10. The number of hours worked per day from Monday to Friday is nine, and on Saturday five. The rate of wages is 31s. per week.

HORSES (EXPORTATION).

Mr. AMMON asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he intends to do anything to put in force the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on the exportation of horses to the Continent; and, if so, what action he intends to take?

Mr. GUINNESS: The following statement shows the action taken on the seven recommendations of the Departmental Committee:

Recommendation.	Action taken.
1. The attention of port inspectors should again be called to their powers to slaughter rejected horses.	This has been done.
2. The time has now arrived when the Ministry should insist on its full requirements as regards the fittings of vessels and that exemption should be for a definite period, and that the question of renewal should depend on the record of casualties, and on the number of vessels engaged in the traffic which fully comply with the Order of 1921.	This is being carried out where practicable when exemptions of particular vessels under review. Only small variations from standard is allowed and some of vessels already withdrawn from traffic on account of reduction in horse traffics and provision during last three years of 15 new vessels which entirely comply with standard regulations.
3. Opportunity should be taken by Order of the Minister of making it an offence to carry horses on a vessel when there are reasonable grounds for supposing that rough weather will be encountered on the passage.	Effect will be given to this recommendation by the issue shortly of an order on lines of recent Transit of Animals Order regulating cross channel and coastwise trade in cattle.
4. Local Authorities at ports should be required to provide a suitable place at which rejected horses could be slaughtered.	In last six years only 12 horses ordered to be slaughtered at port as being unfit to be kept alive. Considered unreasonable there to require Local Authorities at all ports of shipment to provide special abattoirs for this purpose.
5. Efforts should again be made to get the Belgian and Dutch Governments to amend their regulations with respect to the importation of horse carcasses.	Within the last few years efforts made without success to secure amendment of Belgian and Dutch regulations, and present time not considered opportune for making further representations.
6. Inquiries should be instigated by the Ministry into the trade in the export of horse flesh (dead), with particular reference to chilling of flesh and improvement of transport facilities.	The Ministry has made efforts to persuade shippers and shipping companies to improve conditions in carcase trade, but has no statutory control over it.
7. Port Inspectors should be under the direct control of the Chief Inspector.	This has been done.

SUGAR-BEET FACTORIES.

Mr. W. HIRST asked the Minister of Agriculture what is the average length of the manufacturing season at home-grown sugar-beet factories?

Mr. GUINNESS: The length of the 1926-27 manufacturing season, taking an average of all factories in England and Wales, was 114 days; the average for the 1925-26 season was 87 days.

if so, when the necessary legislation will be introduced?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The first part of the question will require careful consideration, and I am not at present prepared to express an opinion on the point. No action can be taken until the local commission which is about to be formed has reported upon the nature of the modifications required in the constitution.

BRITISH GUIANA (CONSTITUTION).

Sir J. POWER asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the constitutional reforms in British Guiana will involve any legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom; and,

AMANI INSTITUTE.

Sir J. POWER asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is in a position to make any further statement as to the reorganisation of the Amani Institute?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: No, Sir.

MR. H. T. MILLS (CLAIMS AGAINST FOREIGN OFFICE).

Sir J. SIMON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that Mr. H. T. Mills, late acting vice-consul at Monrovia, Liberia, submitted his claim for travelling expenses on the 14th February last; that the necessary vouchers were submitted by the 1st April; that payment of part of the expenses was not made until the 3rd May; whether he can give the reason for this delay and for the non-payment of the remainder of the travelling expenses; and whether, seeing that Mr. Mills submitted his claim for rent allowance on the 17th February, that vouchers in respect of this were submitted by the 4th March, that payment was not made until the 25th May, that he submitted his claim for high cost-of-living bonus on the 17th February, that payment of this claim has not yet been made, and that Mr. Mills informed the Foreign Office on the 5th May that he would shortly be leaving England and desired a settlement before his departure, he can facilitate the prompt settlement of this claim?

Mr. SAMUEL: (1) Travelling expenses.—The facts are as stated. The reason for the delay was that one of the items in the claim was for Mrs. Mill's passage; no evidence was furnished to the effect that this had been paid for by Mr. Mills, and correspondence with him took place on the subject. As the result of this correspondence it was established that Mr. Mills had not in fact paid for Mrs. Mill's passage, and he was accordingly informed that payment for it would not be made to him by the Foreign Office. This is the item to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers as remaining unpaid.

(2) Rent allowance.—The delay in making this payment arose from the fact that Mr. Mills's claim included sums which he had expended, without obtaining the prior sanction of the Foreign Office or of his superintending officer, in excess of the amount which he had been authorised to expend. A special request had therefore to be made to the Treasury, and correspondence with the superintending officer was also necessary. Treasury sanction for the excess expenditure was obtained on 21st May, and payment was made on 25th May.

(3) Cost-of-living bonus. — Delay in payment of this bonus which is based on the cost of living in Monrovia, arose in this case, as in the case of other officers in countries which do not publish statistics of cost of living, owing to the difficulty of establishing the correct level of prices. A figure is now available, however, and payment will be made as soon as Treasury approval of the figure, which is now being sought, is received.

It will be seen from the above that the delay which has occurred in this case was inevitable.

PEMBROKE DOCKYARD.

Sir R. THOMAS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the present position in regard to Pembroke naval dockyard; whether work of any kind is proceeding there; and how far the closing of this base entails the abandonment of the Milford Haven forts and other military establishments?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: A considerable portion of the dockyard has been leased to a firm of shipbreakers who are carrying on operations there. The intention is that Pembroke dockyard is to be kept ready to be re-opened at short notice in the event of war. In view of the possible naval use of this port in time of war, the defences cannot be abandoned and are being reorganised.

EDUCATION (ULTRA-VIOLET GLASS).

Sir R. THOMAS asked the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been drawn to a new kind of glass, called vitaglass, through which the health-giving rays in daylight pass without hindrance; and whether, in view of the fact that ordinary glass entirely cuts off these rays, he will authorise the universal use of vitaglass for new windows and replacement in all schools?

Lord E. PERCY: I have nothing at present to add to the reply given by me on the 17th February last to the hon. Member for North Lambeth (Mr. Briant), a copy of which I am sending the hon. Member.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[9TH ALLOTED DAY.]

Considered in Committee.

[Lieut.-Colonel SPENDER-CLAY in the Chair.]

CIVIL ESTIMATES, 1927.

CLASS I.

TREASURY AND SUBORDINATE DEPARTMENTS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £198,158, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1928, for the Salaries and other Expenses in the Department of His Majesty's Treasury and Subordinate Departments.—[Note. £120,000 has been voted on account.]

Mr. WILLIAM GRAHAM: I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

It is now some years since we had an opportunity of having a discussion on the Treasury Vote, although this is one of the Estimates which may give rise, and ought to give rise, year by year to Debates of first-class importance. We have asked for this Vote for the purpose of discussing one or two questions which have recently been raised by hon. Members in different parts of the Committee, and the two questions on which, personally, I invite an expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer are, of course, purely administrative in character but of great importance. They relate, in the first place, to recent changes in the higher personnel of the Civil Service, and, in the second place, to the decision which the right hon. Gentleman intimated, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Gillett) regarding the request or suggestion of Mr. McKenna made at the annual meeting of the Midland Bank shareholders for some inquiry into the position of our central banking institution in Great Britain, as compared with the American Federal Reserve system, and the bearing of both on our industry and commerce, more particularly on the depression of the past five or six years.

The second of these questions is undeniably far more important, but if the Committee will bear with me, I will at the outset briefly discuss the first—that relating to changes in the Civil Service personnel. We in the House of Commons are intimately associated with the Civil Service, and we know that the Treasury, as the Department which includes the Controller of Establishments, is the Department—particularly that branch of it which is under the Financial Secretary to the Treasury—which has a very great responsibility for the efficiency of the service and for its encouragement from time to time. I begin this afternoon by making it plain that we on this side of the Committee do not join in that consistent attack which is made on the Civil Service by certain organs of the Press in this country and by a certain section, though I trust only a limited section, of public opinion. It is plain to all of us that if the Civil Service is to reach its highest efficiency it must be safeguarded, since it cannot reply for itself, against unfair attacks of that description. Although we are not here to suggest that the members of the Civil Service do not from time to time, like all of us, fall into error, the object of raising this question is one which is wholly sympathetic to the Civil Service as such. We approach it purely from the point of view of the public interest, and certainly from the point of view of the efficiency of the service.

Some time ago, there was announced in the Press a series of changes in the higher administrative personnel, which could not fail to attract the attention of Members of Parliament. On that occasion seven or eight changes of great importance were announced, and, in particular, there were changes which involved the resignation from the service of the Controller of Finance at the Treasury on his acceptance, as from 1st August, of a post in the Bank of England, and the combination of the duties of Controller of Finance and Controller of Supply Services at the Treasury under a civil servant of great distinction who, up to 1st August, will be Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. The change involved at the same time the resignation of the Controller of Supply Services—of course, both of these resignations being purely voluntary in character. In one case it meant that an official was leaving the Civil Service to become our representative on the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, and in the other case, the official who will leave the Civil Service is proceeding to a great sphere of influence and public service in this appointment in the Bank of England. While these things are perfectly true, the changes for the State are of very great significance. Other changes were announced at the same time, the details of which I need not specify, but one of them involved the transfer of the Secretary of the Mines Department—that Department being then, as now, under sentence of death—to the Chairmanship of the Board of Inland Revenue, and a number of other transfers of that kind.

[Mr. W. Graham.]

Let me approach one or two of the questions which we have particularly in mind. Hon. Members will begin by wishing to retain for the service of the State the ability and power and experience of those civil servants who have been for many years in our employment. Certainly, when we compare the attractions which are offered by outside employment in certain cases to leading civil servants with the emoluments even in the higher branches of the Service, we are obliged to confess that it is surprising, on the whole, that more men do not leave the Service. That there is a certain encouragement in superannuation and other rights is not denied,

4.0 p.m. but those rights are being increasingly provided in outside employment. Men are content to remain in it because they love the Civil Service, because they like the form of the work, and, on the whole, the loss to the State under that head is comparatively small. But these changes at this juncture are important. The point which arises here is whether we do all in our power—and am not referring here to the salary and other emoluments—to give them that encouragement to remain in the Service, and whether a good deal more might not be done under that head? I am driven to the conclusion that one of the indirect effects of this form of agitation or attack, continued year by year, is to dishearten men who have been energetic and public-spirited in our service, and perhaps to encourage them to look for other employment outside when they have still great duties which they might render to us. Be that as it may, I dare say the overwhelming opinion, probably the unanimous opinion, of this House is that we must set our faces against campaigns of that description, and more on that head need not be said this afternoon.

We come now to the other consideration. Most hon. Members, if they were asked what is the general practice or policy of encouragement in the Civil Service, would say that, probably, to the best of their knowledge, the Service is very much like an ordinary business undertaking where men are trained up in one department after another, and are led to hope that if they render efficient service, they will, in due course, be at the head of the departments to which they are attached, or, it may be, at the head of an adjacent department for which their experience qualifies them. That has been the theory held by a large number of Members of this House, although we recognise this afternoon that frequently departures from that theory and practice have been made by the appointment of men to certain departments or branches of our Service or by their transfer when a course of that kind was deemed to be desirable. The recent leading changes, almost wholesale in character, raise the question in many minds in this House, and I think in many minds outside, as to whether there had been any great departure from this principle within the Civil Service? Within recent times—and here, of course, and throughout the speech, I make no reflection upon individual civil servants, because I have no reason to have other than the highest admiration of their work—but within recent times it has been suggested that there has been a tendency to build up a group of what we might call general managers within the Service, that is, men, no doubt of outstanding ability, who have served in different departments, and who might be regarded as a group—I will not say a pool, because that is now, perhaps, an inaccurate word to use—for appointment to different departments as may be deemed desirable by Ministers of the day, with whom the responsibility must rest, on the advice of this group or body of leading civil servants themselves, in so far as that advice is invited or tendered in making the appointments.

That is, in reality, the important consideration which, I think, the Committee should have before it this afternoon. What method is best calculated to get the maximum return from the Civil Service in the way of the discharge of public duty, and to encourage the personnel of of the service itself? Will that be better encouraged by adhering, as far as we possibly can, to the system of departmental promotion, or will greater encouragement come from the presence of that group of what I call general managers who are available for appointment as heads of those departments on something like the principle which, a week or two ago, when these changes were announced, was apparently in force? I make it plain that this is a matter of very great difficulty for any Member of the House of Commons. It is not a question in which we can draw a hard-and-fast line, but I would be inclined to say that, before we part to a substantial extent with the system of steady departmental promotion, we should have one or two important points in mind. There cannot be the least doubt that the most efficient discharge of duties in the Civil Service to-day, at a time when the functions of the State have enormously increased depends, to a great extent, upon a considerable amount of specialisation, that is, the civil servant is trained in a department; he grows up through years of experience in that department; and when, on that principle, he arrives at the top, he will be familiar not only with the details of the department of which he has been a member, but also with the broad policy which is particularly what is under examination when he comes before the Public Accounts Committee of this House to-day rather than strict figures of Departmental expenditure. When we look to post-War conditions the plea for that specialisation becomes even more pronounced.

I can best illustrate it by describing one of the important changes which have taken place. Notice that under this scheme—and of course it is altogether administrative in character; there is no question of legislation—the Government will combine—here, of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is responsible—the duties of the Controller of Finance with those of the Supply Services, and to that combination, which of course means a far greater strain upon the holder of the office, you bring a distinguished civil servant who has been Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. The thought that would occur to anyone who has had even a brief experience of the Treasury, and must occur to many Members of this House, is that while admitting the ability of the Civil Service in adapting itself to new duties—I am not raising any point of that kind this afternoon—in the Controllershship of the Treasury you have an official who is in immediate contact with the Bank of England and must deal in fundamental problems of our national finance. In the second place, the Controller of Finance is responsible to a large extent for inter-Allyed financial problems, for the discussion of reparation problems with other nations and for a wide variety of issues of first-class importance, involving directly and indirectly thousands of millions of the money belonging to the people, or likely to belong to them—I hope some of it will—in times to come. Surely, it is plain that in circumstances of that description it will be in the national interest to rely upon an official who has the necessary experience or what I will call the historical background for the discharge of the duty, and I would say that, however able he may be from every point of view, it would be very difficult indeed for the holder of that combined appointment to place his finger readily and easily on all the facts and all the evidence in the very difficult times in adjustment of our relations with the Bank of England, in currency policy, and in other matters to which this country is moving. Did the Government have that in view when these changes were made, and was the element of the departmental experience, which is of vital importance in this connection, sufficiently emphasised? I think that the House of Commons, and probably the country, will expect an expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer this afternoon.

There is another side to this question. I alluded a minute ago to the fact that this office had been combined with the control of the Supply Services. What in practice, does that mean in our national finance? In this Department of the Controllershship of the Supply Services you have a leading civil servant who is responsible for a general review of all that relationship which exists between the State on the one side and the local authorities on the other. And when you consider what the local authorities are spending, and what the State is contributing to the local authorities, you have there, again, £200,000,000 or £300,000,000 of expenditure of one kind or another every year. Moreover, at this juncture, that problem is under close inquiry and investigation, because the Government indicated some time ago that they proposed to find, if they possibly could, some method of replacing the existing system of percentage grants by a form of overhead or block grants.

[Mr. W. Graham.]

That inquiry is proceeding at the present time. Whatever the decision, it is of vital importance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it is certainly of vital importance to the local authorities, especially if it means the transfer of certain burdens now borne by the State to the local authorities. There, plainly, you have a point of very great importance at a time of difficulty in industrial recovery, when rates, in many cases, are a greater burden than the burden of national taxation itself. Just at this juncture, when you have those very difficult questions before the people—and they are largely matters of finance—you combine these two offices, and you bring to the two offices a man for whom many of us have the greatest regard but who has not been in Departmental touch with these problems in recent years. Far be it from me to suggest for a moment that that distinguished civil servant will not be equal to the strain. That is not my case. My case is rather to ask whether there is not great danger or some risk to the national interest in the combination, and in placing the chief responsibility in one who has not the historical background in strictly Treasury experience which many believe to be necessary in the circumstances described.

That is a concrete illustration that I give of the importance of this change. It may be necessary, to some extent, to modify the old system of Departmental promotion, because I do not suppose it is disputed that certain Departments in the past tended, under that system, to drift into not the strongest personnel by any means by which they might have been manned, and that outsiders—within the Service, of course—had to be called in. Be that as it may, even if you do modify the system of Departmental promotion, are you not going too far in setting up a group, or attempting to set up a group, of general managers, if the effect of that is going to be to make a considerable section of the administrative class of the Civil Service feel that, however hard it works, however efficient it is, and however it exerts itself to study its subject, it cannot reach the head of the Department in which its experience has been built up? That calls for the serious consideration of this House.

I come, in the second place, to what is the more important part of our appeal, and here we are dealing with a subject of very great technicality, in which large numbers of business men, a large section of the movement to which I belong, and many others are keenly interested at the moment. At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Midland Bank, Mr. McKenna made an elaborate plea for an impartial inquiry into our system of central banking, by which, of course, he meant the Bank of England, and the working of our general credit and currency system, and when my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would be prepared to facilitate an inquiry of that kind, the Chancellor replied that at that stage he did not think a sufficient case had been made out. He went on to add that he was nervous, as I gathered, of the unsettling effects that such an inquiry might have in many directions, and on these grounds—and probably on others for all I know—the request was refused. That was, of course, an administrative act on the right hon. Gentleman's part; it was a Departmental decision, and it is, therefore, perfectly appropriate matter for debate when we take the Treasury Vote this afternoon. But here is an issue of first-class importance to British industry and commerce and also to the employment of large numbers of our people, because there is a widespread opinion in business and other circles at the present time that some part of our depression—I could not measure the amount—is due to the currency and credit policy which we have pursued in this country in preparation for a return to the gold standard since 1921.

Let us be perfectly clear and fair as to the nature of Mr. McKenna's appeal. This, of course, is no party matter, because men in all parties agree with it, and in all parties there is very considerable difference of opinion. I am going to try to state the case as impartially as I can, in order that from the right hon. Gentleman we may get some expression of the Government's views. Mr. McKenna took the year 1921, and he referred to the divergence, as he described it, between American credit and currency policy under the federal reserve system since that time, as compared with the policy which we have pursued in Great Britain—admittedly a policy pursued by successive Governments, and designed to restore our credit and to provide conditions that would lead to an easier return to the gold standard, adopted in the decision of the Government in April, 1925. He then went on to contrast the apparent prosperity of the United States of America, on the one side, with those five or six years of industrial depression in this country on the other. Making allowance for the exceptional period in 1924, in which there was some little interruption of that prosperity in America, most hon. Members will agree that the United States have enjoyed remarkable material success, and we, on the other side, have made very little inroad upon the unemployment and the depression which have overtaken us. I do not ignore—and, of course, it would be perfectly idle to ignore—the extent to which we have been adversely affected by industrial dislocation. Whatever view we take of the causes of that dislocation, its economic effects are perfectly plain to everyone, but even when allowance has been made for that, it is possible to raise a very large question as to whether there is anything in this divergent currency and credit policy which will partly explain our difficulties, as compared with the United States.

A great deal of discussion has taken place since Mr. McKenna made that speech. The speech was diametrically opposed to that of another chairman of one of the leading banking institutions, and I would say that on that ground alone you have a case for inquiry, because plainly, when you have two of the leaders of the large banks, two of the Fig Five in this country, laying down manifestly contradictory doctrines, what is ordinary business in this country to believe, and what are the masses of the people to believe? I should think nine people out of ten would say that if these great authorities differ, the very least you can undertake is some kind of inquiry, at least to ascertain the facts, because we want every instrument we possibly can get for the restoration of our industry and commerce, and it is my belief that the recovery will come, not by one route, but by several routes. And if this is a conceivable route, it is worth exploration. Those two authorities were in flat contradiction.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): What two authorities?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. McKenna and Mr. Goodenough. So that, prima facie, you have some kind of case for inquiry, even if nothing more was said. Pursuing the argument a little further, we have to recognise, of course, the very great difference in American conditions. America got, as we know, an enormous quantity of the world's gold, and she still holds it, and it might be argued that American prosperity has been due to some extent to the use of that gold reserve, at all events, for the purposes of moderate inflation. Most of the authorities seem to argue that America has steered clear of inflation, except perhaps to a very limited extent; that, in point of fact, she has sat on the gold reserve for the express purpose of keeping free of a difficulty of that kind; and if you take the price level as a test, I am inclined to agree that on that test she has established a very large part of her case. Then we have to keep in mind that America has had the advantage of debt settlements, which compare rather favourably with such debt settlements as this country has been able to obtain, and it is also true that we are, I am afraid, now certain to make a very large part of the financial sacrifices arising from the War.

Mr. CHURCHILL: How has America the advantage?

Mr. GRAHAM: In that they have achieved settlements, and we still have settlements to achieve.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The right hon. Gentleman must compare like with like; he must compare the American settlement with Italy or the American settlement with France with the British settlements with those countries.

Mr. GRAHAM: What I have in mind this afternoon is the general problem of War contributions and debt settlements, and I would be inclined to say that, on all the analyses, America is comparatively in a much better position to-day than this country.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The only respect with which she is in a better position is because of the settlement which she has made with Great Britain, and it is not open for Great Britain to make a similar settlement with Great Britain.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, but the point I am making is that, taking everything into account, America has—I will put it another way—shouldered very much less of the burden, proportionately, than has fallen to us in this country.

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is quite true.

Mr. GRAHAM: All these considerations are present in the American situation, and probably to some extent they undermine, or at all events modify, the comparison upon which Mr. McKenna embarked; but in the long run he came down to this, that when an analysis was made of the currency and credit operations under the federal reserve system, as compared with what we had in practice in this country under the Bank Charter Act of 1844, there was a greater elasticity in the American system, and that is the argument which has since been generally used. There, again, you have a mass of technical detail, and I certainly will not attempt to detain the Committee with it this afternoon. I am perfectly well aware that high technical authorities dispute that contention, and that they argue that we have had just as much elasticity in credit and currency in this country under our system as they have under the federal reserve operation in the United States. Be that as it may, there remains a body of opinion which attributes at least a part of that American prosperity in those years between 1921 and the present day to a greater freedom within the federal reserve system than we have enjoyed in the corresponding period, even when allowance is made for the difference in position between the two countries, and so they throw in their lot with the Chairman of the Midland Bank in favour of this inquiry.

Now, may we turn to the nature of the reply which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave? He said that it might have an unsettling influence in many directions. I can only try to indicate what probably would be at the back of his mind in this connection, but I imagine that he had in view the danger of any statement which could be interpreted as implying even a bare possibility of inflation in Great Britain. A speech was made some years ago by a Conservative Minister now outside this House—he was then, I think, a Member of this House—who suggested that our currency and credit policy might be altered in such a way as to provide for some inflation, and I very well remember the anxiety that was caused at that time and the steps which were taken almost immediately to correct the impression he gave. Now it is, of course, only fair to Mr. McKenna, and it is only fair to our own judgment in this matter, to say at once that Mr. McKenna had not in view either inflation or deflation. In that speech to the shareholders of the Midland Bank both were excluded, and speaking quite for myself, from this part of our argument to-day they are also excluded.

I think that this inquiry can proceed without any risk of that kind, but even if the Chancellor took another view and felt that there was a danger in it, he might very well say that the possibility of even mild inflation was excluded, but on the technique of the inquiry, he was willing to proceed, and by that I mean the operation of the Bank of England system and the extent to which there is in fact avoidable restriction in the holding of the gold reserve and the regulation of our credit and currency policy. The plea for that inquiry has been supported by facts of impressive importance within recent times. It was pointed out some days ago at a gathering in London that of all the numerous countries which had embarked upon a reconstruction of their financial machinery since the War, very few, if any, have adopted the central banking system which is in force in this country. In point of fact, the schemes which have been put into operation are very much nearer to the American federal reserve method, and, if that be true, we are bound to ask whether all is finally well with our machinery.

May I urge one consideration in conclusion? The Chancellor of the Exchequer may say that this is a very risky moment even for an inquiry, because, as the Committee know, we are approaching the time when there will be an amalgamation of the currency note issue and the Bank of England note issue and determination of the very important question as to the point at which the amount of gold behind that amalgamation is to be fixed. Of course, it is plain to all of us that before this Government, or any Government, can approach a decision in this matter they must themselves engage in very elaborate private inquiry into the problem. My case this afternoon is that so far as there is any material for those inquiries which is available for the guidance of industry and commerce it should be placed at their disposal now. Even if industrial dislocation passes away, even if we get rather more favourable access to markets than appears to be possible at the moment, we shall be admittedly making a very small inroad upon what I would call deadweight unemployment. I do not fear, speaking again for myself, a slight increase in our price level in this country as altogether undesirable if that increase means a compensating stimulus to industry and commerce. If hon. Members will recall what was written by Sir Josiah Stamp in a minority report of one of the investigations into the coal problem, they will remember that the operation of this preparation for a return to the gold standard was there related, in a very clear way, to a first-class industrial issue: and that, of course, is only one illustration. If there were to be some change in the price level, what we have to do to-day in an inquiry of this kind is to weigh up the advantages and the disadvantages of that change. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may say that that will involve burdens for the State, and it will be to some extent going back upon all that we have done in the restoration of our credit.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I say it would involve a reduction of wages.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure it would, but, on the other hand, so long as this depression lasts the State has to carry very heavy burdens of an entirely or very largely unremunerative character; because to-day our financial system is honeycombed by a mass of outlay on unemployment benefit and by ill-concealed subsidies of one kind or another which to some extent might be reduced—I should think would be largely reduced—if we could stimulate industrial recovery. Though these serious problems, which I have done nothing more than summarise this afternoon, are the ingredients of controversy at the present time, I want the Chancellor of the Exchequer to believe that, much as we are opposed to this Government, they have not been presented in any purely party spirit. The right hon. Gentleman knows that within his own circle of advisers, those advisers which are at the disposal of every Chancellor of the Exchequer, there is wide difference of opinion, and the Association of Engineers, through one of their spokesmen in London the other night, indicated very clearly that in their belief, speaking for a large number of industrialists in this country, a case had been made out for the kind of inquiry which Mr. McKenna had in mind. It seems to me that it is insufficient for the Government to turn round and say that the effect would be unsettling. The unsettling effects of unemployment and distress, the loss of markets, and all the rest of it, are with us; and my view is that if we make the inquiry on proper lines, avoiding, for the purpose in mind, inflation on the one hand or deflation on the other, and confining it to the technique of this central institution, we may arrive at facts of first-class importance to British industrial recovery, and in that way may open out rather brighter times for, at all events, the million people who are still unfortunately unemployed.

Sir FREDRIC WISE: I had no idea that this particular subject was to be raised this afternoon, but I do congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham) on bringing up these two important matters. I do not propose to deal with the first point he raised, with regard to the Civil Service. He knows far more about the Civil Service than I have the opportunity of knowing, but nobody can do anything else but praise the Civil Service for what it does in this country. His second point is, indeed, a most technical one, but it is a most important one, and is affecting this country probably far more than the Committee realise. As he says, this is no party question. Strange to say, only to-day, although, as I say, I did not know the matter was going to be raised, I put down two questions which really affect what my right hon. Friend has said. In the first question I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer

[Sir F. Wise.]

“if he can state the pre-War currency per head of the population and the currency per head of the population on the 31st March, 1927 (notes and gold).”

I have not yet received the answer to that question because, naturally, it involves a large number of figures which could not be given on the Floor of the House. My second question was to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer

“as the recent Whitsuntide demands brought the Treasury note issue to within about £1,000,000 of the fiduciary maximum if he will consider setting up a committee to consider this technical financial problem.”

My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said in reply to this question it was not unusual for the maximum fiduciary issue to reach near the limit during the holiday period. That is quite right, but I do not think that the maximum has ever before been so near the actual limit in the Whitsuntide holidays, and that makes one feel that this question should be looked into, be the subject of an inquiry. The Cunliffe Committee, which reported in 1918 and again in 1919, stated, as far as I remember, that the fiduciary issue should be settled after there had been £150,000,000 of gold reserve in the Treasury for a certain period, the actual period not being mentioned. To the best of my recollection, in December, 1924, the Treasury had a little difficulty in regard to the maximum limit of the fiduciary issue, and the actual amount went within £45,000 of the maximum limit, and I think that was after the transfer of a very large block of Bank of England notes to the support of the fiduciary issue. The fiduciary issue was fixed, as far as I remember, at £248,000,000 for 1925, the limit for 1926 was £247,000,000, and the limit for this year is £246,000,000.

I contend that my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh is correct in saying that the system is not elastic enough. We have the experience of the Dawes' Report. So far as I remember, the Dawes' Report, which set up a central bank in Germany, gave elasticity to the fiduciary issue in Germany. There was to be a fixed amount, and if the fiduciary issue went beyond a certain amount the central bank had to pay a commission on or an increased interest on the amount by which it exceeded the actual limit. The federal reserve system, also, is more elastic than our Bank of England process, and the American is almost the same organisation as was set up under the Dawes Report. The question comes down, really, to the credit of the country, and the amount of credit a country can stand without inflation. I do not want inflation, but I like elastic credit. We have got to consider even the arrangement that was made recently between the Governor of the Bank of England and the President of the Bank of France. I contend that was a welcome arrangement, because it meant closing up the War debts between the Bank of England and the Bank of France, but the position affected our credit very considerably. After the arrangement had been made, France purchased about £11,000,000 of gold from ourselves or the United States of America, and that affected our credit. Anybody who watches the price of Treasury Bills will know that the price went up about 10s. after France started to purchase gold in this country. In regard to the United States of America, when severe depression was experienced there in 1921, and there were a large number of unemployed, I understand that a certain amount more gold was used, and eventually that gold gave more credit and work and employment expanded into the United States. Employment was found for the men and women who had been out of work. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh, I think there is a matter for inquiry, especially as Mr. McKennar, the Chairman of the Midland Bank, differs from Mr. Goodenough, the Chairman of Barclay's Bank. Both these gentlemen are men of experience in regard to matters of credit, the fiduciary note issue, and technical subjects like that, and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will set up a Committee to go into this technical subject.

I will leave this question now, however, because I feel it is almost too technical to debate in Committee here, and turn to a few questions in regard to this Estimate. First of all, I notice that the Advisory Committee under the Trade Facilities Act expended £5,736. The total amount allowed by the House of Commons for trade facilities was £75,000,000; according to the last White Paper the actual amount was £74,251,000, and that will be gradually reduced. I note that there are nine officials attached to that department of the Treasury, and that the legal expenses are £4,500. Why are these legal expenses necessary? What are the losses in connection with the Trade Facilities Act? What is the position of the Newfoundland Paper and Power Company? How is the large amount of £9,500 representing appropriations-in-aid made up? I should very much appreciate it if, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Financial Secretary comes to reply, he will give me a few more details with regard to this Trade Facilities Act.

I come next to the offices of the Cabinet Committee, the Imperial Defence Committee and Civil Research. These three departments are lumped in one as far as the details are concerned. The total amount of expenditure is £18,679, with 42 officials. I am unable to gather how many officials are attached to the Committee of Imperial Defence, but I remember hearing a speech made in another place by Lord Oxford and Asquith on the 22nd March, 1927, in regard to national expenditure, and he stated as follows:

"I refreshed my memory to-day as to what was the staff of the Committee of Imperial Defence. When I was first actively concerned in it, 1906-7, the staff consisted of one secretary, two assistant secretaries, one confidential clerk, and one boy. Four men and a boy was the total staff of the Committee of Imperial Defence who were engaged in thinking and planning and performing all these functions which my noble Friend so eloquently described. I have the figures now for 1913—seven years later, and the year before the War broke out. In 1913 the staff had reached the following dimensions: One Secretary, three assistant-secretaries instead of two, one confidential clerk, one military clerk, one assistant-clerk (who may have been the boy who by this time had grown up). In other words, we started with four men and a boy and we finished up with a staff of seven."

That was the view of Lord Oxford and Asquith. Perhaps my right hon. Friend could state how many officials are now attached to the Committee of Imperial Defence, and perhaps he would kindly give to the Committee the actual staff attached to the Treasury on the 31st March, 1914, and the cost of that staff. I would appreciate very much a reply to these questions in due course, and I feel confident that if an inquiry could be set up as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. Graham) it would be an asset, and a good thing for this country.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I desire to associate myself with the proposals which have been put forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh. With regard to the second question which he raised, I wish to put forward the matter from a slightly different angle. Recent experience of this country has shown how dependent we are upon movements abroad with regard to our credit and our financial position. It is only a few weeks since there was a considerable flutter in the money market when it was known that several millions of gold were being withdrawn from this country. This incident was described by the hon. Member for Ilford (Sir F. Wise). The bank rate, instead of falling, remained stationary, and conditions generally became more stringent. As a result any fillip that might have been given to business with the season tended not to come into being, business became stagnant, and trade and industry generally were handicapped in a way that always occurs when something in the way of deflation takes place.

When the mystery came to be revealed and it was found that the reason for this withdrawal of gold was due to the French Government, to some extent the feeling of anxiety was checked. But I would suggest that so far from being a relief, the business and the banking world ought to have felt even greater apprehension because in my view it is not actually what was done, but the potentiality of what might be done that gave the greatest alarm. I understand that the French Government have in this country balances of over £100,000,000 sterling. Whether that be right, or an exaggeration I do not know, but at any rate they have a very considerable amount and, of course it is open to them at any time to withdraw a considerable part, if not the whole, in the form of gold. That case does not stand alone. All over the continent of Europe and other parts of the world, there are countries which are considering the obtaining of a larger amount of the yellow metal. Only recently India has determined, in effect, to go upon the gold basis, and although the Government of that country have not decided to obtain a large stock of gold up to the present, they may any day come to a decision that they desire a large gold reserve. What is true of India is also true of other countries.

[Mr. Pethick-Lawrence.]

This is an exceedingly serious problem, more particularly for this country, which is so dependent upon exports, and therefore upon some price level which can remain stable and can be relied upon. In this connection I am reminded of the case of Egypt. It is essential to the people of Egypt that the River Nile should keep up a certain level and in consequence of that the Egyptian people recognise that they must at all costs preserve a reasonable flow of water in the Nile. I remember not long ago when there was some question in this House of threatening the Egyptian people with a loss of water supply it became a matter of first-class importance. At once the Egyptian people proceeded to take action to obtain assurances that that threat would not be carried into effect. In this country the very life-blood of trade and commerce depends upon maintaining a stable level in prices which depend upon the quantity and the flow of gold. That is essential to trade, and if the unemployment problem from which we are suffering at the present time is to be remedied, it is essential that we should get control of these supplies of gold.

In the days before the War this country was the world centre of finance, and the financial policy adopted here was the one which ruled throughout the world, and we had our own say in the matter. The situation, however, has changed since the War, and now we cannot control the whole situation ourselves. While going all the distance which my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh has outlined, I should like to go one step further, and I ask the Government what steps they are proposing to take to rationalise the supply of gold. When I say "the supply," I do not mean the production of gold, but I mean the supply in the various countries. When I use the term "rationalise," I do not mean to ration, but I use the word in the sense it was used at the Economic Conference at Geneva. There it was pointed out that to secure world production for the benefit of the peoples of the world, it was necessary to rationalise industry, and in the same way I suggest it is necessary for all countries, and particularly for this country, to rationalise the supply of gold.

It will be remembered that several years ago at the Financial Conference which was held at Genoa it was proposed that the Bank of England should organise a conference of the central banks of the world, and that at that conference should be discussed the best method of doing what I now call rationalising the supplies of gold with a view not merely to stabilising the exchange, but to stabilising the level of prices throughout the world. I suggest that the time has come, in fact it is much overdue, when that conference, for which a desire was expressed several years ago at Genoa, should now be brought into operation. It is possible that in answering this point the Government will say that such a conference is, in fact, actually proceeding, because to-day in New York, I understand, there is a conference of representatives of the banking systems of the United States, France, Germany, and of this country, meeting in conclave on this very question. But, in my view, that private and unofficial conference is not adequate because it is not representative of all the principal countries in the world, and more especially it is not adequate because it is purely private. I agree it may be desirable that we should have some private preliminary conference, but it is of the utmost importance that you should follow that up by a public official conference in order that these problems may not only be discussed, but that the findings, and the main grounds for them, should become public property so that the agreements which have been reached—it may be originally in private conferences—may ultimately be put into concrete and public form, so as to be available when the time comes.

I desire to raise one other point besides those which have been raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh. I wish to refer to the method of keeping some of the accounts in relation to the Sinking Fund. The Sinking Fund is a highly technical proceeding which the general public have an idea is of a fairly simple character. The general public are of the opinion that the Sinking Fund is the amount by which the National Debt is reduced each year, that is to say, the amount by which the liabilities of this country are discharged. I have known even financial experts in this House who took that view. For example, some £40,000,000 was paid to the Sinking Fund last year and people are of the opinion that the National Debt of this country was discharged to the extent of £40,000,000 last year.

Sir F. WISE: The amount was £23,000,000.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: Yes, I am wrong, the amount was £23,000,000. The impression that the whole of that went to the discharge of the liabilities under the Sinking Fund is entirely erroneous. The actual fact is that for many reasons it was far less. We have in the first place various specific Sinking Funds, and in recent years the number of these Funds has increased. If hon. Members refer to the Return issued by the Treasury, it will be found that some £40,000,000 or so are specific Sinking Funds, and the balance is nominally paid for the discharge of general debt.

In the old days when Sinking Funds were first introduced, the idea was prevalent that all you had to do was to create a Sinking Fund and that automatically proved beneficial, although at the same time you created new debts to an even greater extent than the Sinking Fund you put on. I think that idea has been exploded in theory, but to some extent in practice it lingers on; for last year in particular, in spite of the Treasury Returns, this balance was certainly not available for a general reduction of debt, for a far larger amount of new debt was created to take its place. I am quite prepared to admit that it would not be possible to make a Sinking Fund which exactly accorded with the public belief so long as—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member's argument, but I am not quite sure whether he is not now criticising the various Statutes which establish the Sinking Fund. I should like to know whether that is so, or whether what he is criticising has something to do with the administrative discretion of the Treasury.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I was leading up to that in a few moments, and I think you will find that I am entirely in order, for I propose to deal with the form of certain items which are included in the Treasury figures. I am not criticising the way in which the Sinking Fund is administered, but a certain method of accounting which is producing the wrong impression as to what the Sinking Fund actually is. I was proceeding to say that it would not be possible to get a Sinking Fund which exactly accorded with the public idea of a Sinking Fund unless you were entirely to change the whole method of keeping accounts in this country, and to substitute for the receipts and payments accounts which we have at the present time, a system which would correspond more nearly to a balance sheet and a profit and loss account. I do not deny that there might be certain advantages in that, but I think the disadvantages would be far greater. I think, however, that it would be possible within our present method of receipts and payments to bring the Sinking Fund much more nearly into line with popular interpretation. Leaving the matter of fresh borrowing for fresh objects definitely outside, there are three matters in which it seems to me that our present method of dealing with accounts is undesirable. In the first place, there is the question of the ideal which we ought to be set before ourselves of keeping the total face value of the debt as near as possible in correspondence with the amounts claimable on redemption. The standard case where that proposition is not observed is that of the Five per Cent. War Bonds redeemable at 105. The face value that attains now, instead of being the amount of redemption of 105, is 100, and that leads to a considerable error in the total value of the debt. The procedure is this. Supposing the stock were issued at 95, redeemable at 100, it would appear in our account of debt as 100 and the 5 per cent. premium on repayment would be shown properly in the account. As, however, it is issued at 100, redeemable at 105, it still only appears at 100, the whole amount of redemption not being shown in any way in the account. In that way, at the present time, the position of the country is rendered in the account more favourable than it actually is to the amount of £20,000,000.

[Mr. Pethick-Lawrence.]

The next point to which I want to draw attention is I think in some ways of still more importance. That is the matter of the Savings Certificates. I think it is highly important that the interest which is actually debited in the year ought to correspond as nearly as possible with the interest accruing in the year, but when you come to the Savings Certificates that is not at all the case. Let me first of all quote figures. The estimate of interest which is going to be charged to this country during the year 1927-1928, on account of Savings Certificates, is about £9,000,000. The estimate of the actual interest that will accrue upon outstanding Savings Certificates during the year is as much as £24,000,000, so that there is a discrepancy of no less than £15,000,000 between the two amounts. In the previous year the amount estimated was £7,000,000. The amount actually spent was £12,000,000, and the amount accruing was probably not far short of £24,000,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget speech, made special play of the fact that the amount expended, £12,000,000, on this account, was considerably in excess of the amount that had been estimated of £7,000,000, and yet even the full amount spent was in fact millions below the amount that actually accrued. The reason for this discrepancy is as follows: The amount which is actually debited against the interest, is the amount of interest on these Savings Certificates which are paid off during the year, that is to say, only those Savings Certificates which are cashed come into the account at all, and in some the interest is for one year, in some for five years, some for 10 years or possibly more; whereas the actual amount that accrues is one year's interest on the whole Savings Certificates outstanding. Of course I know that if the Savings Certificates were a constant amount, and if roughly the same number were being bought each year as were paid off, the discrepancy would not be very great, but, as the amount of Savings Certificates is rapidly increasing, we are constantly debiting ourselves with far smaller amounts of interest than actually accrue during the year. If the holding of Savings Certificates increased and a very considerable part of our National Debt took the form, as it well may, in years to come, of National Savings Certificates, we should be living entirely in a fool's paradise in this matter. In one of the Debates, either in Committee or on the Floor of the House, I had the good fortune to have the presence of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. E. C. Grenfell) when speaking on this point, and I am glad to say that he entirely agreed with me. He suggested that there should be an increase of the Sinking Fund to the amount of £10,000,000 to meet this matter. I do not suggest that now, because I should be out of order in doing so, but I do want to point out that our method of keeping accounts in this matter is not a very satisfactory one. It is not easy I know to arrive at a satisfactory method, although I think a more desirable method could be found. For instance, whereas a Savings Certificate is now bought for 16s., I do not think it unreasonable if it was put down at 20s. from the time it was bought. In much the same way as a Treasury bill would be handled. If it were done in that way here you would get something much more near to the correct amount than is done at present. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may not think that a good plan, but I hope he will, at any rate, consider whether some other method could be adopted which would correspond more nearly to the actual facts as to the amount of interest really accruing than is done at the present time.

I have taken up a great deal of time over this, and I, therefore, will not deal at any length with my third point. It is the issue of loans at a discount, and I am very pleased to see that it met with the strong condemnation of both the Majority and the Minority Reports of the Colwyn Committee. I hope the Treasury will very seriously consider rigidly refusing to adopt this method of issuing loans in the future.

To sum up what I have been trying to say. On the first point, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury have been asked to take steps to rationalise the gold supply of the world. I would like to go a little further than my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham), who has asked them to set up a Committee to consider the management of the gold of this country. I want them, in addition, either to call this year, or to get the Bank of England to call, a world conference to consider steps to rationalise the gold supply of the world. Secondly, I want them to take steps to alter the accounting so that the Sinking Fund shall be brought more nearly into accord with the idea of a Sinking Fund in the minds of the business men of this country.

Sir JOHN MARRIOTT: Before I say a very few words in regard to the question which has been raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham) I would like to say, in a single word in passing, that I am very cordially in agreement with the views just expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) in regard to the accounting of Savings Certificates. I do not want to make more than a passing reference to that question, but, if I may be respectfully allowed to say so, I think he has raised a point of very considerable accounting importance, and I would like to associate myself with what he has just said. In regard to the questions raised by my right hon. Friend who opened this Debate, I would say, on behalf of myself and, I think, of other Members on this side of the Committee, that we are exceedingly grateful to him, not for the first time by any means, for raising a question of great public importance on a financial Debate. The questions which he raised, as I understand them, were mainly two. He raised certain very important questions in regard to the personnel and the management in internal administration of the Civil Service. He raised another very important question in regard to our whole currency position, and more particularly in regard to the gold position in relation to the credit of the country. I desire to say a very few words on those two topics, and to ask one or two questions on another topic in which I, myself, am interested in relation to Treasury administration.

First of all, in regard to the Civil Service, I wish to associate myself to the full with the very cordial tribute which my right hon. Friend paid to the higher officials of the Civil Service. I suppose there is no other present Member of the House who as a Member of the House has had a wider or a larger experience than I myself have had of contact with the heads of the permanent Civil Service. As Chairman for some years of the Estimates Committee, as a member of that Committee for more years than I like to remember, and as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I have a very full sense of the way in which the higher officials of the Civil Service conduct their duties. I join with my right hon. Friend in paying a very great cordial tribute of admiration for the very high qualities which those public servants possess. But, apart from this tribute of admiration, my right hon. Friend raised a question with which I do not know that I am in quite such cordial agreement. He raised the whole question, incidentally, it may be, of the leakage of the Civil Service, that is to say, of a tendency which he thought he discerned for some of the more prominent members of that great Service to find occupations outside the Service, and he, very naturally, inquired what the reason for that might be. As far as my own experience is concerned, I should be inclined to say that the danger of that leakage is not very great. I know that from time to time, as, of course, has recently been the case, resignations take place which are of palpable disadvantage to the public service. We do, from time to time, lose from the public service servants whom we can ill afford to lose, for reasons which are very intelligible, because they are naturally tempted away by great positions offered to them outside.

I do not, however, feel with my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh that that is really a very general or a very serious danger, and for this good reason, that, as I understand it, the qualities which are demanded of the first-rate civil servant are qualities wholly unlike those which, as a rule, are required in business houses. The man who makes a good civil servant has not, speaking generally, the same calibre of mind, the same quality of mind as the man who is successful in commerce or in business. I quite admit that there are exceptions to that rule, exceptions of which we have had several recent and very palpable illustrations; but I do not share the apprehension, if it be an apprehension, on the part of my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh, that that is likely to be a danger which we need very seriously contemplate in the future. I should like to add this word, that I most sincerely desire that the qualities which are demanded of our civil servants should be different in kind from those which are demanded in our business houses, for, if there is one thing on which I am more keen than on almost anything else, it is that the Civil Service should not be involved in business undertakings, and that, therefore, those upon whom the Government rely as principal servants should not be people of the qualities which are required in business houses. My right hon. Friend went on to develop a question which is, if possible, of even greater importance. I refer to the whole currency position—the gold position. I am not going to involve myself so deeply as any of my hon. Friends who have spoken this afternoon in that most difficult of all questions—

[Sir J. Marriott.]

Sir F. WISE: Do not be afraid!

Sir J. MARRIOTT: I am afraid. I remember the warning that, apart from love, there is nothing which has driven so many people into lunatic asylums as currency problems, and I have no desire to go into one of those asylums before my time. Therefore, I am not going as deeply as my hon. Friends have gone into that very controversial question, but I should like to say just one or two words, particularly on the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford (Sir F. Wise). He referred to the whole problem of the currency mainly in its relation to the credit of the country. I want to associate myself to the fullest possible extent with what he said on that point primarily, because everybody knows that there is no problem which must be engaging every day the attention of the Treasury so seriously as the problem of credit and of the maturities which are really, if we come to realise it, immediately ahead of us.

Only a month or two hence, in October next, we shall be involved in maturities of £112,000,000 for 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. War Bonds. Then, six months later, in March, 1928, the Treasury will have to face £66,000,000 of repayments of 3½ per cent. War Loan and 4½ per cent. Treasury Bonds. In the course of the summer of next year, 1928, no less a sum than £443,000,000 will come up for repayment for 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. National War Bonds. In the course of the following year, 1929, the Treasury will have to face repayments amounting to £46,000,000; and so on. That is a very short statement of the facts in regard to the immediate maturities ahead of us, and, in the face of these imminent maturities, I regard this problem of currency as a super-eminent importance. Therefore, I am exceedingly grateful, and I think the whole House and the whole country should be grateful, to the right hon. Gentleman who acts as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, for bringing the matter to the attention of the House of Commons this afternoon, and I desire, with him and with my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, to press for the appointment of the Committee to which he refers.

In saying that, I want to guard myself against expressing perfect agreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford on the question which is at issue between two such eminent bankers as Mr. Goodenough and Mr. McKenna. Far be it from me to decide between two prophets of such eminence, but I will frankly confess that my own Conservative disposition is rather on the side of Mr. Goodenough than on the side of Mr. McKenna. I am sorry to disagree even to that extent—I very rarely do disagree—with my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford; but he must be satisfied, and I hope he will be satisfied, if I associate myself with him in pressing for the appointment of this Committee, because, after all, we want to ascertain, and we want the public to be informed of, the opinion of an expert committee on a question of this first-rate importance. I am, myself, a little apprehensive of getting on to the slippery slope of inflation. I know that the word "inflation" is one which is capable of many interpretations. On none of those interpretations am I going to venture this afternoon, but I am a little apprehensive of anything in the nature of artificial credit. Still,

I do not want to press that view too strongly this afternoon. My hon. Friend and I have been going into the matter together recently in some detail, and, although we do not see entirely eye to eye on the question which is at issue between these two eminent bankers, we are completely in accord in pressing upon the Government the importance of the appointment of the Committee to which the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee referred earlier this afternoon.

There is only one other point on which I should like to hear a word from my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. I do not make it by way of criticism, but I would like a word of information in regard to the expenditure for which the Treasury is responsible under Sub-head G.1 of Vote 4. I refer to the expenditure of £15,250 a year on the War Histories. I make no criticism of that, but I should like to ask the Financial Secretary whether some reduction of that staff is not possible, and whether some amalgamation or distribution of the work performed by it would not be possible. We have, as probably the Committee are aware, an exceedingly competent librarian at the Foreign Office—himself an historian of no mean distinction—who, I should have thought, might have been able to add to his duties, though these are not light at present, some of those which are performed by members of the staff in question. I do not know—my right hon. Friend will be able to tell me—whether that staff does draw upon the assistance of any of the other permanent civil servants, such as the librarians of the great offices, and particularly the librarian of the Foreign Office, but I want to put my question in a rather more general form. I want to ask my right hon. Friend whether there is any possibility of redistributing this work, possibly among other Government offices, or, possibly, among members of the Universities. There will be many research students at the Universities who, I think would probably be more than disposed to perform a good many of these services without any gratuity from the State at all, but simply in return for the facilities which they would obtain from the State for research into matters in which they are themselves historically interested. I throw that out as a suggestion. The sum involved is not a very large one, but I should like to have some information from my right hon. Friend on that point.

Mr. GILLETT: I should like, in the first place, to support the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) on the question of the Sinking Fund. When the matter came before the Public Accounts Committee recently, I asked Sir Otto Niemeyer a few questions on the principle underlying the system that is now followed, and I confess that the answers I received only showed how much more complicated the question is than I thought. For one thing, Sir Otto Niemeyer informed me that, in the case of War Savings Certificates, the increase to which my hon. Friend referred, and which, it seems to me, might very well have been looked upon as capital expenditure, is looked upon as interest. On the other hand, I take it that, if stock is issued at 80 and is repayable at 100, that appears in the books of the Exchequer at par, and the difference between the 80 and the 100 is looked upon as capital expenditure. When we compare these two cases, there does not really seem to be any reason why the Treasury should deal with War Savings Certificates in a different way from stock issued at under par. On the other hand, I understand that there were certain cases during the War in which stocks were issued repayable at 105, and, speaking from memory—I did not know that my hon. Friend was going to raise this point—I think that those stocks are also treated as if they were repayable at 100. Here, therefore, we have a case in which we talk about the debt as being only 100, when some day the nation will have to repay it at 105. I think it is obvious that this is a question which might very well be looked into, and in regard to which we might urge upon the Treasury the desirability of seeing whether it is not possible to get figures more closely approximating to the exact amount of the liability that the nation has at present to meet.

I want also to support the appeal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham) for the appointment of a committee to consider the question brought forward by Mr. McKenna, and I should like to express the hope that, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for West Leicester, if a committee is appointed the scope of it will be enlarged to include the world's supply of gold. I venture to speak on this subject in spite of the warning issued to us by the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) that there is danger of lunacy in considering these questions. The fewness of the number of Members present induces me to go forward, as the danger incurred will be so limited, even if we do consider the subject for a short time. The proposal made by my right hon. Friend to-day is much more important, and might have more far-reaching effects upon the well-being of the country than many of the points over which we are going shortly to spend a good deal of time in considering the Finance Bill. For instance, the point Mr. McKenna has raised is infinitely more important than whether we are going to impose a small duty on lace, or many other questions which excite interest and enthusiasm in the House. I suppose no man in the country has had such a unique experience as Mr. McKenna. It is true we have other chairmen of big banks, but none of them has had the experience of national finance that Mr. McKenna has had, and the danger of the city outlook is that your city financier looks on this matter purely from what might be termed the financial standpoint, whilst really there are always other interests that have to be considered. Anyone who has occupied the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer can never go back to quite the same outlook on finance as the man who has spent the whole of his life in the City looking at his problems only from the financial standpoint. Therefore, it seems to me this House is fully justified in considering very carefully the proposal made by my right hon. Friend.

[Mr. Gillett.]

The hon. Member for York said he had a great fear of inflation, and we are justified in having that fear, but I think we ought also to bear in mind the other side of the question. I take it that while Mr. McKenna suggested that there might be a danger of inflation, what he is afraid of is, whether at the present time we are not actually doing the reverse process, and that when industry shows a little progress the financial system that is in force to-day keeps constantly putting the brake upon an expansion which might otherwise take place. Mr. McKenna bases his argument on the experience of the United States, where the deposits in the banks from 1922 to 1926 have increased by something like £800,000,000, while in this country there was actually a decrease of over £100,000,000. Mr. McKenna asks whether there is anything in our banking system that is having a deleterious effect upon our industry to-day. He also suggests that the federal reserve system of America lends itself more easily to providing the necessary credit than does the system in vogue in this country. The American system does not require such a large amount of gold backing for their notes. Any extension of the note issue of the Bank of England is followed up by providing the same amount of gold, but in the United States all that is required is 40 per cent. of gold behind the federal note issue, and there is even a margin allowed so that if at any time a bank has not placed the requisite amount of gold behind the issue of notes, instead of the increase being prevented, the bank is allowed to pay a certain percentage of interest upon the amount of notes that have been issued beyond the 40 per cent., and in that way there is an expansion of notes upon a scale easier and simpler than we have at present in connection with our own banking system.

The other point on which, I think, the American system differs from ours is that the facilities the banks have of discounting their bills make it easier for them to obtain money for trade. Mr. McKenna's plea for the revision of our system has been opposed by Mr. Goodenough, who holds an equally important position. I should not wish to say which I think is right of these two distinguished bankers, but I think the Chancellor would be doing a great disservice to the City if he decides that the investigation should not take place. Having some connection with the City, I would much sooner have the whole matter investigated than simply say it is not desirable to look into a matter which is arousing a good deal of public interest. People naturally say bankers do not desire to have the system looked into because they are doing very well out of it themselves and do not wish to see it altered. It seems to me the banking position is much stronger if you say you are quite prepared to have the whole matter investigated. In the religious world we have great churches which have propounded religious beliefs, and when some heretic has come forward and urged that a principle of their religion was false, the churches in the past have taken refuge in saying it is not desirable to consider it, but all the same the heretics have gone forward and in time it has been perhaps discovered that these principles were false. Therefore, I hope the Chancellor will not think the banking world is anxious to hide itself behind the formula "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," but will be willing to test these principles, because nothing is going to suffer in the religious or the financial world if the principles on which we are working are at times tested. I fully agree that when we look at the American position there are one or two extraordinary things connected with it. Of course they have received a large amount of gold which, if it had come into this country, would probably have had the same effect in expanding the deposits in banks as it seems to have had in the United States. If gold came into this country we could have gold inflation. We had it before the War for many years to a small extent, and even the hon. Member for York would probably have no fear about it. Inflation is not always necessarily an evil.

Sir J. MARRIOTT: I should not have any fears about it because it was based on gold.

Mr. GILLETT: And yet the effect upon our industrial system might be just as prejudicial as the creation of a large number of notes. The second reason I think we might have this investigation is that towards the end of this year the position in regard to currency notes will probably be reviewed, and that would seem a suitable time to have the whole question of the banking system reviewed. The "Times," in an article in January, supported the plea, and in February, 1925:

"Mr. BOOTHBY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether His Majesty's Government will take steps to secure the early assembly of an international financial conference to consider the question of putting into operation the Genoa Resolutions on currency and with a view to the establishment, by agreement, of the currency systems of the world upon a sound, economic and stable basis?"

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Genoa Resolutions contemplated a meeting of the central banks as a necessary preliminary to any monetary convention. I hope that the occasion for such a meeting will arise before long; but I do not think the moment is yet opportune."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 24th February, 1925; col. 1735, Vol. 180.]

It is only 2½ years since the right hon. Gentleman gave that answer, and I would suggest to him that possibly the moment has now arrived. One thing in connection with the American position which has not been referred to is the instalment buying that is going on in that country—what we should call, I suppose, the hire-purchase system. I understand nothing like it has been seen in this country, or I suppose in any country in the world. It seems to me it must have some effect upon the financial position, but whether it means any kind of inflation of credit, I do not know.

There is another point on which I want to lay stress. I desire to appeal to the Government for some statement in regard to the gold position. We have had the recent French withdrawal of gold from London. The policy of the French Government is one of the most amazing things we have seen. Many nations are thinking what a great thing it would be if only they could get back their currency to the old standard, but the French Government are deliberately preventing speculators, whose policy would be to force back the value of the franc nearer and nearer to the old pre-War standard. I understand the £100,000,000 that the French Government are holding in this country, and in New York, is the result of their determination not to allow the franc to alter its position.

We have returned to the gold standard on the supposition that other nations, if I may so put it, were going to play the game. The success of the gold standard depends on certain well-known and well-laid-down principles. You do not expect that a country is going to take gold from the bank in this country unless the exchange is in their favour. Then you come face to face with this emergency. The Bank of France suddenly buys gold from the Bank of England and the whole of the money market in this country is altered prejudicially as far as we are concerned. We find, that instead of the Bank of England rate going down, as was hoped, the rate for discount goes up.

[Mr. Gillett.]

It has already, I suppose, cost the Chancellor of the Exchequer between £200,000 and £300,000 more in regard to the increase in the price of Treasury bills, and, at the same time, the public have been deprived of what would have been the advantage of cheaper money if the bank rate had actually gone down. That is all due to the decision of the French people.

What the City would like to know is, whether this withdrawal of gold was carried out with the knowledge of the English Government, and, if not, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made any representations to the French Government, pointing out how very detrimental this action has been to the money market on this side and the effect it is having upon us. The serious point, it seems to me, in connection with this matter is this. Supposing the French Government had said, "Our needs are so great that we must have the gold. I must buy your gold. I am going to buy it, cost what it may," the whole of the gold standard in this country might be endangered. This case is largely governed by very special needs quite outside the ordinary rules governing the position of the money market. I shall be glad if the Chancellor of the Exchequer can say whether anything has been done by the Government or whether any negotiations have taken place between the English and the French Governments.

I think there is every justification for the plea made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Leicester that the whole of the gold position should be very carefully considered. It may be that the central banks are considering the question to-day, but, as is said in the City of London, all these questions are wrapped in such a veil of mystery that we are never allowed to know anything. The only thing we know is, that all of a sudden something has taken place, and we go on wondering what the great gods of finance are doing, and why Mr. So-and-So has gone to New York, and why Mr. So-and-So has gone to Paris. That is all the information the money market is allowed. Professor Cassel has drawn attention to this question and quoted figures, which appeared in the "Times" recently, in which it was estimated that the gold supplies of the world after 1929 would be about £5,000,000 less per annum than they have been previously. It is needless to point out to the Committee what effect that would have upon this country. We talk about all these very strange, complicated questions, as has been indicated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for York, as being exceedingly difficult, and yet, at the same time, they have a profound effect upon the well-being of our people.

I am not discussing at this moment whether the policy of deflation was bad or good, but there is no doubt whatever that it led to a large increase of unemployment in this country. There is no doubt that that is the reason which is inducing the French Government to take the line they are taking. They are not prepared to face the amount of unemployment and the effect upon their trade that such a policy would have. It seems to me that this is a matter on which we might be entitled to have a statement from the Government, telling us exactly what their policy is, first as regards the points raised by Mr. McKenna regarding the banking system of this country and, in the second place, as regards the whole question of gold and the relations of this country to the great central banks. You may say that the Bank of England is a private institution. We know perfectly well that the connection between the Bank of England and the Treasury is so close that we cannot imagine that any great policy dealing with the gold question would really be carried out by the Bank of England without consultation taking place between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the officials of the Treasury. Therefore, I think, the Committee is justified in asking for a statement from the Government. The question of how far we are going to get a really satisfactory banking system is more important than almost any other financial question, and we must be assured that, having now returned to the gold standard, the system of working it, which is necessary to secure success, is going to be followed out as in the days before the War.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I must apologise to the Committee for not having been able to be present during the whole of this Debate—I was compelled to absent myself on public business—and ask the indulgence of the Committee. I will endeavour to answer, as briefly as possible, some, at any rate, of the numerous, interesting, and speculative questions, some of a very large and general character, which have been raised in different parts of the Committee. I will deal, first of all, with the specific question raised by the late Financial Secretary to the Treasury. He commented upon a series of appointments of high officials in the various Departments of State, particularly in the Treasury, which were announced a few weeks ago. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to me—although, I admit, he did not state his case with any extreme rigidity—to be arguing in favour of a departmental system of promotion as against the system of selection which is the one which, for some time past, has been adopted. One must ask oneself two questions. First of all, “Do you challenge the principle of selection?” Secondly, “If you do not challenge the principle of selection, has it been applied wisely and fairly in recent instances?” I cannot conceive how any effective challenge can be made to the principle of selection.

I remember the late Lord Fisher used to deride the system of promotion by departmental seniority, and described it as a doctrine of “It is Buggins’s turn.” Ever since 1855, when the Civil Service was unified, the principle of selection for the higher appointments has been increasingly applied, and there are at the present moment, I think, only five Departments which are actually headed by civil servants who have risen from that particular Department. Long before the last batch of appointments was made, this principle of choosing at any given moment the best men for these very responsible posts had been extensively applied. Really, I think, it is no use arguing that this course acts harshly. After all, even in the case of the humble battalion, where the importance of the functions in time of peace, at any rate, cannot be compared with those of these Departments, there has not, certainly during the present century, been a commander of a battalion or second in command appointed except by selection, and by selection not confined necessarily to that battalion. If in a small organism like that discharging functions which, however honourable, are so moderate in their status, you are going to enforce the system of selection in the interests of efficiency, then I say a fortiori in the case of these great departmental organisations of the State it must be applied in all its force.

Let us see whether the selection has been fair and wise. No one has greater interest than the Government of the day in making a wise choice, because it directly affects the success of the various Ministers at the heads of Departments. The right hon. Gentleman, who has been in office himself, knows the valuable character of the services which are rendered to the political heads of Departments by the highly trained and able permanent officials. Criticism has been made that the Secretary to the Treasury, with some small group of civil servants, has some dominating power in the matter. That is a delusion. The duty of the Secretary to the Treasury, among other duties, is to advise the Prime Minister upon the high appointments and the headships of the Departments. For that purpose he takes a general view of the service as a whole, and it is obvious that some mechanism for taking such a general view of the service as a whole and of the competing claims of different men in different Departments is an essential part of the functions of government. But the Secretary to the Treasury makes representations to the Prime Minister in many cases. The Prime Minister, as the First Lord of the Treasury, naturally consults with the Second Lord of the Treasury, who is the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and ministerial opinion is what rules in these matters.

The Prime Minister has been in office for the greater part of the last eight years with a very brief exception, and I have been in office for a long time, and we are perfectly capable of forming our opinion on the honest and faithful advice we received from the Secretary to the Treasury on the matter. We desire to give the greatest possible assistance to the Ministers concerned. Of course, it is quite true the departure of distinguished civil servants to outside employment weakens us for the time being, and I shall certainly not say anything to diminish the seriousness of the loss which we have for the time being sustained by the departure of a man of such altogether outstanding abilities as Sir Otto Niemeyer, but, nevertheless, experience shows that the ability of the British Civil Service rebuilds the gaps which are made from time to time. Although we have had of recent years a stream of very able men passing from the Civil Service, I think, nevertheless, the quality of the Service has been maintained.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The right hon. Gentleman also criticised the departmental arrangements at the Treasury, which have been made incidental to the present changes, and, in particular, the union under one head of the Controllershships of Finance and Supply; and he explained, quite correctly, the enormous importance of the duties of both these great departments. He asked how it would be possible for any one man, however able—and certainly it is a matter of common agreement that the officer appointed is one of the ablest servants under the Crown—could discharge all the admittedly difficult and technical duties of these two Departments. I should like to point out that when an officer is placed at the head of two Departments, and they both report through him to the Minister, the position of the heads of each of those Departments under that joint supervisor is by that very fact, in practice, considerably enhanced. Highly trained and experienced officers are at the heads of both these branches, neither of whom would at this moment have been a competitor for the undivided control of either of these Departments, and these officers will have a wider sphere and more direct action open to them than would be the case had one head been provided for each of the Departments. We have taken advantage of these changes to reduce by one the number of higher posts at the Treasury. One of the £3,000 a year posts has been obliterated by the changes which we have made. Naturally, that causes heartburning and is not the most agreeable course which could be taken, but we at the Treasury are sometimes criticised for the number of high posts which exist there. We are continually engaged in urging economy upon all the other Departments, and, seeing the possibility of making this curtailment or abridgement, I felt it my duty to recommend that the Treasury should set an example in this respect. As usual, the moment any steps, small or large, is taken for economy, it finds most able objectors in every quarter of the House of Commons.

I do not say that this union of the Finance and Supply Branches will necessarily be the final form of reorganisation. It might well be that a better grouping would be achieved if Supply and Establishments were joined together, and if Finance remained an entirely separate Department. That is a matter which we can examine later on, and the opportunity for making a change of that character was not open at the time. I think I have answered, or at any rate replied to, the different points which were raised on this subject by the right hon. Gentleman, and I hope to convince him, not by argument alone, but by proof which will emerge from Session to Session that the administration will have suffered no undue disadvantage from the changes which circumstances have enforced.

I now turn to what was described as the more important part of this discussion, namely, that relating to the general currency policy of Great Britain. Certainly, no topic can claim to be more important than that. I agree with all that was said on this point by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Gillett). The currency policy of this country, or of any country, lies among the roots of its commercial and industrial prosperity, and of its social and economic well-being. I agree with him that it is very right and proper that the House of Commons should from time to time turn its attention to these matters. I agree with him also that it might well turn its attention to this question in preference to many of the quite minor issues which occupy so much of our Parliamentary time. The House of Commons is the master of its own fortunes in these matters and the number of days given to the discussion of finance in the course of the year is very large. I certainly do not complain that on one of those days, extremely complicated matters of such deep and pregnant importance should have been touched upon. Nevertheless, I am sure that the subject cannot be adequately dealt with in the course of a single speech or a single afternoon's Debate, and I shall not attempt to deal with these matters, except incidentally as suggested by some of the points which have been raised.

I must point out at the very outset of any reference to this subject, that you must pursue a clear, plain, unswerving policy in your finance; you must know what that policy is and stand by it. A great many people try to get all the advantage of orthodoxy, and at the same time to take all the small points which would occur to those who indulge in the luxury of heterodox opinions. Of course they are in favour of the gold standard. They say, "We are opposed to anything in the nature of inflation but at the same time, something might be done to free us from the tyrannical domination of gold, and to make just a little upward movement of prices, or to advance credit a little more than the economic realities warrant." Then they proceed, in illustration, to point to all kinds of admitted hardships and disadvantages which we encounter in our journey through this wicked world. The policy of the Government is perfectly plain and simple. Our policy, like that of every other Government, or every other set of Ministers who have been responsible, has been the re-establishment of the gold standard, and the maintenance, as far as we can, of the stability of the currency and the stability of our international exchange. That policy has carried with it a steady correction to the dispersion of prices of various commodities.

I was going to quote figures to the Committee, but I will not do so this afternoon. I do not wish to enter into detailed argument here, but I would point out that nothing is more important to the well-being of the country than a correct valuation, in terms of money, of different forms of effort—the correct valuation for instance, to be put upon the effort which is required to make a loaf of bread, or a pair of silk stockings, or an ingot of steel, and so on. The spread of prices had been quite wide in the years immediately after the War, and gradually, as we have come into more harmonious and settled conditions of finance, dispersion has diminished.

Mr. WALLHEAD: The home market has remained restricted.

Mr. CHURCHILL: That has nothing whatever to do with the point which I was making. The point I was making was, that whether the home market is restricted or not, the commodities in that market are coming to a truer relation one with the other, and we believe they have been brought into that truer relation as the foreseen and declared result of our adoption of the gold standard with its consequent stabilising effect both upon our money markets and on our exchange. In addition, as part of the policy which we have submitted, there is, of course, the great feature of the diminution in the cost of living, which, expressed in other terms, is an increase in real wages. There has been a substantial diminution in the cost of living and it is going on at the present time, increasing the purchasing power of every household in the country. Such is the main effect on wages of the policy which we have pursued, and which at any rate tends to secure to the wage-earning masses a suitable means by which their wages are related to commodities. I believe if you adhere to that policy you will be acting in accordance with the most skilled advice. I do not believe for one moment that if my hon. Friend were at the head of a committee of advisers to the Government upon this policy, which he does not in principle dispute, he with all his undoubted authority on these questions, could outweigh the mass of very high and weighty financial expert authority which we have at our disposal and by which we have profited, and in following which we have advanced from one point to another.

The reasons for our policy have not been concealed. They have not been imparted to the House of Commons merely in speeches either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by other representatives of the Treasury. When the gold standard was re-established, I issued the Report of the Committee on the Currency and Bank of England Note Issues, which deals with the financial position and which sets forth in authoritative form, the main outlines of the policy which we have pursued. That Report was signed by Lord Bradbury, Mr. Gaspard Farrer, Sir Otto Niemeyer, and Mr. Pigou. There it stands as a perfectly clear explanation of the general position which we adopted. It is quite true that our policy is not the only policy. It is true that there is an alternative policy. There is the orthodox policy and the heterodox policy, and the heterodox policy claims another set of advantages some of which you may readily admit. That is the view put forward by Mr. McKenna and also put forward to some extent, but in a different form, by Mr. Maynard Keynes. I think those are the only two names of eminence in the financial world which can be quoted against the orthodox policy which His Majesty's Government are pursuing. They claim that a managed currency should be established in place of the orthodox gold standard. In one form or another, and in the most seductive terms, they suggest that just a spice of inflation would be advantageous—so long as it is called by some other name. They look forward with favour, as I detected the late Financial Secretary to the Treasury doing this afternoon, to a period of rising prices, artificially produced at the cost of the consumer. I have here written down what the right hon. Gentleman said. I think he said that he would not mind, or he would like to see an increase of prices.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. W. GRAHAM indicated dissent

Mr. CHURCHILL: I should be glad to have a confession of faith from the right hon. Gentleman. Is he, or is he not, a supporter of the gold standard policy? Is he, or is he not, an opponent of the policy of inflation?

Mr. GRAHAM: There need not be the slightest doubt at all on the matter. I am a most enthusiastic supporter of the return to the gold standard, but there is nothing inconsistent with that attitude in supporting the plea made by Mr. McKenna for an inquiry into a comparison between the basis of the banking system in this country and the federal reserve system in the United States.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Let me proceed step by step. I am glad to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman—

Mr. B. SMITH: There was never any doubt about it.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I am entitled to make it quite clear where the right hon. Gentleman stands, and I am glad to hear that, on behalf of the Labour party, he stands definitely for the gold standard, because we have had some lamentable wobbling on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George) and also very different opinions expressed by the hon. Member for Leicester West (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) on that point. As far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, he makes no objection to being, as the phrase is, crucified on a cross of gold. He is now definitely nailed in that position.

If you are going to abandon the orthodox policy of the Government and adopt the policy which is advocated by Mr. McKenna, and in a much cruder way by other people, I agree that other advisers ought to be chosen for the Government. It would be ridiculous to attempt to carry out a policy wholly different in principle from what we are pursuing—with the assent of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—unless it was in the hands of those who thoroughly believed in it. The right hon. Gentleman turned from the general to the particular aspect of the question connected with the difference between the system of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States and the credit system of this country. This was also in the speech of the hon. Member for Finsbury. It is true that Mr. McKenna made a very interesting speech advocating our adoption of the American system. That system involves the adoption of the percentage basis of gold reserve in relation to the note issue. The percentage prescribed after the War in America was 40 per cent., but, of course, it has not been adhered to in practice because the great influx of gold into the United States has carried the gold percentage far above the 40 per cent. level, and it is now in the neighbourhood of 80 per cent.

Sir F. WISE: Germany!

Mr. CHURCHILL: I cannot possibly conduct this argument if I have to reply to every technical and highly-skilful interruption from every hon. Member. I am talking about the United States of America. We have been told that Mr. McKenna advocated that the Federal Reserve system should be adopted here. The Federal Reserve Bank is an American not a German institution, as the hon. Member for Ilford (Sir F. Wise) knows. The American percentage is laid down at 40 per cent., but the actual relationship now is probably in the neighbourhood of 80 per cent. Neither Mr. McKenna nor the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken have ventured to say what would be the result if we should apply a 40 per cent. ratio in this country. The first result would not be an expansion of credit but a sharp contraction of credit, because at the present time the proportion of our gold reserve to our Note issue, including both currency Notes and the Bank of England Note issue, is actually less than the 40 per cent. laid down in the United States, and far less than the figure of 80 per cent. under which they are working at the present time. Consequently, the adoption of Mr. McKenna's proposals, if we adopted the 40 per cent. ratio, would involve an immediate appreciable contraction in the supply of credit.

But there are other reasons which may be urged against our departure from our present system in favour of the American percentage system. If the 40 per cent. ratio of gold to Notes were in working order and actually adopted, the effect of any inflow or outflow of gold would produce an exaggerated result upon the supply of credit. You would have oscillations of a more violent character than you have under the somewhat more practical system which we have adopted. So far from having that beneficent expansion of credit, which is to help industry and trade, you would begin with a positive contraction. In the face of these arguments, which can be extended to far greater lengths and expressed far more forcibly than I could attempt this afternoon, I do not think the speech of a single banker is a sufficient reason for an inquiry into the whole of our banking arrangements. I am quite sure that the balance of authority is overwhelmingly against Mr. McKenna. We have had two bankers mentioned this afternoon, Mr. McKenna and Mr. Goodenough. Mr. McKenna is almost isolated in the very able and very interesting case he puts forward. I cannot see that any case has been established for an inquiry on the arguments he has used or on the fact that an authority so high has put forward the demand. After all, we have had the Cunliffe Committee and the Bradbury Committee, which inquired into the whole of this subject and produced unanimous reports. The advice of these able and scientific authorities is the basis of the financial policy of the Government. I should regret very much to take any step at this time which would indicate that changes in our policy were in contemplation or that we considered the matter an open question. We do not. For good or ill we have taken our course, right or wrong, and in these currency matters it is essential to pursue a course with some consistency and persistency for a certain number of years. It may be that under another dispensation you will review these problems but, as far as this Parliament is concerned, I certainly cannot hold out any expectation that the policy we have declared and followed consistently will be modified in any essential particular.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is labouring under the misfortune of not having heard the whole of the Debate. The point I suggested was not what he would call an heterodox point. It was not an attempt to go back upon the decision of the gold standard, which I recognise is irrevocable. The point I suggested was orthodox, and in accordance with the policy of the country declared at Genoa. I ask is that policy going to be carried out?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I regret that I did not hear the hon. Member's speech for I know he is a very deep, though not always sound, thinker, on these matters, and his speeches are always full of interest and suggestion. I was just coming—and it is my last point—to the question of the Genoa Resolutions and to the gold movements which have recently taken place on the initiative of the Bank of France. The hon. Member who has just sat down asked me particularly about this. It is perfectly true that considerable withdrawals of gold, apart altogether from the gold which was deposited here in connection with the French Debt to the Bank of England, have taken place during the last month, and that these withdrawals of gold have prejudicially affected the money market and the rates at which the Treasury could borrow. It may even be held that they have exercised a deterrent effect upon the reduction of the bank rate and, consequently, on the improvement of trade. In the ordinary course, under the gold standard, the gold which moves is no more than the tip of the index which registers transactions which have taken place in the great economic sphere of the world; but in these particular gold movements we have had withdrawals which have no relation to the balance of trade, but which arose out of a particular monetary policy pursued for the time being by one of our nearest neighbours, and that has produced some embarrassment and inconvenience in our affairs.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The hon. Member asks whether any representations were made by His Majesty's Government to the French Government. This is not a matter in which the Government acts as principal. It is a matter in which the Banks of France and England were principally concerned. Very long, and I am glad to say, very friendly discussions took place between the heads of these two great institutions and, for the present, at any rate, the movements by which we were affected unfavourably have ceased. But these movements most clearly show how important were the Genoa Resolutions which deal with the co-operation between the central banks of the different countries in respect of the use of gold reserves. It is essential to the working of the gold standard system that gold should be used to adjust trade balances and should not be allowed to be dissipated or employed for extraneous purposes unrelated altogether to the economic movements of the day. I regret very much that it has not yet been possible to hold a further conference to carry forward the policy which was indicated as being so necessary at Genoa, but we agree with every word that has been said in favour of developing that policy.

A conference has not yet come within the region of practical politics. The question asked by my hon. Friend two years ago is just as pertinent now as it was then, and the answer which I shall give would be given with even greater sincerity. The urgency has become greater, but at any rate co-operation between the heads of the great banks has increased. At the present time the Governor of the Bank of England and the Governor or Deputy-Governor of the Bank of France are travelling to the United States to see Mr. Strong, of the Federal Reserve Bank, and at the same time the head of the Reichsbank, Dr. Schacht, is also travelling, I think in the same ship. So you will have, for the first time in this intimate manner the highest financial authority in Germany, in France, in Great Britain and in the United States, in amicable consultation and co-operation. I cannot doubt that the difficult topics we have touched upon this afternoon will be among those which will be illuminated by the discussion which will take place, but it would be altogether premature for us to enter upon, and I have no warrant for laying down, what results we may expect from those consultations.

Mr. WALLHEAD: I rise for the purpose of supporting the idea of a Committee of Inquiry. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given us his particular point of view. He rests himself upon the fact that in the past there have been various Committees of Inquiry set up, and upon the findings of those Committees he now bases the Government's policy. It is fair to assume, from the reports of the various Committees, that rather different results were anticipated from the policy then put forward. I cannot believe that the various Committees, in putting forward their reports, visualised the deplorable condition of our trade and industry as we now find it, or imagined for a moment that conditions of so difficult a character, which began in 1920, could have persisted up to now. We have tried all the recommendations that have been made. The Cunliffe Committee reported in favour of the policy of deflation which has been followed up to now. That policy of deflation immediately led to widespread unemployment and to that reduction of prices which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has commented upon rather with pleasure. When it was said that it had restricted the home markets, the right hon. Gentleman's reply was that that had nothing to do with the question. It seems to me that the policy of deflation had led to the widespread reduction of wages, aggregating something like £600,000,000 per annum. That £600,000,000 per annum wage reduction has certainly restricted the home market, and, as far as I can see, in spite of any lowering of prices, there has been no marked increase of production so far as the volume of men in employment is concerned.

The policy of deflation that was begun here on the recommendation of the Cunliffe Committee was carried out simultaneously with a policy of deflation in the United States. I believe it is a fact that in the United States, as a result of deflation, the unemployed problem in about six months ran to about 6,000,000 men. It is said that President Harding demanded the dropping of the policy. From that time unemployment has been practically non-existent in the United States. Almost every nation in the world has had a better time than we have had here. There has been less unemployment even in Germany, in France and in Italy than we have had to face. It is an undoubted fact that our people here have suffered in a terrible way. I cannot say whose policy it is that has resulted so, but certainly the fact remains that we have widespread poverty and that unemployment is a continuing factor, and as far as one can see the Government do not help to bring about any real change so far as the great mass of the unemployed are concerned.

It has been stated more than once that the immediate effect of the policy of the Cunliffe Committee was to increase the National Debt and to increase the value of the interest paid on the National Debt. I want to refer to the effect of that upon the condition of the great mass of the people. I will illustrate my point in this way: The interest taken must come out of the general mass of annual production, for it cannot come from anywhere else. The takers of interest, who take from £310,000,000 to £320,000,000 a year, do not take it in actual money, and it must come out of the annual production. If, as we have been told, the effect of deflation was to increase the actual value of the National Debt and to increase the value of the interest from about 5 per cent. to the neighbourhood of 8½ per cent., then those who have taken interest on the National Debt have in later years taken an undue proportion of the annual production. I have tried to work it out in this way. Suppose that a man invested £1,000 in 1919, the interest being 5 per cent. On 1919 prices, for the £50 return which he gets for his investment he can obtain, say, 10 pairs of boots and 20 yards of cloth. Deflation takes place and prices fall, but the rate of interest remains stationary. The 5 per cent. is still 5 per cent., and his income from the £1,000 still remains £50. But in 1927, because of the fall in prices, instead of his being able to get only 10 pairs of boots he takes 20 pairs of boots, and instead of 20 yards of cloth he is taking much more. Where does it come from? If it comes out of the products—

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Captain FitzRoy): I am trying to find how the hon. Member's speech has any reference to the particular Vote we are discussing. The hon. Member's speech appears to me to be more suitable for a Debate upon the Finance Bill.

Mr. WALLHEAD: I was seeking to show why we should have a Committee of Inquiry into the financial methods of the Government. I was trying to show that there was a very close connection between the financial policy of the Government and the condition of the great mass of the people at the present time.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member looks at the Vote, he will see that it relates to the salaries and expenses of the Department and has nothing to do with financial policy.

Mr. T. JOHNSTON: I would draw your attention to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to all the points which my hon. Friend has raised, and my hon. Friend is only putting counter argument against those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer dealt with unemployment and all the rest of the questions.

Mr. WALLHEAD: The whole of the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in reply to arguments put from this side of the Committee, and the subject was opened by the right hon. Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham), the late Financial Secretary to the Treasury. I was trying to point out that the fall of wages has been brought about simply because the commodities are not there, and that the fall of wages has been directly due to the policy pursued on the Cunliffe Committee's recommendation.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: But surely it would need legislation to alter the policy?

Mr. WALLHEAD: I was arguing in favour of setting up a Committee of Inquiry. That has been pressed this afternoon by practically every Member who has spoken.

Mr. AMMON: The whole Debate has been based on the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend that there should be a Committee of Inquiry appointed to go into the various matters. On that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others have spoken, and it has been a very wide Debate.

[Mr. Ammon.]

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: We cannot have a Debate on the whole financial policy of the Government as an excuse for setting up a Committee of Inquiry.

Mr. W. GRAHAM: May I try to clear up the matter? The Debate turns upon an administrative act of the Treasury, in refusing to entertain the idea of an inquiry into this matter, as suggested by Mr. McKenna. Therefore, I submit that on the Vote before us we are in every way entitled to review that administrative action. Prior to your taking the Chair the Debate dealt with many of the subjects with which my hon. Friend is dealing from another point of view. I respectfully suggest that in these circumstances my hon. Friend is quite in order.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): My recollection is that the greater part of my right hon. Friend's speech, as far as it dealt with the topics mentioned, was in answer to a question of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Gillett) as to whether a representative of the Treasury here met any representative of the French Government, in consequence of the inconvenience caused.

Mr. W. GRAHAM: On the point of Order raised by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. That was only one element in the Debate. The main points of the Debate are the effects, as we see them, of an unduly restricted policy, an argument to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer devoted a good deal of attention. Accordingly, with respect, I think my hon. Friend is in Order.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Reference has been made to what took place before I occupied the Chair. It seemed to me that the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Wallhead) was taking a very wide view of what was in order in a Debate on Supply, by reviewing the whole financial policy of the country.

Mr. WALLHEAD: I was adducing an argument why there should be a further Committee appointed for the purpose of continuing the inquiry, and I am basing that argument upon the position of our trade and industry. The question of purchasing power and prices has been raised, and I am arguing that it is all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the policy of the Government has reduced prices. They may have reduced prices, but their policy has also reduced wages, and reduced wages to such an extent that, although the prices may be down, the people have not the wages with which to purchase commodities, even at the lower prices. That is the point I am making.

One real reason why the great mass of the people have less purchasing power is because the rentier class have increased their taking power more and more, because of the rise in the value of the rate of interest due to the lowering of prices, following a policy of deflation. In this country we have a most unfortunate state of affairs. It has been said from our own Front Bench that any policy of inflation would be wrong. A policy of inflation would leave me very cold. I am not a banker and I do not understand the abstract question as an expert; but I look at it from the common-sense point of view. I read the reports of the great Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, and I find that they are proposing still further to curtail production, in spite of the fact that we have destitution, want and misery among millions of our people. There is a want of cotton goods. Nevertheless, Lancashire is proposing to curtail production. The mills are already on short time; the weavers are becoming poorer, the looms are standing idle, and the finest skill of the finest mechanics in the world is standing idle, while their productions are wanted. In the United States there is a proposal to cut down the production of cotton. There is a proposal actually to burn 4,000,000 bales of cotton, because there is no demand for cotton goods. We have passed subsidies in this House for the maintenance of irrigation works in Egypt, and yet we are told to-day that Egyptian cotton must be cut down in production.

What is the fatality that dogs the footsteps of the people of this country? What is the thing that spreads itself like a dread miasma throughout the lives of our people—want, poverty, unemployment—ment, machinery standing idle, commodities being destroyed? It seems to me that if the wit of man can find means whereby this dreadful thing can be obviated, even at the risk of snapping our fingers in the face of orthodox economists, and if we can pursue a policy which will give our people purchasing power, start the wheels of industry and provide us with an interregnum during which we can endeavour to discover the root cause of the evil from which we are suffering, it will be well worth the doing. The Government are faced with the problem of unemployment, and they make no move to solve it. They have no means of solving it. They put forward no proposals for the solution of the problem. When the Labour party were in office we were taunted regularly with the fact that we had not solved the problem of unemployment. We were told that what was wanted was peace in industry.

Peace in industry has not come, because of the constant reduction of wages and the growing impoverishment of our people, which can be traced back to the policy, pursued since 1920, of deliberate deflation. That policy has brought a lowering of the standard of life all round.

Could we not inquire whether the Cunliffe Committee did report the best and the wisest thing, or whether there might not have been some other recommendation that might have been carried out, or some other experiment that might have been tried, which would have dealt more effectively with the evil thing that curses the lives of so many of our people?

Question put, "That a reduced sum not exceeding £198,058 be granted to His Majesty for the said Service."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 83; Noes, 252.

Division No. 212.]

AYES.

6.53 p.m.

*Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Broad, F. A.
Bromley, J.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Cape, Thomas
Charleton, H. C.
Cluse, W. S.
Clynes, Right Hon. John R.
Connolly, M.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Crawfurd, H. E.
Dalton, Hugh
Davies, Rffys John (Westhoughton)
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)

Groves, T.
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hardie, George D.
Harney, E. A.
Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Hutchinson, Sir Robert (Montrose)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Lawrence, Susan
Lee, F.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Macdonald, Sir Murdoch (Inverness)
Mackinder, W.
March, S.
Morris, R. H.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Oliver, George Harold
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.

Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
Salter, Dr. Alfred
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Sincclair, Major Sir A. (Calthness)
Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
Snell, Harry
Sporr, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Viant, S. P.
Wallhead, Richard C.
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Wellock, Wilfred
Whiteley, W.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. A. Barnes and Mr. B. Smith.

NOES.

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Albery, Irving James
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astor, Maj. Hn. John J. (Kent, Dover)
Atkinson, C.
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Bainiel, Lord
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.

Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
Blundell, F. N.
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Brass, Captain W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Brittain, Sir Harry
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.

Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newby)
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Burman, J. B.
Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Caine, Gordon Hall
Campbell, E. T.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth. S.)
Cecil, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer

Churchman, Sir Arthur C.	Hills, Major John Waller	Price, Major C. W. M.
Clarry, Reginald George	Hilton, Cecil	Raine, Sir Walter
Cobb, Sir Cyril	Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.	Ramsden, E.
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.	Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)	Rawson, Sir Cooper
Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips	Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy	Reld, D. D. (County Down)
Conway, Sir W. Martin	Holbrook, Sir Arthur Richard	Remer, J. R.
Cooper, A. Duff	Holt, Capt. H. P.	Rentoul, G. S.
Cope, Major William	Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)	Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
Couper, J. B.	Hopkins, J. W. W.	Ropner, Major L.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)	Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)	Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)	Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)	Rye, F. G.
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.	Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.	Salmon, Major I.
Crookshank, Col. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)	Hudson, R. S. (Cumberland, Whiteh'n)	Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
Cunliffe, Sir Herbert	Hume, Sir G. H.	Sandeman, N. Stewart
Curzon, Captain Viscount	Huntingfield, Lord	Sandon, Lord
Dalketh, Earl of	Hurd, Percy A.	Savery, S. S.
Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.	Hurst, Gerald B.	Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)	Iliffe, Sir Edward M.	Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Renfrew, W.)
Davies, Dr. Vernon	Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.	Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
Davidson, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)	Jacob, A. E.	Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Dean, Arthur Wellesley	James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert	Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
Drewe, C.	Jephcott, A. R.	Skelton, A. N.
Eden, Captain Anthony	Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)	Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
Edmondson, Major A. J.	Joynson-Hicks, Rt. Hon. Sir William	Smith-Carlinton, Neville W.
Elliott, Major Walter E.	Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)	Smithers, Waldron
Ellis, R. G.	Kindersley, Major Guy M.	Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Elveden, Viscount.	King, Commodore Henry Douglas	Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-a-M.)	Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement	Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)	Knox, Sir Alfred	Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
Everard, W. Lindsay	Lamb, J. O.	Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Fairfax, Captain J. G.	Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.	Storry-Deans, R.
Falle, Sir Bertram G.	Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip	Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
Fermoy, Lord	Loder, J. de V.	Styles, Captain H. W.
Fielden, E. B.	Long, Major Eric	Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
Ford, Sir P. J.	Looker, Herbert William	Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
Forestier-Walker, Sir L.	Lougher, Lewis	Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
Foster, Sir Harry S.	Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere	Tasker, R. Inigo.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.	Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman	Templeton, W. P.
Fraser, Captain Ian	Lumley, L. R.	Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.	Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)	Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
Galbraith, J. F. W.	McLean, Major A.	Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
Ganzoni, Sir John	Macmillan, Captain H.	Tinna, J. A.
Gates, Percy.	McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John	Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton	Macquisten, F. A.	Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham	Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel-	Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John	Makins, Brigadier-General E.	Wallace, Captain D. E.
Glyn, Major R. G. C.	Malone, Major P. B.	Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Grant, Sir J. A.	Marriott, Sir J. A. R.	Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Greene, W. P. Crawford	Merriman, F. B.	Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)	Meyer, Sir Frank	Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John	Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)	White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dairymple
Grotrian, H. Brent	Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.	Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.	Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)	Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Gunston, Captain D. W.	Morrison, H. (Wilts, Salisbury)	Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.	Nail, Colonel Sir Joseph	Windsor-Clyve, Lieut.-Colonel George
Hammersley, S. S.	Nelson, Sir Frank	Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry	Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)	Wise, Sir Fredric
Harrison, G. J. C.	Oakley, T.	Withers, John James
Hartington, Marquess of	O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)	Womersley, W. J.
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)	O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh	Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)	Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William	Wood, E. (Ches't'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
Haslam, Henry C.	Penny, Frederick George	Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
Hawke, John Anthony	Perkins, Colonel E. K.	Wood, Sir S. Hill- (High Peak)
Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.	Perring, Sir William George	Woodcock, Colonel H. C.
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)	Peto, Sir Basil E. (Devon, Barnstaple)	Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)	Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)	Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.	Pilcher, G.	Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)
Henn, Sir Sydney H.	Power, Sir John Cecil
Hennessy, Major J. R. G.	Pownall, Sir Assheton
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford,	Preston, William

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Captain Margesson and Captain
Bowyer.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

CLASS V.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,943,593, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1928, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Ministry of Health; including Grants and other Expenses in connection with Housing, Grants to Local Authorities, etc., in connection with Public Health Services, Grants-in-Aid in respect of Benefits and Expenses of Administration under the National Health Insurance Acts, certain Expenses in connection with the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, and certain Special Services."—[Note: £6,500,000 has been voted on account.]

Mr. GROVES: I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

I have put down this Amendment to reduce the Minister's salary by £100, and I think it is very modest on my part. There were, of course, many subjects that could be dealt with on this Vote, but, for the general convenience of the Committee, we have tacitly understood that the main attack from this side will be directed towards condemning the present administration of the West Ham Poor Law Guardians. I would like first, however, to call the Minister's attention to the administration of the Blind Persons Act and to the very special and splendid work that is requisite in this country for the maintenance of blind people, and I would ask him whether he can at some future date receive a deputation of people interested in the State maintenance of the blind, so that we may put before his Department reasons why we feel that the Blind Persons Act is not carrying out the work which Parliament intended. I am not making an attack, but for many years we have worked for the State maintenance of the blind. We believe this country is rich enough, and we think it ought to be generous enough, to remove blind people from the position of beggary, so that they need not be compelled to seek their living by begging either inside or outside public-houses. They should be maintained in decency and, if possible, in comfort. Because Parliament has handed over to what we call the private agencies the attention requisite for the blind people, we, who have fought for State aid for the blind for more than a quarter of a century, feel that that which Parliament desired has not really been done. Therefore, I suggest that if in the future the Ministry would give attention to that point of view, they would be conferring a lasting blessing upon the blind people of this country.

I would like further to criticise the Ministry, and to move a further reduction of the Vote because of its attitude towards vaccination. That is not under discussion to-night, but we shall perhaps find an opportunity on Wednesday of calling attention to the very flagrant misuse by the Ministry of its powers. I am afraid my hon. Friend the Member for West Bermondsey (Dr. Salter) will not agree with me there.

Dr. SALTER: Quite right.

Mr. GROVES: I now come to the part of my story which is most serious. My modesty in suggesting that the Minister should only forego £100 is overbearing. I would have liked, if it were possible, to move that the same proportionate reduction should be applicable to the Minister's salary as is applied to the relief of the poor in West Ham. If my hon. Friend would feel a personal shaft, I would like also to apply it to the Under-Secretary. This discussion arises from the fact that about a year ago, after protracted discussions, the Government were responsible for placing upon the Statute Book the Boards of Guardians (Default) Act. As a result of that Act, the West Ham Board of Guardians as such died. We have had appointed in their place three presumably important, intelligent, well-to-do and otherwise well-paid people. Although these persons were already in receipt of a sufficient sum of money to keep them, not in decency but in luxury, the West Ham ratepayers were compelled to pay the chairman, Sir Alfred Woodgate, a sum of £1,500 a year out of the local rates. As to his two assistants, I regret to say that one of them has died in the execution of his duties, or died in harness as we say in the Labour party, but the other, Mr. Beale, is in receipt of £764 a year. Those salaries are in addition to the incomes of which these men were previously in receipt and which were sufficient, as I have said, to keep them, not in decency but in luxury. I want to call the Minister's attention to the fact that his administration has meant that, while certain poor people in West Ham have been compelled by the persons appointed to become poorer, the people of West Ham have been compelled to pay these incomes to these appointed guardians whose incomes were already sufficient to maintain them.

It is a commonplace that the law of the land in this country is that destitute people should, and must, be relieved. When I spoke here a fortnight ago, the only criticism of my speech made by the Minister of Health was that my premises were false. I agree that when premises are false, the roof falls in, but no one will object to my opening statement, that it is part of the law of this country that destitute persons should be relieved. We must now analyse why we stand here indicting the Minister for his conduct in West Ham. The Minister, of course, takes the position that these guardians are not his guardians, that he as Minister of Health has no more power and no more interest with regard to them than with regard to any other boards of guardians. He takes the position that once these gentry were appointed to carry on the work of the Poor Law guardians of the West Ham Union, the relation between them and the Ministry of Health is no different from that existing between any other boards of guardians and the Ministry. Last week we had a visit in West Ham from the Minister himself, and I want to prove from his own speech that his personal interest in the West Ham Boards of Guardians, as at present constituted, is such that he does take a very special interest in their work to-day, just as he used to take a very special interest in the work of the old guardians.

[Mr. Groves.]

He took so much interest in the world of the old guardians that he accepted, holus bolus, the report of his auditor. I have a copy of it here, the same copy from which I quoted during the Committee stage of the Default Bill last year. The Minister himself then said, speaking of West Ham, that the reason he was bringing in his Bill was that

"There reigns in some parts open and unabashed corruption."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 5th July, 1926; col. 1642, Vol. 197.]

I then asked him for proof. The proof was based mainly upon this report, as any Member will see who cares to glance at the OFFICIAL REPORT of the discussion a year ago. You will there find that this Auditor's Report is repeated almost word for word from beginning to end, and that the general charge laid down by the Minister was one of "open and unabashed corruption." It was stated perfectly openly that there were many cases of actual fraud. Their names, addresses, and all particulars are set out, and when one totals up the cases, one finds that there are exactly 41. That great union had to deal with thousands of cases, thousands of families, amounting, in all, to 139,000 human beings. It is only reasonable to assume that wherever you go and whatever you do, you will get some degree of wrong committed. I suggest that the 41 cases submitted to the Minister of Health by his own official auditor—paint them as black as you like—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being present—

Mr. GROVES: I was saying, when I was interrupted, that the proportion of cases proved to the Minister of Health was, in all the human circumstances of the case, a very low proportion of wrong doing. I think it is generally understood that West Ham is a very poor place, and I think it is generally understood why that is so. We are talking to-night direct to the Ministry of Health, and we are going to say some very unpleasant things before we have finished. I have some documents here which I hope to read, and I shall try to prove to the Ministry itself that it has transferred the work of the guardians in West Ham from a board that administered relief to the poor under almost overwhelming odds and under circumstances of supreme difficulty—workmen and women who gave readily and voluntarily of their time to serve the common people. When the Minister of Health comes in later in the evening, he will probably get up and disown knowledge of some of these circumstances, but he has appointed these new people with a full knowledge of who they were and what they had to do, and he has maintained his association with them, and I say that he definitely takes sides with them. When I have read a few of these documents, I will ask him, if he returns, or I will ask his hon. Friend on his behalf, some questions about the public speech which he delivered at Whipps Cross Hospital last Wednesday.

I think it is the greatest piece of effrontery for the Minister of Health to go to Whipps Cross Hospital to present medals to nurses, after the newly appointed guardians, who are his own nominees, have deliberately increased the working hours of those nurses. I visit these institutions, and shall do so until I am refused admission. In the sick ward of the central home—years ago we used to call it the workhouse—about three months ago they had so changed the working hours and duties of the women medical attendants that one of these women dropped at the feet of a doctor with fatigue. In the "H" ward there are 48 sick persons sometimes, some of them chronic invalids with diseases such as cancer, and there are only four women attendants, one of whom was the woman who fell exhausted at the feet of the doctor the day I was present. I do not come here and say things that I read in the newspapers; I retail experiences of my own. The Minister of Health went down to Whipps Cross Hospital to present some medals, and this is what he said:

"This particular union"—
the West Ham Union—

"was said in some quarters to belong to the Ministry of Health. It did not. He assured them it was not correct that Sir Alfred Woodgate or Mr. Beal were in his pocket. It was true that he was responsible for persuading them to undertake their present duties, and, therefore, it was natural that he should watch with special interest the work which they were doing with so much credit to themselves and so much benefit to the community."

I only want to emphasise that the Minister himself has gone out of his way to take sides with the West Ham Board of Guardians as at present constituted. He would not go down to an ordinary board of guardians and say that he was taking special interest in their work that they were doing with so much credit to themselves and so much benefit to the community. There is a special reason why that happens in West Ham. The reason is that, previously, they had a board of guardians composed of ordinary working men and women, who approached an almost overwhelming problem with just the qualifications of working-class representatives, with honesty and voluntarily. They have been supplanted, and now we are confronted with a board of guardians whose apparently definite and deliberate intention is to impose upon the very poorest people in the West Ham Poor Law Union a standard of life that is nothing short of starvation.

Now let us have some proofs, because for anyone to stand in the British House of Commons and indict any person with continuing a policy of deliberate starvation of Britain's manhood and womanhood is a serious charge, which ought to be proved up to the hilt. These people started with an immediate reduction of the scales of relief, openly, but it is the insidious manner of their working that is important, like that for which we have indicted the Minister of Labour, for cutting off the registration people on the live register. It is not the open rules and regulations proclaimed to the community that these people have used in order to beat down and oppress the poor people; it is the insidious way in which they have dealt with circumstances. Let me give one or two examples. The new guardians have reduced the rates and the amount of expenditure, and I say that they have done it as the result of starving the poorest of the poor in the West Ham Poor Law Union.

The Minister of Health has stated in this House that he is prepared to deal with cases of individual hardship. The present chairman of the board of guardians has said the same, and I have a bagful of letters here dealing with cases which I have sent to the board and in which I have got the usual kind and courteous reply—so courteous, but so sinister. The reply has always been that the board regrets that it can see no reason to change its original decision. Therefore, this courtesy of "'Will you walk into my parlour?' said the spider to the fly," of always being willing to receive Members of Parliament, of being willing to receive the overtures of the elected representatives of the people, is nothing, if we cannot get anything by applying to the Minister. The Minister says: "Let us have cases of individual hardship, and they shall have my attention," but let us see what happens.

One of my constituents, Mr. J. R. Mason, of 50, Geere Road, is suffering from debility very badly—so much so, that he is compelled to attend as an out-patient at the London Hospital, and Dr. D. Hunter, of the London Hospital, recommends that he should have three pints of milk a day. The relieving officer under the new West Ham Board of Guardians refuses any help except the workhouse. I have heard my hon. Friend the Member for Silvertown (Mr. J. Jones) say that he knows that figures cannot lie, but that liars can figure, but here are actual documents that neither we nor the Ministry can have had any part in producing. Here is a letter from Guys Hospital in reference to a man named Frederick Clawson, and the way in which I got it was very dramatic. In marching yesterday from Stratford to Hyde Park, I saw

[Mr. Groves.] a man exhibiting this, and I said, "What have you got there?" He replied, "I am exhibiting to the people the treatment I have received from the West Ham Guardians." I said to him, "Please show me. I am sure the Minister of Health would like it."

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Sir Kingsley Wood): Do I understand the hon. Member has produced it to-night without any further investigation at all?

Mr. GROVES: You will see. It is corroborated. The man's name and address are quite all right. His name is Frederick C. Clawson, and he lives at 55, Vincent Street, and he has already been in communication with your Department. It is since we have had the guidance of these beneficent people appointed under your Act. Your Department wrote to him immediately after the appointment of our friends, stating:

"Subject to the regulations in force, it rests with the guardians to decide whether relief is needed in any case."

This is printed. This is not a personal letter to this man, but the usual routine letter of the Ministry of Health. It says:

"The Minister cannot interfere with the discretion of the guardians in these matters."

This man attends Guys Hospital, and if you had seen him as I saw him, you would most certainly say he was fit only for a convalescent home, but in West Ham he gets 2s. in money and 5s. in groceries for a week—7s. per week to live on. I shall be very pleased to hand this over to the Minister, but it is not the worst that I have to read to him. Here is one which I have had in my possession for months. I did not get this at the demonstration yesterday.

Sir K. WOOD: I am quite unaware of any of these cases. Has the hon. Member made any inquiry as to the facts in the case he has just quoted—as to whether the man has any family?

Mr. GROVES: Yes. He has got a father, who is out of work.

Sir K. WOOD: Is that all?

Mr. GROVES: He is living with his parents, but his father is out of work, and he has other relatives, but if a man is ill, so ill that he has to go to a hospital, are we, in this Christian country, in this position, that because this boy has got brothers in local works getting £2 5s. a week, he has to look to that financial source for his support. Yet, as I have shown, some of these people need three pints of milk a day.

Major PRICE: Do we understand that the gentleman you saw yesterday marched in procession from West Ham?

Mr. GROVES: No, I did the marching. If there be any credit in it, I walked from Stratford Grove to Hyde Park to demonstrate my hostility to the Government. I have in my hand a card with particulars of a case of which, I am sure, the Ministry have had notice. It is the case of Charles Gillham, a young man in my area, who attended the local hospital because he felt queer. This is a Christian country. Listen to this. On the back of this card there is this statement in the handwriting of a doctor at Queen Mary's Hospital, which is in the West Ham Poor Law Union area, "Fainting, due to hunger." Anyone can examine this. The Guardians of West Ham refused any relief whatever. They refused help on the ground that the boy was living with his parents. We believe that the case we are putting to the Minister of Health is justified and that the conditions which have been imposed upon us are unjustified. We believe the cases we are bringing forward can be multiplied by hundreds or by thousands. If the Ministry want us to collect them in bulk, we will. I have plenty in my case, and I have raised three which, in my opinion, are the worst from the point of view of brutality. I trust the Minister will see that the saving in pounds, shillings and pence in West Ham has been at the expense of men and women and, worst of all, at the expense of children.

This is the acid test. When the Ministry of Health issue their annual report for this year I hope they will give a special page to the question of infant mortality in West Ham. Sir George Newman, the Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry of Health, states that high infantile mortality implies not only the loss of many infants but the maiming of many surviving children, for the conditions which kill some injure others, and there is a high death rate in the next four years amongst infants who have survived. He quotes this wonderful passage:

"The large infant mortality rate predisposes, as would be expected to a large death-rate among children."

I want the Committee to consider what has happened in West Ham in this respect since the arrival of the people appointed by the Ministry of Health. Here is the report of the medical officer of health. The figures can be verified; I know that it will not take the Minister many seconds to do it. In 1924 West Ham's infant mortality rate was 78.30 per 1,000, against 80 per 1,000 in the 105 great towns of Great Britain. In 1925 it was 65.98 per 1,000, and in the other 105 towns 79. Under the old regime in West Ham we gave the best possible treatment to the aged, the unemployed, prospective mothers and children. I would not come to this House and be so hypocritical as to say that we in West Ham ever put the saving of the local rates before the saving of death rates. What we tried to do was to save human lives; that is greater than saving pounds, shillings and pence to the nation. John Ruskin says: "There is no wealth but life." You will never get life developed under conditions as laid down in the Poor Law Union of West Ham to-day.

In West Ham under the old regime we reduced the infant mortality in contrast with that in the 105 great towns of this country. I want the Committee to listen to what has happened; I will not say it is a result, but the Government will have to explain these circumstances. In October, 1926, the first month in which these new guardians had been operating, the infant mortality rate in West Ham was 82.4 per 1,000 and in the 105 great towns 100. In November it was 64.5, and in the other great towns 75. What were the figures in the third month? I would not accuse the new guardians of anything as the result of one month's work, but I think three months is a fair period for drawing deductions from an analysis of their work. Whereas in December the infant mortality of the 105 towns was only 84 per 1,000, in West Ham it had gone up to 90.7. In January this year the rate in the 105 great towns was 98.2 and in West Ham 100.4. In February in the 105 towns it was 100 and in West Ham 101. In March in the 105 towns it was 90 and in West Ham 104. April exactly repeats those figures. Those are figures issued by our medical officer of health. He has no axe to grind. As my hon. Friends behind me know, he has no party bias, he takes only a doctor's view. He presents to us the medical statistics. He never coloured them in favour of the old guardians, and I am sure he would not colour against the present guardians. He merely deals with his job as a medical man. Those figures stand as a lasting indictment of the policy of the present guardians.

It is not a question merely of rules and regulations. It is the insidious manner in which these guardians have quietly worked to reduce here and there, even by 1s., the money that went into the homes of the people in the common form of parish relief, the money that enabled these people to keep body and soul together. The Minister, as the head of a great Department, ought to realise that his Department and his honour are greater than any mere attack upon a publicly-elected body of guardians, even if they are Labour members. The honour and the prestige of the Ministry of Health is too great for him to risk it in defending people responsible for these barbarous practices. In my opinion, if the Minister did his duty he would clear out these people lock, stock and barrel. I hope he will clear them out within a short time, because the crucial moment is coming when he has either got to get rid of them or give them a new lease of life. Take the question of coal. The old popularly-elected guardians did realise that poor people need coal in the winter. It seems a fairly reasonable thing to give people a half-cwt. of coal. Bless my heart and soul alive, that would not fill the grates of some hon. Members. But the few cwts. of coal which the people used to get were regarded as part of the extravagance of the old guardians. You have to produce a doctor's certificate to prove that you are ill before you can get coal from the new guardians.

I have been here for five years and have never been accused of coming here and making extravagant statements or unfair statements. Here is a peculiar situation. There are able-bodied men in thousands out of work. When first I came to Parliament I heard a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Silvertown explaining, in simple language but true, why West Ham is poor. West Ham grew up with the docks. We cannot help trade breaking down. We cannot help the cessation of imports and exports. It is an awful thing when these men have exhausted their claim to unemployment benefit and arrive at the moment—one of the saddest moments in the life of any British workman—when they have to choose between having nothing in the cupboard and going to the door of the relieving officer. That saps the pride of a British working man. I have seen men with whom I have worked go steadily down the slope. They were men who used to have a clean collar and an upright and a cleanly appearance. They leave off that collar; they come to shabbiness. The first time a man goes to the door of the R.O., as we say, he goes with bowed head. He has not been there a month before he goes with head erect. Society has taught him that that is where he can find his bread. Then you have beat him. How do you beat him? Your new guardians now say to all these unemployed men, "If you are single and under 40, clear out." There is no relief for a single able-bodied man under 40 years of age. If the Government cannot find a man work, then the parish must find him bread. Under the new régime these able-bodied men must go and get a doctor's certificate proving they are fit for light work only. If they cannot produce that medical certificate, it is assumed that they are fit for ordinary work, and there is no parish relief for them. I say, in perfect friendship, that is a diabolical system to introduce into this country, and it will take more than kind words on the part of the man who is accustomed to use them to explain that away. What I have stated is based on my personal experience. I walk the relief stations—well, I do not walk through them, but I get in touch with them in order that I can get hold of the facts, and facts are very inconvenient things.

[Mr. Groves.]

Take the next question. Some people have been taken to Court to make them pay back the money which, to use the vernacular, they had on loan. Half-a-dozen men were taken to the County Court. I suppose hon. Members are aware that during the general strike some men went to the parish. They had money during the strike, and after it was all over the Minister of Health declared that all those persons had had that money on loan. As I understand it, if a man applies for relief, by the law of the land the guardians have power to grant that money on loan. During the general strike people in my district applied to the relieving officer, and he replied, "You are on strike, but I will let you have this £2, but, understand, it is on loan and has to be repaid." What I want the Minister to understand is the harshness, the callousness and the hypocrisy which has been assumed in deciding that all the men who applied for relief during the strike knew that they were having relief on loan. Many of these men have had sent to them a note saying that the money they have had on loan must be repaid, and the officiating guardians have stooped so low as to say they are prepared to accept repayment at 6d. per week.

I say that the bulk of the people who got relief during the strike at West Ham did not have it on loan and the guardians knew all about this. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health was very surprised when during the Debate some time ago I told him that his advance troops were at Union Road. Up to two weeks ago a staff was engaged at West Ham marking in the books "On loan." I wish to repeat that statement in case I am required to prove it. The West Ham Guardians have a cabinet which is indexed and contains the record cards. Legally those records are part of the official routine office work. Legally the only thing that can be accepted is what is called the application and record book, which is larger in length than an ordinary dispatch box. The guardians sit with the relieving officers and the facts are written in the book and when something is granted, if it is granted on loan that fact must be specifically written by the side of the name of the person it is granted to, and it is initialled in the book at the time of granting by the guardians who are present. Up to two weeks ago I know that a staff was engaged by the new purists to fill in the books in that way.

Dr. SALTER: That is forgery.

Mr. J. JONES: It is a forgers' Government.

HON. MEMBERS: "Red Letter!"

Mr. GROVES: If the Minister of Health will give me a reasonable assurance that the person engaged to fill up the books in the way I have described will not suffer loss of employment I will produce him at the Bar of the House. I ask hon. Members opposite who have been so loyal in supporting the Government in their attempt to repress what they call corruption to take that fact into consideration, because in my view it is something which no decent-minded man can defend. I will conclude by asking the Minister of Health to reconsider the kindly interest he is taking in the West Ham Board of Guardians in dealing with old age pensions. When we were discussing in July 1925, the Pensions' Bill, somebody moved an Amendment providing that the pension paid to widows should be 20s. instead of 10s., and on that occasion the Minister of Health said:

"As I have said, in the first place, these pensions are not sufficient in themselves to enable a woman to keep up a home for herself."

I think when men or women have spent the best years of their lives in the interests of their country in industry, and have grown old and grey working and toiling, arrive at this age, it is reasonable for them to expect that although the country imperially is not sufficiently generous although it is sufficiently wealthy, it should see that these men or women can live their remaining years comfortably outside the walls of the workhouse. It is reasonable to assume that if a man or woman lives 40 or 50 years in a parish the 10s. a week pension might be supplemented by 5s. from the parish. What is happening in West Ham is that within the next week or two they are going to clear off all the old age pensions. In my area if a man signs at the Employment Exchange that he has got his sons at work, then his sons must keep him. The Minister of Health has admitted that 10s. paid as a pension is not sufficient to keep a woman, but if she has a son or a daughter at work then she cannot receive assistance from the parish. Therefore the new guardians are punishing the children in this way. I do not ask hon. Members on this question to violate their loyalty to the Government, but if the Government will not find work for these people and they are beaten to the wall, surely that is not the moment for the guardians to do such things as I have mentioned.

In the case of these poor people, friends are very hard to find under such circumstances. It is bad enough when a man or a woman is compelled to apply to a relieving officer, but when they are driven to apply for Poor Law relief in this way I do feel that this country should be big enough to see that the Poor Law administration will be such as to see that their manhood and womanhood is respected and not degraded. The new guardians in West Ham have proclaimed a policy of suppression and oppression against the flower of Britain's womanhood and manhood. A few years ago the men I am pleading for were fighting for the freedom of this country. In the area I represent we have thousands of men who wore medals on their breast for their services during the War, and yet to-day they are living in poverty. In moving this reduction of £100 I would like to say that I should much prefer moving that the Minister's salary be reduced by the same amount as the relief of the poor people of West Ham has been reduced. That would be in the first place 25 per cent. and then 10 per cent.

I hope I have made out my case without undue bitterness. At any rate my case is based upon facts and personal experience. I have seen the men and women in my own neighbourhood decaying and becoming debilitated and they are men whom I used to work with. You expect these men to live straight and upright lives and you are only allowing them 7s. a week in food tickets, and not one penny in money. How do you expect those men to live under such circumstances as that? These questions must be answered. Whatever the consequences we must impress upon the Minister this question and we must insist upon knowing why the right hon. Gentleman does not take action against the West Ham guardians who are now granting only 7s. per week for a man to live upon. How can such men be expected to keep themselves clean? We ought to approach this question and adopt a decent standard of living. Out out all this passion and this hatred of West Ham which arises simply because we have a Labour and Socialist majority, and approach these problems with a realisation that you have no right to punish a man because he is poor. A man has no right to be de-

[Mr. Groves.]

8.0 p.m. graded because he is out of work, and we look to the Ministry of Health to be truly a Ministry of Health, to rise above party passions, to face the circumstances, and to help us to impress upon the West Ham Board of Guardians that this work must stop, and that they must treat the people of the West Ham Union according to the laws of decency, propriety and comfort.

Miss LAWRENCE: I know a little better now than to appeal to the Minister of Health on grounds of pity and humanity; but I feel that we have a right to get from the Minister the strict observance of the law. The Minister is very fond of appealing to the law when boards of guardians step a little beyond the law, moved by motives of philanthropy and charity. That is right and as it should be; but what I have to complain about is that the Minister encourages the West Ham Board of Guardians habitually to break the law of England with regard to outdoor relief. The law is clear and plain. Fathers and mothers must maintain their children; children must maintain their parents, but there is no obligation of any kind upon brothers to maintain brothers or upon sisters to maintain sisters; but the whole policy of this board of guardians is to attach the earnings of brothers and sisters to keep other members of the family who are not legally dependent upon them. If these people knew their job, they could get out of it, but they trade upon the benevolent feelings of brothers and sisters and cast the whole care of maintaining the younger members of the family upon the sisters and brothers. There are the children of soldiers who have been killed in the War, to whom the Government have given pensions, and this board of guardians have thrown upon them the maintenance of their step-brothers, step-sisters and step-fathers. When the Government were deciding what we ought to give to the children of men who died in the service of the country, they considered very carefully what was the proper sum to give, so that these children could get a proper up-bringing.

I will give two cases. Those cases I brought to the notice of the Minister, and he knows they are perfectly genuine. There were four children of a soldier who was killed, and the Government gave the children pensions. One of them died, and there are three of them left. They have, in the form of pensions, 23s. 6d. a week, while one of them is earning 12s. a week. Later, the mother married, and there are two children of the later marriage. To the father, the mother and the two younger children the guardians give 8s. in kind and 5s. in money, 13s. altogether. The orphans of the soldier have to maintain their mother, their step-father and the two step-children. One of the bedrooms they have sub-let for 4s. 6d. a week, because they have so little money for food, and therefore the soldier's children have nothing like the bedroom space which would make children happy and healthy. The bedrooms of the soldier's orphans have been taken away from them in order that the other members of the family may have enough to eat. There is another case, of a similar kind, where the three orphans of a soldier have 17s. 6d. a week as pensions, and earn 10s. a week. The mother married, and there is another child of the second marriage. They get 4s. a week in kind from the guardians, and 4s. a week in cash, and the rent is 4s. 2d. a week. They let one of the rooms and, again, the sleeping accommodation of a soldier's orphans has been filched from them because there is no money to feed the rest of the family. When the country voted all that amount of taxation in order that soldiers' orphans should be properly treated, it did not mean that they should be all herded into one room. This is the more wicked on the part of the Minister, because the members of the former board of guardians faced up to cases of this kind. In 1922, they communicated with the Ministry of Pensions, and the Minister of Pensions wrote a letter to them which determined their policy. He said:

"The pensions for the children of the soldier should be expended for their sole benefit."

That was not what the Labour Minister said, but what the Conservative Minister said in 1922, and that is the common sense of the matter. This money was never voted to go in indiscriminate relief to the relations of soldiers' orphans. We voted this money in order that the children of men who died in the War might be decently and healthily brought up. Here, in those two cases, the money is being filched from them, and they are being housed in a way which is not wholesome and decent. That is what the Minister is doing.

I now come to more general matters. The Minister is very fond of saying, when certain cases are brought before him, that he cannot interfere with the discretion of the boards of guardians. But we know that the Minister has power to issue general Regulations. The old West Ham Board of Guardians, when they had to deal with an old person, gave 15s. a week. You cannot get a room in West Ham for less than 5s. or 4s. 6d. a week. The new board of guardians have cut down the maximum scale for single persons to 11s. a week. If you have to pay 5s. or 4s. 6d. a week for a room, how can you live and obtain food, firing and clothing and everything else on the balance of 11s.? It is not possible to do it. I know some of these cases, and I know that people are suffering from hunger, and that in the winter they were suffering from cold, as a direct result of the Regulations laid down by the present board of guardians. Some time or other these people will take a chill, they will not have the strength to throw it off, and, though the medical certificate will be that death was caused by pneumonia or bronchitis, the real cause will be starvation because of Regulations carried out under the auspices of the Minister of Health. I have got here in my hand the Report of the West Ham Union, which has been printed in His Majesty's Stationery Office. I do not know what authority Parliament gives to the Minister of Health to print the reports of local government authorities. It is certainly a nice way for the local authorities to save money. If he would consider extending that to the Poplar Borough Council, it would take a bit off the Poplar rates, and we would feel greatly obliged to him. They draw the attention of the world in general to the amount which they have saved in salaries and wages. They have saved something like £15,000 in salaries, and they have done it, partly, by making the nurses work longer hours than any women engaged in nursing ought to do. When I challenged the Minister about this, the Minister denied it, and then I put a question to him, and he had to admit that what I said was true. It is put down also in the report of the West Ham Board of Guardians.

The nurses used to have at the Central Infirmary—not everywhere, but at the Central Infirmary, where the work is very heavy, they used to have a 48-hour week, which meant that they had a day off to recuperate. The new board of guardians have given the nurses a 56-hour week, which means that they do not get a clear day. The West Ham Board of Guardians did not, as they ought to have done, give all the nurses in all their institutions a 48-hour week. At Whipps Cross, the nurses have worked more than 48 hours a week, but in the Central Infirmary, where the heavy cases are nursed, they had only a 48-hour week. I want the Committee to remember that there is no such heavy nursing as the nursing in a workhouse infirmary. At West Ham, the nursing is very much heavier than in London, because in London the Poor Law guardians send the very distressful cases to the sick asylums of the Metropolitan Asylums Board. They do not keep in the workhouses in London the cancer cases and the cases of venereal disease. West Ham does, and, in these extreme cancer cases, it is not merely that the patient is dying from cancer, but very heavy work is demanded of the nurses.

If a person dying from cancer is of any weight, the nurses have to shift the patient continually, or the poor wretch is tormented with bed sores as well as with cancer, so that a nurse who is nursing a dying cancer case has not merely the ordinary work of nursing, but a great deal of heavy lifting and moving, and, if that work is not done, the patient suffers very acutely and painfully. Nurses and sick attendants are only human beings, and, in that atmosphere of death—because there is nothing so depressing to the mind of a woman or a man as to be dealing with chronic cases that cannot recover, that only leave the institution by death, to be replaced by fresh chronic cases, who in three or four months will die, too—there is no work so dispiriting, and, if the nurses do not have a short working week, they cannot give the care and attention that they should; they cannot give the patients those little attentions that are so necessary, they cannot keep up the sort of atmosphere of hopefulness which it is their duty to keep up.

[Miss Lawrence.]

Of all the things that the Minister has done, I think one of the most petty, one of the economies which is most bitter to-day, is the lengthening of the working week of the nurses at the Central Institution from 48 to 56 hours. This is not the first time that the Minister has heard about it. It is in the Report here; it was put to him in this House; it was put to him by question and answer. He knows all about it, and he knows that the unions representing these nurses and sick attendants came to him and argued the case. They pointed out that in other boards of guardians where the work was not so heavy, in London boards of guardians—in Hackney, I think, and some others—because the nursing work is by its nature dispiriting, and because women cannot keep up a proper attitude of mind and a proper condition of body, in other workhouse infirmaries in London, they have a 48-hour week, although they do not have this number of patients. It is getting very common. The London County Council nurses have a 48-hour week. All good institutions where the work is heavy have a 48-hour week, and to re-impose a 56-hour week does mean a callousness on the part of the Minister that I, for one, cannot understand.

The ingenious cruelty of this board of guardians is terrible. Let me take the case of what is done with regard to dock labourers. A dock labourer, if he is a superior sort of man, has a tally, and the tally means that he gets work when work is going. He has to go to the Employment Exchange twice a day to sign on if he does not get work, and he has to go twice a day to the docks, which are at the other end of the district, to look for a job. This present board of guardians have passed a rule that, if a man has a brass tally, he is only to be relieved as and when relief is applied for, because they say that, if they give him anything like a regular wage, if they make an order, some day or other he may slip down to the docks and get half a day's work, and they will not know about it. I will give particulars of a case which I investigated, and which I think has been to the Minister. During six weeks the man in question, who was getting unemployment benefit, had the following out-relief: One week he had 14s. in kind; the next week he had 29s. in kind; then there was a gap, and then he had 22s. regularly for three weeks. Then, on the 13th December, he got a day's work, and earned 19s. He got 7s. in relief, and, of course, lost his unemployment benefit. Then people say that the poor do not want to work. This man, by going to the docks, got a day's work and earned 19s. His relief was cut down to 7s., and he lost his unemployment benefit. These are the inducements that we have to give to the poor.

This man is lame. He spends the whole of his time going backwards and forwards twice a day to the docks, twice a day to the Employment Exchange, and round again to the relieving officer. He is a good attender at the docks, and once in about six weeks, with the depression at the docks and because he is lame, he gets a job; and he has to pay fares. He spends the whole of his life crawling around on that unceasing journey up to the Employment Exchange, because the Minister will not have an Employment Exchange at the docks, though we have asked him often enough. This man goes up to the Employment Exchange at one end of East Ham, down to the docks to look for work, back to the Employment Exchange to sign on, again down to the docks, and now, without a penny in the cupboard, round to the relieving officer. What makes me more angry, even than the suffering of this family, is the contempt with which the poor are treated. The Minister of Labour will not have a room at the docks in order to spare this double daily trudge up to the other end of the borough. A man may be a dock labourer, and lame at that; what is the good of considering him? Let him walk; let him spend the whole of his life in that unceasing trudge. That is the sort of life you give the people, and people do not understand the depression, the misery, the unhappiness which settles down upon a family when they have to live in that sort of way. The wife said to me that they cannot bear it. This perpetual walking and no job, with a little crumb thrown by the relieving officer, is breaking the men's hearts, and is breaking the women's hearts too. I say we ought not to treat the poor so despitely. I cannot help what the West Ham Board of Guardians do, but to make some decent arrangement whereby this man is not kept walking round and round with his lame leg, in bad weather, is, I think, the very least thing the guardians ought to do.

I want now to ask the Minister a few questions. The last Report of the West Ham Guardians spoke about the wonderful economies they made; and one of the wonderful economies they made was to cut down the loan repayments for the half year from £127,000 to £58,000. The old board, which was so hardly spoken of, did at any rate pay back its interest and part of the principal, which the Minister quite properly accepted. In the last recorded half year, they paid £127,000 for interest and part of the principal. The Minister is uncommonly kind to the new board in the first half year and has let them off the repayment of part of the principal, so that the saving they have made is merely that they are keeping back money that the Exchequer ought to have. We should all like to make savings of that sort. We could all make very large private savings at the expense of the amount the Exchequer is entitled to demand from us. I should like to ask what arrangement is entered into with this board of guardians with regard to the repayment of the debt they owe and the amount they are to repay in future, and whether the arrangements the Minister will no doubt outline are peculiar to this board of guardians, or whether he proposes to extend the same kind, liberal and generous treatment to the destitute boards of guardians in the mining and industrial areas, and, if not, what justification has he for treating his own children so very much better than his step-children, the other boards of guardians. It is a lamentable thing that in West Ham alone the infantile mortality figures for this year are so much worse than last. A good many things have been said about Poplar, but Poplar's vital statistics compare extraordinarily favourably with those of West Ham, and it seems to be forgotten that the object for which guardians were instituted was that people who were hungry and unemployed should have some definite standard of living. Judged by any of these humane standards, the West Ham Board of Guardians are in a very inferior position.

I should like to make one more general reflection, which ought to come home to the Minister of Health, and that is the extraordinary amount of sub-letting. East Ham is a horribly crowded place. I have known families of six, seven and eight in a room. The place is crowded so that any room can be let almost at once and, where relief has been cut down, the people have very commonly adopted the plan of all huddling together into one room and letting the second bedroom to some lodger in order to bring in a few shillings a week. The Minister and the West Ham Guardians have, to my knowledge, increased the unbearable and indecent crowding in the borough I represent. I have been to the board of guardians about a family where the father has consumption. Two children have caught it and the rest are in great danger. They are living in one room, and if a decent amount of out-relief were given they could get another room. There is not enough money to pay for the rent, even in tuberculous cases, to separate the people who are healthy from those who are diseased. If you could have the loss of life due to overcrowding, the crowding together in some cases of tubercular and healthy people, the loss of life due to debility caused by under-feeding and the general human misery caused by the operations of the West Ham Board of Guardians—if I had eloquence I could move the House, but we are not all eloquent and we can only put the plain story before the Minister. I am not putting it before him really. I do not think it is much use. I am putting it before the House, so that what we have to say may be recorded in the OFFICIAL REPORT and compassionate people up and down the country may speak, not to the Minister but to their Members of Parliament, and ask them to put some form of pressure upon the Minister.

Mr. J. JONES: I might say, along with some of my colleagues, "Blessed are they who expect little. They shall not be disappointed." The state of the Committee demonstrates the enormous amount of interest our friends in the Government take in matters affecting the life and well-being of the people. West Ham was singled out for a special reason. I can remember when the Bill was introduced dealing with the West Ham Guardians. At that time wholesale charges of corruption were levelled against the board, and, as I listened to the speech, I waited for the facts, but they were not forthcoming. All we got was a recitation of prejudices, but no statement of fact bearing out the charges made against the guardians. The new guardians have had nearly 12 months of experience of administration of the Poor Law in the largest Poor Law area in the country. We find that out of hundreds of thousands of cases dealt with in the course of the year they have only discovered 41 cases, out of a population of over 1,000,000, where fraud could have been proved against the individuals concerned—not corruption against the guardians, but misrepresentation on the part of the people who applied for relief. That is the sum total of the so-called corruption in the largest area of Poor Law administration in the country, and probably the most difficult area. We are cursed with more than our fair amount of casual labour. We are the victims of industrial circumstances over which we have no control. In spite of all these difficulties, with all the administrative ability and power of these ex-civil servants, on pension, and now also on salary, they can only discover 41 cases.

[Mr. J. Jones.]

One of the boasts made on their behalf is very peculiar. I was a member of the board for five years, and, whenever the Minister honoured us with a visit to give us the benefit of his wisdom and counsel, we made a bit of a fuss about it. It was advertised in the local Press, and we all went to hear the wisdom that would come from the high orators who came from Whitehall to tell us all about it. On this occasion the Minister of Health came to West Ham unannounced. There was no decoration outside the building, whatever there may have been inside. He complimented the board of guardians on their administration. What is their administration. Some of our men and women have had to walk to Union Road from Silvertown because they could not afford even to pay their tram fare before they got free tickets. They went there day after day, very often from ten in the morning to five in the afternoon, and could not have a cup of tea unless they paid for it out of their own pockets. These people can come along with a pension of £800 and salaries of £1,500 to administer the affairs of West Ham, and at the end of their first 12 months they have saved 4d. in the £ on the rates.

A 4d. rate in West Ham represents in the aggregate £60,000, but they owe the Government £800,000, because, after all, if they have taken the place of the old guardians, they have also taken their responsibilities. What have they paid back? I ask the few gentlemen who are now sitting on the benches opposite, what the appointed and paid board of guardians have done to find the money the board owe to the Government? Our men and women had a little more judgment and foresight, and they met their responsibilities. They paid all the time by levying a rate on the people in respect of the money that had been borrowed for the administration of Poor Law affairs. We in West Ham have taken up this attitude, and will continue to take it up, namely, that the relief of unemployment ought not to be a local charge, and that the maintenance of the old and infirm should not altogether be a local charge. Because we could not get other people to agree with us we have been compelled to shoulder the burden, and our rates have had to go up enormously in order to meet those responsibilities.

What have they done? They say they have borrowed no money. They have lived upon the rate that has been levied. They have not done anything of the kind. The old board of guardians applied for a loan of £300,000 shortly before the new board were appointed. We could not get the money, because, evidently, the Government had something up their sleeve, and probably the Boards of Guardians (Default) Act was part and parcel of it. What is the consequence? This new board started with a loan of £300,000. I will ask the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health, if he can tell us how much of that £300,000 they have paid back. It is simply throwing dust in the eyes of the people to say that they are administering the affairs of West Ham more economically than was formerly the case. As a matter of fact, if they had paid off the requisite proportion of debt, they would have had to levy an additional 6d. rate for Poor Law purposes.

I am not going to weary the Committee with cases of hardship. The whole thing is hardship. Those of us who have been through it know that even with the most generous scale of relief it is a case of hardship for any man or woman who has to come before the Board of Guardians. Our crime is not that we have not administered the law. Our crime is that we have taken a more humane view of things than those who have been opposed to us. They think that 21s. a week is sufficient for a man wife and three children. They think that 37s. 6d. a week is sufficient for a man, wife and eight children, for that is the highest scale of relief. They have cut down wherever they can. When we were in office we used to take cases of special hardship into consideration. If parents had to keep children at home from school because they were unable to provide them with boots to wear, we used to provide the children with boots. Is that a crime? That has all been cut out now. In order to try and provide boots for these children we have to organise a private fund. I want to say that a man who will rob a child of a boot will take a penny out of a blind man's hand. That is what your so-called expert Poor Law administrators have done in West Ham. Their so-called economy is a figment of the imagination. It is not real relief and does not face the situation. We therefore hope that this Amendment to reduce the Vote will be carried as a protest against the appointment of these people.

The Minister of Health told us that he cannot interfere with the discretion of the gentlemen whom he has appointed. Why did he interfere with our discretion? Simply because we had to ask him for money. They have to do the same. They have to come to the Ministry for money just as we did. He did not merely interfere with us, but he told us we had no right to exist in spite of the fact that we had been elected by the people we represented by an overwhelming majority. When the council elections took place we obtained, in spite of all the so-called extravagances in West Ham, in every part of the Poor Law area, with two exceptions which we never expected to secure, the return of men and women representatives with considerable majorities. This legislation will come to an end soon, I hope, as well as the Government, who are the authors of it. But what will be the new Poor Law regulation? It will be, that the local councils will have the control of Poor Law administration. I believe that that is the intention of the Government in their proposed new scheme so far as the Poor Law is concerned. The reason that a proper proportion of the borrowed money has not been paid back by the appointed guardians is because they want to hand on the baby to us.

The local councils in the various areas will have to shoulder the burden which these people ought to be meeting as they go along. They would not have been able to come out with their Report and say they had saved the ratepayers 4d. on the rates if they had shouldered their financial responsibilities in the proper way. They may have been able to cut off people from Poor Law relief, and, here and there, cut down the scale of relief, but the great sum total of poverty in this district—the district that we all know so well, those of us who live in it—remains. All that they have been able to do is simply to try and bale out the Atlantic with a spoon. All their savings really amount to nothing. The only thing they have done is to squeeze a shilling out of those who cannot afford the sacrifice, and they have endeavoured to make the Poor Law stink in the nostrils of the great mass of the people. The people they hit most are the people to whom they pretend to be most sympathetic—the old people. I know, in my own district, of a case of a man who has two sons, who are out of work, living with him. The sons are drawing unemployment benefit and their father's relief is cut down because they are drawing this unemployment benefit. What is the good of humbugging us about or talking about National Insurance Acts when you give a man a few shillings with one hand and devise schemes for taking it away with the other? It is playing ducks and drakes with what may be called, common or ordinary honesty.

The Minister says he has no control over these appointed guardians. During the five years I have been a member of the board I have always understood, as far as we had the law explained to us by the greatest lawyers on Poor Law matters—and the late Mr. Smith, who was a member of the last Royal Commission on the Poor Law, so informed us—that no relief could be given or recognised except that it was passed by the properly constituted committee of the board, and finally passed by the board itself. Relief committees used to meet in various parts of the Poor Law area and examine every case, and upon the facts placed before them and the reports of the investigators and relieving officers decided to give what we called relief. The chairman of the relief committee signed these orders, and, if they were on loan, an entry was made in the margin of the book that the relief was granted by loan. What do I find now? This so-called board of guardians do not even meet together.

[Mr. J. Jones.]

They do not meet the people who apply for relief; they do not interview the people who are in receipt of Poor Law relief, but they pay 7s. 6d. a day to young clerks to go to the various relief stations and hear the cases put before them and make orders for relief. Is that administering the Poor Law? When the right hon. Gentleman moved the Second Reading of the Board of Guardians (Default) Act he told us that there was no intention to alter the law but only the administration as far as West Ham was concerned. I ask, here and now, is it not the law that the so-called guardians of the poor must themselves be the authority to see that the people who apply for relief should have investigation of their claims, and that the orders should be properly made out? In the old days, we did not send young clerks from the office to do that sort of work; we sent clerks to take records of the work of the committee, but, as far as the actual granting of relief was concerned, it was granted by the guardians themselves.

All that has been reversed. The House Committee meets after the board is supposed to have met, thereby reversing the whole procedure. The Relief Committee formerly reported to the House Committee, and the House Committee reported to the board. A clerk is sent to do the work which the Relief Committee used to do in conjunction with the relieving officer, and the board merely meets to sign the relief. Where is the corruption now. Thousands and thousands of pounds are signed away in relief, and the men who sign it have not seen the people concerned but have simply paid junior clerks to do the work for them. These are the men who charge us with corruption. We are babies when it comes to a question of maladministration.

Our opponents in West Ham cannot get in by a free vote of the people. They cannot win a seat in the overwhelming majority of constituencies in the Poor Law area; but by underhand and back-stair influence they got hold of the Minister, and the Minister was a willing tool in their hands. Now, they are finding that the goods have not been delivered. They were to show us up and to demonstrate how corrupt we were. They were going to save an enormous sum of money. They have done nothing of the sort. They have all the problems facing them, and now they have a little bit of sugar for the bird. There is to be a new works started in Silvertown to employ 200 or 300 men for the time being. That is held up as a great record of what these men are doing and of the work they are bringing into the borough. They have had nothing to do with it. They have as much to do with it as I have to do with the flying of the Atlantic by Captain Lindbergh. They are boasting of this sort of thing; but they forget about the 3,000 men who are signing on at the Employment Exchange in the southern part of the borough. They forget about the 15,000 people who are almost on permanent relief. They are not able to cut them down, except by surreptitious methods.

They have not touched the problem of poverty, either from the local or the national point of view. This report which they have issued is an insult to the people of the district. It will take many more men than Sir Alfred Woodgate and his friends before they are able to tackle the problem of poverty. Instead of appointing these paid gentlemen to come and show us how things can be done, it would have been better had the Government set themselves to the real problem; how to get rid of the problem of casual labour, and try to get rid of the perpetual curse of men having to tramp from factory to factory and workshop to workshop in search of a few days' work. It is a crime that men should have to tramp from Silvertown to Poplar to sign on, for the chance of getting a few paltry shillings of unemployment pay. These men have paid for this benefit. Why, then, should they be forced to undergo this inconvenience? When a man has been paying into an insurance fund he ought to be able to get benefit without being put to so much inconvenience. He has helped to build up the insurance fund and he is entitled to receive the benefit, without obstacles being put in his way. It seems to be the object of the Government to make it as difficult as possible for men to get their unemployment benefit, and to humiliate them and degrade them to every possible degree. It is as difficult for a poor man to get the benefits for which he has been compelled to pay, than it is for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. We are told that this is scientific administration. I call it scientific robbery.

We in West Ham are not ashamed. We have no apology to offer. Our men have challenged the Government. The members of the board of guardians are ready to stand in the dock if you will put them there. If you have the courage to put them there and make any charge against them, they are ready to go. Up to now, they have administered things to the best of their ability. They are clean and honest men and women, trying to do their best under difficult circumstances. A few years ago we had a scandal in West Ham and a great fuss was made in the country, but it was soon dropped when it was discovered that seven out of the eight people who had got into trouble were members of the two parties who occupy the other parts of the House, and not these benches. One Labour man was found in the cart, and he went through it. Not merely was he sent to prison, but he was expelled from the Labour party when we found out the game that he had been playing. The others came out of prison and they are very respectable people to-day, benefiting by the fact that they belong to the respectable parties. Our men and women are willing to go through any kind of investigation. Our record has been clean, as far as it is possible for human beings to be clean in public life.

The appointment by the Government of men to come to West Ham to administer our Poor Law affairs has demonstrated itself to be a failure. If the Government have no other idea of public administration than the appointment of paid officials of this sort, it is only another proof of their lack of foresight and their extravagance. They opposed us when we asked for one shilling allowance for lunch for men who spent from 10 o'clock in the morning until five o'clock in the evening, on three or four days in the week. They would not allow that and the auditor would not allow it as an allowance for food, although some of these men who were doing this public work were only casual labourers. The Government appoint men who have £1,500 a year, in addition to a pension of £800. Of course, they are honest men, while our people are supposed to be corrupt. As far as we are concerned, man for man and woman for woman we are cleaner than the people who have supplanted us.

This Amendment has been put down for the purpose of bringing these matters before the public. We who represent West Ham are willing to face you wherever and whenever you like and to take our stand as far as our administration is concerned. Our only crime has been to do justice to the people, as we know them. We have tried to help them in their adversity and through the valley of the shadow through which they have been passing. The fact that the benches of this House are so empty demonstrates that the Government have no case; but later on their supporters will be here. The men who will spend more on their dinner to-night than they are prepared to give to a man for food for a week, will come here, later on, with the tears glistened down their shirt fronts, and they will show what they think about West Ham and its board of guardians, and what they think of the people we represent. But a day of reckoning is coming, and when the facts are known and the truth is out West Ham will again be rehabilitated.

We have nothing to be ashamed of and nothing to hide. We can face the future with every confidence. We are not in the dock; those who are against us will be in the dock when the real issue is faced. We are anxious that this Government, having had the experience which they have had during the last 12 months of their pets administering public affairs, should go to West Ham and say, "Look what we have done for you! We have saved you a lot of money. We have reduced your rates. We have reduced your debt responsibilities. Now, having every confidence in the common sense of the people, we will send these three men about their business and allow you to elect your own board of guardians." I wish they would do that; but they do not do that. We in West Ham are not afraid; we are ready for any judgment that may be placed upon us, but we want the right hon. Gentleman to give definite answers to definite questions. How can he justify the policy that has been pursued? He cannot do so. Therefore, we want to draw attention to the fact that while the people of West Ham have been called upon to face their responsibilities, the Government instead of facing their responsibilities and tackling the problem, have been playing with public administration.

[Mr. J. Jones.]

Mr. W. THORNE: Up to the present we have not had present any hon. Member on the other side of the House who represents the district whose affairs we are discussing to-night. I believe I am right in saying that there are three hon. Members on the other side who represent the Poor Law area of West Ham, and one would have thought that they would have been in their place, either to back up the Government or to have something to say on the Poor Law administration of the district. I am much indebted to the three previous speakers for the excellent way in which they have put their case, more especially the hon. Member for Stratford (Mr. Groves). He gave the Committee a number of hard cases, as did also the hon. Member for East Ham, North (Miss Lawrence), and I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Silvertown (Mr. J. Jones) could have given a similar number of hard cases. I myself, during the last 11 months, have received at least 200 complaints from people living in my own Parliamentary Division or in the West Ham Poor Law area as to the harsh treatment they have received at the hands of the present Poor Law Commissioners. Twelve months ago it would have been impossible for such complaints to be raised in this House. Twelve months ago the old board of guardians was functioning, and the only complaint made against them was that they were a little generous in giving Poor Law relief to large numbers of men and women who were out of work or in very difficult circumstances. During the course of the Debates on the Boards of Guardians (Default) Act, on the Second Reading, during the Committee stage, on Report stage, and also on the Third Reading, the Minister of Health, and the Parliamentary Secretary also, used the words "corruption and mal-administration" on more than one occasion. If any hon. Member cares to look up the Debates he will find that these words were used many times.

Like my hon. Friends on this side of the House I shall be much interested if the Parliamentary Secretary or the Minister of Health himself, or the present Poor Law Commissioners, can supply the Committee with any information as to these mal-practices or corruption, which it is said went on during the time when the old board of guardians was in office. The Poor Law Commissioners have now been in office for 11 months, and I take it for granted that during that time that have made a minute examination of all the books of the old board of guardians, which are now in their possession, and it goes without saying that if there had been any cases of corruption or mal-administration that they would have been brought to the notice of the Minister of Health long before now. The only conclusion to which I can come is that the charges made against the old board of guardians have gone; that there is nothing of the nature of corruption or mal-administration. During the past 11 months I myself, as well as many of my colleagues, have put down questions to the Minister of Health about matters connected with the Poor Law administration in the area of West Ham and on every occasion we have been told that the Minister of Health has absolutely no control at all over the present Poor Law Commissioners. They are appointed in accordance with the Act which was passed by this House and have taken over all the duties and functions of the old board of guardians. If the Minister of Health has no control over the present Poor Law Commissioners, certainly, so far as the citizens of the Poor Law area are concerned, they have no control whatever. We can criticise them, but that is about all that we can do. We can bring harsh cases before the notice of this House from time to time and we can ask questions and get replies from the Minister of Health, who I take it sends down these questions to the Poor Law Commissioners in order to get their replies. But this is the only thing we can do. Where you have a properly constituted board of guardians you have some control, because every 12 months the citizens of particular wards in the area of West Ham, as in any other Poor Law area, have an opportunity of expressing their appreciation or disapproval of the work done by the board of guardians at the election which then takes place. But in the Poor Law area of West Ham, the whole population, or at any rate the whole of the voters, have been absolutely disfranchised and have no opportunity now of expressing their appreciation or disapproval of the work being done by the present Poor Law Commissioners; and as far as I can see we are never going to get any such opportunity. I think the term of office of these gentlemen expires about the middle of next month. At the moment, I am not certain of the actual date, nor do I know whether they are going to be re-selected. You cannot say that they are to be re-elected; but re-selected. If they are to be re-selected we do not know how long they are going to remain in office. We have been told that later on in the Session the Minister of Health intends to press forward as fast as he can with a measure of Poor Law reform. It has been announced in the House that the Government intend during the next Session to bring forward a Bill which will abolish the present boards of guardians in some, areas, if not in all. That is the information we gather from the Press. I know it may be out of order to discuss the Government's intentions with regard to this legislation, but we are led to understand that this Bill is coming forward and that there has been a compromise in the case of some rural areas that so far as they are concerned they will not be interfered with by the provisions of the Bill.

Another complaint we have to make is that the present Commissioners are not paying their way. I take it for granted that every council in every borough or rural area in this country—they number in all about 1,900—when it borrows money has a sinking fund to pay off principal and interest. I cannot imagine that any local authority would borrow money without setting up such a sinking fund. I am sure that if the present Chancellor of the Exchequer came along to the House next April, when introducing his Budget, and dispensed with his sinking fund, every Member of the House would cry out bitterly against the proposal. The sinking fund that was in operation in the Poor Law area of West Ham has to all intents and purposes been abandoned, though not altogether, for certain sums of money are being paid. I would remind the Committee that on 6th July, 1925, I asked the Minister of Health whether he was prepared to issue a statement showing the amount of loans lent to various boards of guardians in all parts of the country, with the rate of interest charged for each loan, and the amount of principal and interest paid each year. The reply given showed the amount of the loans raised by the various Poor Law authorities, and included a table showing the amount of interest and principal that should be repaid every year.

In this table I find that for the financial year 1925-26 the then Poor Law guardians of West Ham would be called upon to pay in principal and interest £239,644; and for 1926-27—I am not sure whether the table gives the figures to the end of September, 1927, or to the end of the financial year in March—the amount of principal and interest that the present Poor Law Commissioners, or the old board of guardians if it had been functioning, would have been called upon to pay was £328,563, and for 1927-28 £354,256. What we want to know is, what amount of money they have paid for 1925-26 out of that £239,644 and for 1926-27 what they have paid of the £328,513? I asked for that information because the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry on one or two occasions has said that the people of West Ham are well satisfied with the present administration, and I think he said that they have saved the ratepayers something like £800,000. If that be true, I would like him to explain how that saving has been made. Personally I should be exceedingly glad if it could be proved that the present Commissioners have saved the ratepayers that amount. If they have done so, the rates ought to have been reduced very much more than they have been. All that they have done is that

[Mr. W. Thorne.]

On two occasions, once for the half year ending September last, they reduced the poor law rate by 2d. in the £, which represents about £29,000. Therefore, a 4d. rate represents very much less than the £800,000 alleged to have been saved.

I shall be glad if the Parliamentary Secretary will tell us to-night the amount of money that they have repaid to the Treasury, or to the Goschen Committee, which is the same thing, and we shall then be able to judge whether they have really saved a 4d. rate or not. I am more than convinced that if they had been called upon to pay their way exactly as the old board of guardians would have been called upon to pay their way, this 4d. rate could not have been saved. If the present Commissioners are by good administration saving money for the ratepayers, well and good, but, as has been said, this amount of money has been saved at the expense of the poor people of West Ham. Whatever the Parliamentary Secretary may say, and whatever Sir Alfred Woodgate and his two colleagues may say, we know perfectly well that this amount of money has been saved at the expense of a very large number of poor people in West Ham. Numbers of cases have been given by my hon. Friend; where either the father is in work and is compelled to keep his unemployed son, or where the father is unemployed—there are large numbers of them out of work—and the sons are at work and the unemployed father has to be kept by the son, and so forth. I have had particulars of a case sent to me this morning.

Sir K. WOOD: Is that a case in Poplar?

Mr. W. THORNE: It is the case of a woman of the name of Boswell, who lives in Canning Town, and I do not know whether she is in my division or that of one of my hon. Friends. I know that one thing which will be flung at me to-night is that the present scale of relief was operating when Sir Alfred Woodgate was called upon to function for the Poor Law guardians. That is quite true. I do not dispute that statement, but why was the then board of guardians compelled to cut down the scale of relief? At that time, the maximum relief was 55s. a week for a man, wife and a certain number of children. The board of guardians was asking for a loan, and the Minister imposed conditions upon them. That gave rise to a quarrel which I had with some of my own friends in the borough, and which perhaps caused a great deal of irritation. I have been howled down on the public platform because I said I thought the guardians would have been wise had they accepted the advice which was given by myself, by the hon. Member for Silvertown (Mr. J. Jones), by the hon. Member for Stratford (Mr. Groves), and also by the hon. Member for East Ham North (Miss Lawrence).

If they had done so, the Board of Guardians (Default) Act would never have been brought in, because it was aimed at the borough of West Ham. Had they taken our advice, and accepted that loan, the Default Act would never have operated, but that is by the way. About two weeks before the Labour board of guardians were deposed, they had only a few thousand pounds in the bank, and because of the restricted means at their disposal, they had to bring down the scale of relief from 55s. to 40s. 6d. We know the Masonic understandings that are arrived at between the banking authorities and the Ministry of Health. There is no need to send letters to the manager of the bank, telling him how to deal with a situation like that. They can get through on the telephone and give a quiet whisper that the bank ought to do this or ought not to do that, and there is nothing in black and white to show what has been done. The bank refused to allow the guardians any more overdrafts, although they had been charging the guardians a very decent rate of interest. Since the present Poor Law Commissioners began to operate, the bank authorities are making it easy to get overdrafts and I think I am justified in saying that they are allowing the Commissioners more overdrafts at a lower rate of interest than they were allowing the guardians. They are trying to make it appear that the gentlemen who are now operating can do the work better than the board of guardians.

I do not know whether I shall be entitled on this occasion to raise the main question, but this Vote deals with the salary of the Minister, and all boards of guardians and necessitous areas are under his control. For a long time, in fact since 1921, a number of my colleagues and I have been pegging away at this question and have tried to impress on successive Governments the need for financial relief to the necessitous areas. Several schemes have been presented, including schemes prepared by the borough treasurer of West Ham, and, I think, also one by the City Corporation Poor Law authority. These schemes were placed before the committee which was set up to inquire into the question of the necessitous areas, but they have all been turned down. The present Minister of Health then concurred in the position which we on this side took up. We have said over and over again that it is unfair for a Poor Law area like West Ham or Bedwelty to have to bear a burden of this kind, and that the burden ought to be a national charge. On 20th June, 1922, I had the honour of introducing a deputation to the then Prime Minister, who was, I think, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George), and the present Minister of Health, then a humble Member of this House, was one of the deputation. I notice that there is all the difference in the world between a rank and file Member of this House and one who becomes a Minister. Apparently, when a Member becomes a Minister, he may have to eat some of the expressions which he has used as a private Member on one side or the other. This is a part of the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the present Minister of Health on that occasion:

"I do not think I need detain you but a very few minutes. I have been asked to speak on behalf of the boroughs rather than on behalf of the guardians. The case is very much the same from the general point of view. As ratepayers, we are not here to ask for relief in respect of the ordinary demands made on the guardians, but to point out that owing to the quite unprecedented circumstances connected with unemployment the burden is falling very heavily on certain industrial districts. The table appendix shows the number per thousand in receipt of relief. Birmingham has 8 per cent. of the population, and Coventry 6½ per cent. Then in the district between those two towns, about 20 miles away, a little while ago there were only 13 people who had applied for relief to the guardians, and they were able to find them employment by giving them jobs on the roads. Although that district is largely responsible, being on either side of it, it practically escapes any burden. We suggest that this is a national question and has been recognised as a national question by the passing of the Unemployment Act, and extending it to the whole country, and the burden ought to be more evenly distributed."

Some of the deputation said "Hear, hear!" to that statement, and the right hon. Gentleman proceeded:

"If you make the industrial districts bear the whole of the relief of the unemployed, you are going to increase the rates and the evil must still be remedied. It will cause them greater hardships. Out of some 650 Poor Law areas, only about 200 are seriously affected by this question of relief. That shows how very uneven this distribution is and that it should be spread a little more evenly. I have been asked to present the original petition from Walsall and Smethwick, and a number of other places." We all said "ditto" to that statement. That is our case. We have been pleading, ever since 1921, for the recognition of this grievance. Hon. Members opposite can say what they like to-night or at any other time as long as they are sitting on those benches, but there is no remedy for the present state of things, in West Ham or Bedwelty, or Birmingham or any of the large industrial centres throughout the length and breadth of the country unless there is a better method of fixing the incidence of taxation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope): The hon. Member has kept magnificently in order up to now, but he is proceeding to deal with a matter, in connection with which legislation would be necessary.

Mr. THORNE: I will conclude by hoping that the Parliamentary Secretary will give some reply to the questions which have been put to him by the hon. Members for East Ham, North, Stratford and Silvertown and to the question which I have put, which is very important, and see whether he can state the total amount of principal or interest that this present board of guardians have paid. That is the point I want to get at. If he can do that, the Committee will be able to observe to-morrow, when they read the OFFICIAL REPORT, whether the board of guardians are paying their way or otherwise. That is the acid test, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be frank and candid and say whether he can give the information. It will be very interesting to me and my colleagues, because we do not want unduly to criticise the present Poor Law authorities. If they are paying their way and saving the rates—not at the expense of the poor—and at the same time giving a proper scale of relief—I am quite sure that we shall be satisfied.

[Mr. W. Thorne.]

I know perfectly well what the Poor Law problem has been in West Ham ever since I have been in the borough for over 44 years, and it is worse to-day than when I first went there in the latter part of 1882. Personally, I believe it will be very much worse, and I do not see how you are going to get any relief unless by some scheme of finding work for men and women out of employment. The Blanesburgh Report admits that even if you get back to normal trade you are going to have 600,000 men and women on your hands for all time, and places like West Ham will have a decent number of them. Therefore, either this Government or some other Government will have to tackle this very important problem. I am not prepared to admit that this Government, or even a Labour Government, can solve the unemployment problem for the next few years to come, because I am more than ever convinced that this problem cannot be solved under the present commercial system. It is a physical impossibility because of the rapid introduction of scientific machinery and speeding up, for no employer of labour will lay out money for the purchase of any kind of mechanical appliances unless it is going to save wages, which in its turn means saving labour and thereby throwing men and women out of employment. We have got more men out than ever we had in spite of all the rapid methods of production. There are still over 1,000,000 out of work. As long as you have your present system, you can rest assured that you are going to have this very large number out of work, and as a preventive and palliative this Government, or some other Government, will be absolutely compelled to give some kind of relief to Poor Law necessitous areas, like West Ham and other places. The Committee may think I have made a rambling speech, but I have done my level best to put the case forward on behalf of the people of West Ham.

Mr. TEMPLETON: It was noticed a few minutes ago by some of my hon. Friends that I was in travail of speech, and I was reminded by an hon. Member that West Ham is not in Scotland. I quite realise that West Ham is not in Scotland, and, as a devoted Presbyterian, I humbly thank God for that. For the reason that West Ham is not in Scotland, it is not my intention to say anything at all on the subject of the West Ham Guardians, but rather, as the question before us is much broader and bigger than the consideration of one single part of the King's Dominions, again to draw the attention of the Minister to the position of people in a far more salubrious part of the country than West Ham can possibly be. It must be good, indeed, in midsummer that we should get a breath from the Moray Firth of the fine salt-laden air of that district, after hearing all this talk about West Ham, East Ham, and all the other Hams. Rather more than a year ago I put a question to the Minister of Health in regard to the position of share fishermen of the Moray Firth under the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, and asked him what was the intent of the Government in order to give these men and their families the benefits of that Measure. I received the reply from him that it was the intention of the Government some time to introduce a Measure to amend the National Health Insurance Act.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid if he wants legislation, the hon. Member is not in order in pursuing this matter. If it be within the discretion and power of the Minister, he can, but, if he wants a Bill, I am afraid he cannot raise it on this occasion.

Mr. TEMPLETON: I do not want to press for a Bill. I am merely recounting the history of my question to which this was the answer. The point I was putting depends very much on this answer being understood. He said that it was the intention of the Government to amend the National Health Insurance Act, because, as I have pointed out to the Parliamentary Secretary of Health in various conversations we have had, we have here on the Moray Firth a body of men whose weekly earnings for a vast number of years have not averaged £1 a week and who yet are not employed persons according to the meaning either of the National Health Insurance Act or the Act to which I am referring. Yet they are called upon, not only as ordinary taxpayers, to bear their share of the State's proportion of these benefits, but also as employers—six of them in every herring drifter being the employers of three employed persons—to pay their share of the employer's contribution in regard to the three employed men, all of whom are at least as well off as the share fisherman is himself.

In these circumstances, I should like to ask the Minister what he proposes to do. We have had some years of the worst possible trade when, on account of the socialisation of the means of distribution in Holy Russia! there has been a terrible falling off in their trade and industry in the purchase of the commodity they have to sell. On that account, they have been reduced to very great extremes of poverty, and they have been called upon, under a beneficent Measure, to bear increased taxation in order to provide funds for other people out of their meagre earnings. Much as I admire this Measure and approve of the principle of those who are in work and in health supporting those who are not, it puts these men in a position of having an extra burden placed on their shoulders while they themselves are not in any circumstances able to participate in the benefits which that burden brings.

I should like to press the Minister to consider their case and to make sure that there will be the means of bringing such men under the scope of this Measure, so that they may attain what benefits are going for the money they have paid. I have no wish to say anything in regard to West Ham or to any other question but this one. I have made this one of the things that I have pressed upon the Government and upon the Ministry at all times, in season and out of season. Here you have a body of men who are not grumblers or grouseers, nor are they those who call on the Government to do something to make it possible for them to live without working, but who are honest and industrious and hard-working and who have been hardly hit by the politics, not of this country but of another country, and who deserve well of this or any other Government in order that they may be able to earn an honest living and have that which they are paying for given to them in common with the other workers of the country.

Mr. MARCH: I believe we can safely say that the four representatives of East and West Ham have given very good illustrations as to the mismanagement of the Government's representatives on the board of guardians in West Ham, and it is very appetising to hear one of the Government's supporters complaining about their wonderfully exploited Widows and Orphans Pensions Act, which, no doubt, in many instances has done a great deal of good, but there are many anomalies in connection with that Act, one of which has been mentioned by the hon. Member for Banff (Mr. Templeton). In this Vote, I see that there are some expenses connected with that Act. We said, before it was passed by this House, that it was necessary that all widows should be included in that Measure, but the Government thought and said otherwise and were backed up by their supporters, but now, when they begin to have these anomalies brought home to them, it may make them think a little more.

In this Vote also is the question of grants, and we should like the Government to have continued making grants to assist the necessitous areas in the provision of work for able-bodied unemployed men in their districts. The withholding of such grants has meant that the work has been cut off and that larger numbers have been forced to go to the boards of guardians for assistance. I have in my hand a return that has been made by the clerk to the Poplar Board of Guardians, from which we find that at the end of last year no fewer than 200 a month were cut off from unemployment benefit and forced to go to the guardians for assistance. That is a big number, and, the council having completed practically all the work that it was allowed to put in hand with assistance from the Government, the only place to which these men can go is the board of guardians. There is a very large number of the men in the district of Poplar, which, like West Ham, is practically a dock area, who are only casual workers, and naturally their wives and families have to depend upon them from day to day. The result is that some 3,000 extra have been receiving relief from the board of guardians as compared with the year before, which naturally keeps up the guardians' expenditure.

[Mr. March.]

I can see, as the hon. Member for Stratford (Mr. Groves) has already said, men with whom I worked years ago gradually deteriorating, getting lower, getting weaker, and getting worse. I can also say, as a Justice of the Peace who is called upon on various occasions to go down to the workhouse under the Poplar Board of Guardians to certify people who have lost their reason, that I know they are increasing the numbers compared with two years ago. They are gradually being driven into the asylums; others are driven into the hospital under the board of guardians; and many of them are being driven into the workhouse itself. Their numbers are increasing month by month in those three institutions, and the cause of it is the long term of unemployment and the action of the Minister in telling boards of guardians that they must cut down their relief. It seems to us that the Minister thinks that the longer these people have been getting assistance from the guardians, the less they can do with, instead of requiring more. As you gradually cut them down, even if it is only by a shilling a week, it makes all the difference to the people in getting little nick-knacks that they could get with that shilling. The result is that they have to deny themselves of something or other, and denying themselves means making themselves weaker and more demoralised than they were before. Their only resort is to go into the workhouse or into the hospital, or, if they try to carry on and lose their reason, to get certified to go into the asylum.

Would it not be better, both for the Government and the country generally, to give these people reasonable food and conditions and to keep them out of the asylums? They cost more in the asylum or in the workhouse or in the hospital, and, therefore, we think that the Minister would be well advised to reconsider and review the whole position in those places, like West Ham and Poplar, where they have had these unemployed for so many years. We should very much like to see something done in the way of finding work for these people, but there are many of them who have been on Poor Law relief year in and year out, and there would be some difficulty in their being able to do the work, even if work were found for them, and then we should get the Minister and his supporters saying that these men do not want work when work is found for them. Mainly, it would be because they had got so weak and so demoralised that they could not do the work if they were called upon to do anything that was laborious at all. To avoid that, the best thing would be to find them useful employment and to pay them reasonable rates of wages. I should like to see that done, and I am sure that the men themselves in the district would prefer to be at work rather than to go either to the Employment Exchange or to the board of guardians. If the Minister can do something in that direction, he will be doing something that will be beneficial to the community at large.

Sir K. WOOD: I propose to-night to deal only with the main topic which has occupied the attention of the Committee, and I will suggest to hon. Members who have raised one or two other points—for instance, in connection with widows' pensions, or, like my hon. Friend the Member for Banff (Mr. Templeton), who raised a very important point so far as a very excellent body of men are concerned—that we shall be able, I have no doubt, to go into those matters further on Wednesday next, when again the Estimates of my Department will be before the Committee. I have no doubt that on that occasion it will be possible further to explore the point which has been raised by the hon. Member for South Poplar (Mr. March). The hon. Member for Stratford (Mr. Groves), who opened this discussion, raised two matters. The first was in connection with the administration of the Blind Persons Act, and the other was in connection with the administration of poor relief in his constituency. I want to say a few words with reference to blind persons, and to assure the Committee and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for St. Pancras (Captain Fraser), who is deeply interested in this matter, that considerable progress is being made in the administration of the Blind Persons Act. If one wanted a test—not by any means the best test, but certainly a test—of the work that is being done, one has only to look at the assistance which has been afforded by the local authorities and by the State. In 1921-22 the local authorities contributed only some £14,600 towards assisting blind persons, whilst this year, 1926-27, it is estimated that no less than £173,928 is to be given by the local authorities alone.

There is the same record of advance in the contributions from the State. In 1921 the State contributed £69,886, whilst in the present year we estimate that a sum of £113,000 will be given. I have not finished when I have made that statement, because one of the best things in connection with the administration of this Act is the great assistance obtained from voluntary sources. I am very glad to say there has been no reduction in the contributions from the many people who do so much to help the blind. During the year 1922-23 the total income of the 130 voluntary agencies to which grants are given was £378,535, and in the year 1925-26 that sum had actually risen to £420,473.

Mr. KELLY: Do you suggest that is adequate to deal with this big problem?

Sir K. WOOD: Opinions differ on the question of adequacy, but at any rate in all these cases—contributions from the local authorities and the State, and assistance through voluntary agencies—there has been a very great increase indeed, and to that extent we are progressing.

Captain GARRO-JONES: Can the hon. Gentleman tell the Committee to which of these blind societies he allots the sums contained in this Vote and what are the amounts.

Sir K. WOOD: These sums provided by the State are given to some 130 approved voluntary associations. I could not give the names to-night, but if the hon. and gallant Member is interested in any particular association I shall be glad to give him any information I can. The final point I wish to make about the observation made by the hon. Member for West Ham in this connection is this. I rather gathered from his speech that at some time or other he wanted my Department, so far as the administration of this Act is concerned, to put all these blind persons under the sole supervision of the State—to rely solely on the assistance of the State. I venture to suggest that to do that would be a very great mistake indeed. One of the best features of the administration of the Act is that we are able to co-operate with the many splendid voluntary associations which are carrying on this work.

Mr. B. SMITH: Will the hon. Member give us the administrative costs of these various associations? We have heard a story that it costs a sovereign to give a sovereign away. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will confirm that statement, or otherwise.

Sir K. WOOD: If the hon. Member will put a question to me upon that point, and we have the information, I shall be glad to give it to him. I myself have heard of no criticism in this connection so far as the voluntary agencies for the blind are concerned, and I think the hon. Gentleman who occupied my position previously would confirm that. Whatever views we may take about that, and whatever the facts may be, I want to emphasise the point that we ought to be very careful indeed before handing over to the sole care of the State these people, who are deserving of very great help, because very likely we should endanger the voluntary contributions which are given at the present time. I think we are pursuing the right policy in assisting by State contributions properly-approved voluntary associations and leaving the work to a large extent in their hands.

The principal subject which has occupied the time of the Committee to-night has been the administration of Poor Law relief in West Ham. I would like to make some observations upon the statements which have been made by hon. Members opposite without, I venture to say, much reflection on their part and without many facts to assist them. Some of them I can only term as extraordinary statements. What is the present position so far as the administration of Poor Law relief in West Ham is concerned, and what are the intentions of the Minister towards the present administration? That question has just been put to me by the hon. Member for Plaistow (Mr. W. Thorne). The legal position is this: Last year, the House passed the Board of Guardians (Default) Act, passed it by a very large majority indeed, after the presentation of a very strong case for interfering with the normal course of local administration in West Ham. Under that Act my right hon. Friend was empowered to appoint guardians in substitution for those who would be disqualified from serving, if the terms of the Act came into operation. My right hon.

[Sir K. Wood.]

Friend exercised that power in connection with West Ham, and, I think, two other local authorities. In West Ham he appointed guardians who have been conducting the administration of Poor Law relief in that area. The period of 12 months for which the guardians were in the first instance appointed expires on 18th July next. So far from being dissatisfied, as three or four hon. Members opposite appear to have been, with the administration of that area by the newly-appointed guardians, my right hon. Friend, and I think the great majority of hon. Members in this House, and, if I may say so, the great majority of people in West Ham—

Mr. W. THORNE: Rubbish!

Sir K. WOOD:—and, if I may so, the great majority of people who have followed events there, take the view that these guardians have certainly carried out their work with great success, with great benefit to the district, and without doing harm to a single deserving person. Holding that view, my right hon. Friend proposes, and has taken the necessary steps, to continue the newly-appointed guardians for a further term of six months, which is the maximum period of extension allowed by the Act under, I think, Clause 2. The grounds upon which the Minister of Health asks for the extension of that period and the further postponement of the election of guardians is that, although good work has been done and great progress has been made, the work of the newly-appointed guardians, in his judgment, in restoring normal conditions in West Ham in the matter of relief, and the restoration of its financial stability, is still incomplete.

For a few minutes I want to justify the decision which has been arrived at, and answer some of the statements which have been made. So far from regarding the appointment of the newly-appointed guardians in West Ham as an attack upon democratic government the position, so far as West Ham is concerned, is that the more one considers the fact the more one must be driven to the conclusion that but for the temporary appointment of these new guardians the ordinary type of democratic government in West Ham would have absolutely failed altogether.

I thought to-night when I heard the statements made by hon. Members opposite, and particularly by the hon. Member who opened the Debate, that they must have very short memories indeed, and they must have entirely forgotten the situation and the state of affairs which existed when the Minister of Health stepped in and asked the House to pass the Boards of Guardians (Default) Act.

What was the position under the old dispensation? The hon. Member for Plaistow seems to have forgotten a good many of the things which he used to support in the days of the old dispensation, because at the end of the last financial year for which they were responsible the balance of outstanding loans in West Ham was £1,525,000 or equivalent to a rate of 11s. 7d. in the £. On May 1st, 1926, the number of persons actually in receipt of relief in the West Ham Union was 70,506, or 919 per 10,000 of the population. At that time, the banks had refused to lend any more money to the guardians. The hon. Member for Plaistow told us that someone had to get on to the telephone to advise the banks not to lend the old board of guardians any more money, but that was quite an unnecessary operation. The reason was perfectly plain, and it was because bankruptcy was certainly in sight. What was, in my opinion, almost worse, was not the financial aspect but the grave moral results which had followed the policy of the old West Ham Board of Guardians, because many people had been taught in that district that it was far better to be in receipt of relief than to be at work. At that time there were numerous cases where a man and a family of five were far better off in receipt of relief than the family would have been if the man had been at work at the rates of wages then obtaining. In dealing with the old board of guardians the hon. Member for West Ham—

Mr. W. THORNE: Which hon. Member do you mean?

Sir K. WOOD: I mean the hon. Member who opened the discussion (Mr. Groves). He stated in dealing with the old guardians that the Minister of Labour had acted very unfairly, and 10.0 p.m. had simply relied on an auditor's report, a copy of which he had 12 months ago. There was a good deal more than that. Hon. Members representing the West Ham district would no doubt recollect the many admissions which were made by individual members of the West Ham Board of Guardians in public addresses which, so far as their own administration was concerned, admitted that they had failed to realise their duties, and had entirely abused their membership as members of the West Ham Board of Guardians. I only need to remind the Committee, in order to justify the steps taken, of a statement which was made by Mr. Killick, the Vice-Chairman of the West Ham Board of Guardians, who is a Labour representative and the agent of the hon. Member for Plaistow, who said:

“He must admit that Mr. Ward was correct when he charged the Socialists with using the guardians’ relief for political and personal ends. He regretted he had to say that the way in which some of his colleagues were canvassing the unemployed had become such a scandal that something would have to be done to put a stop to it.”

At a meeting of the same board of guardians on 10th June last year Mr. Killick said:

“Some of the things done in the name of the West Ham Guardians, well the least we can do is to be ashamed of them. When you are elected as guardians you do not go to give out-relief as though you were giving away hand-bills. We have been landed in this position by people who have entirely abused their membership of the Board of Guardians.”

Therefore, there is no need to look in any auditor’s Report to justify the grounds upon which the Minister of Health acted when he removed the members of the West Ham Board of Guardians from office. I know that is the view of the hon. Member for Plaistow, because I saw an account of a gathering held at the Public Hall, Canning Town, on Saturday night to commemorate the hon. Member’s 21st year as a member of Parliament. I will quote a few sentences from the “Daily Herald” in which the Member for Plaistow said:

“Criticisms of his political conduct had come from the Communists, and it was the outside pressure of the Communists which had spoiled the previous good work of the West Ham Guardians, with the result that the Commissioners had stepped in.”

Mr. THORNE: I said that, and I do not withdraw it.

Sir K. WOOD: How anyone can say that the Minister of Health was not right in removing men from position of trust and responsibility who, upon their own confession had abused the position in which they had been put by the rate-payers, or how anyone can say that that was not a proper and necessary course for anyone to take passes my comprehension. There is also this to be said, in considering the position of West Ham at the present moment, and whether any alteration should be made in the present position, and whether we should go back to the old state of affairs—

Mr. GROVES: Before the hon. Gentleman passes from the point with which he is now dealing, I would like to ask him whether the charge of the Minister of Health that there was a reign of unabashed corruption is just confined to the statement referred to by the Vice-Chairman of the old board, or whether he himself, on behalf of the Minister of Health, is going to give us some instances of corruption and not rely on the quotations given from the speech of a local gentleman?

Sir K. WOOD: I do not propose to do that. It would not serve any purpose, when the Vice-Chairman of the Board himself, and a Labour representative, gets up and says that the unemployed have been canvassed in such a way that it has become a scandal, and that something must be done to stop it, and says also that the guardians have been using relief for political and personal ends. When a person makes a statement like that—a person who is in a responsible position, and a man who is speaking with some authority—and such a statement comes not from a Tory or Liberal representative but from a Labour man, a Vice-Chairman of the Board and probably the most competent Member on that side—when such a man gets up and says that the board of guardians are using relief funds for political and personal ends, I do not think anyone need make much further inquiry into the matter.

Mr. W. THORNE: Is that the only case you can give us?

Mr. DUNNICO: Is not the real point, not the reason why the old guardians were removed, but whether there is any starvation under the existing guardians, because they are not doing their duty?

Sir K. WOOD: If the hon. Member would allow me to leave this matter—

Miss LWRENCE: We do not want the Parliamentary Secretary to leave this matter, but we want him to give us one solitary case of corruption.

Sir K. WOOD: If the hon. Lady would forgive me, I would point out again that when a person gets up and says, "My friends are using relief funds for their political and personal ends," there is not much need to inquire further.

Mr. GROVES: Does the Parliamentary Secretary now allege that Mr. Killick, the Vice-Chairman, when he made that statement, was referring to himself and pleaded guilty to such conduct?

Sir K. WOOD: No, Sir; I commend Mr. Killick's straightforwardness and honesty. I think his statement can be relied upon. I do not think he was using that statement in reference to himself, but that he was pleading guilty on behalf of his friends, and I do not think there is much more to be said about it. I want to make this further point. There is no reason, so far as I can make out, for the statement that the attitude of the old guardians, if I may call them so, towards the administration was changed at all. I remember, and I think my hon. Friend the Member for Plaistow also remembers, the time when my right hon. Friend the Minister and myself had an interview with the old board of guardians, and endeavoured, very patiently indeed, to get them to mend their ways. On one occasion we suggested to them that it would be reasonable that they should give consideration to a further lowering of the scale, and more particularly having regard to the administration of other districts which were in just as difficult a position. They said, "Well, we cannot give a reply now. We will come back and give you a reply in a few days' time." I asked them why it was necessary to delay, and they said, "We must go back and consult the unemployed." It is a fact, as my hon. Friend opposite knows, that they actually summoned an open-air meeting of the unemployed to consult them as to whether a scale of relief should be refused or not.

Mr. W. THORNE: I wish the Parliamentary Secretary would tell the truth. It is very aggravating to hear statements like that made when the hon. Member knows it is untrue.

Sir K. WOOD: Then that does show some little disregard for the office they held and for which they were responsible. I notice that they have been intervening on occasions in the district in a manner which is certainly not encouraging good administration there. The Mover of the Resolution complained of the effort which the new board of guardians, the appointed board of guardians in West Ham, were making to obtain repayment of relief which had been given by way of loan. I should have thought that, when one was satisfied that there was some needy person to whom a loan had been advanced, it was not an improper thing to ask that person to repay a certain sum of money. The newly-appointed board of guardians took the view—a very correct one—that in proper cases it was their duty to obtain repayment of those funds in the best manner they could. This is the sort of thing that happens when this course is being taken. This, again, is a quotation from a paper which is said to represent the views of hon. Members opposite. It is a quotation from Mr. Killick, who seems to have fallen away from the high position he occupied at an earlier stage in the proceedings:

"Mr. Killick said that he was advising all those who received a demand for repayment of relief loans to ignore it completely on the ground that the average worker had no reserve funds, even while he worked, out of which he could repay money to which, after all, he had contributed, as a ratepayer."

Even people in work—it did not make the slightest difference. The vice-chairman of the board, and probably the most influential man in Poor Law matters in this area, shows his interest in the state of affairs in the neighbourhood, and his regard for the difficulties of the situation, and for what undoubtedly were the very onerous duties which confronted the newly-appointed board, and advised those who were listening to him, irrespective of whether they had the means to pay, irrespective of whether they were in work or not, that they should decline to make any attempt to repay loans in those circumstances. When you see that sort of thing it is not encouraging, and it does not encourage the majority of Members in this House to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. Lady the Member for East Ham North (Miss Lawrence) to get rid of the newly-appointed board of guardians, and, I suppose, by some means or other, to get the old board back in their place again. As a matter of fact, the situation, so far as the newly-appointed board are concerned, and what they brought about in West Ham, is a very remarkable, a very interesting, and a very satisfactory one, and I think the best comment on it has been made by a newspaper which is not a Government newspaper, but which is very critical of the Government at the present time. That newspaper published an article at the end of last year, after there had been some opportunity of seeing the work of the newly-appointed guardians in West Ham. The article was headed "The Transformation," and it said this:

"Opinions may differ as to the propriety of appointing three unelected and unrepresentative finance experts to supersede the popularly elected West Ham Guardians, but everyone will gasp at the transformation that they have produced. No little child ever intervened in the domestic infelicities of its parents in melodrama with greater effect than the Government Board of Guardians amid the bewildering tangle of West Ham finance. The deposed Committee of 56 borrowed at the rate of £700,000 a year. The superimposed Committee of three have no yet asked for a loan. Instead, the burdens of the ratepayers have been lightened to the extent of £28,000, which amounts to 2d. in the £ reduction on the rates for the half-year. Admittedly, their success is due to the fact that they were dealing with a chaotic situation. Extravagance had reigned unchallenged. There was over-staffing"—

I suppose that has some reference to the staffing question that was raised to-night—

"excessive payment of relief, and lack of the most elementary inquiries and most ordinary supervision in its administration. The charges of corruption have been vigorously denied, but not the most vociferous of the guardians' supporters would insist that the administration of the West Ham finances was not decidedly muddle-headed. But the whole proceedings of the committee of three reveal one trenchant fact. If, in the event of certain most disastrous political permutations and commutations, the electorate is ever faced with a choice between Socialism and autocracy, it will have no difficulty in making up its mind which is the more economical and efficient."

That was in the "Star" newspaper of the 28th December, 1926, and undoubtedly it sums up in very striking phrases the really wonderful transformation which has taken place in West Ham during the last few months.

Mr. W. THORNE: What did they know about the administration?

Sir K. WOOD: I can tell the Committee this, that there has certainly been a remarkable reduction in pauperism. I have the figures here for the week, for instance, ending on the 27th March, 1926, when the total number of persons in receipt of outdoor relief was 65,813, and the total amount of outdoor relief given was £27,423. On the 26th March, 1927, the total number of persons in receipt of outdoor relief had actually decreased to 41,054, and the total amount of outdoor relief which had to be expended was reduced to £11,950. I learned to-night, as other Members of the House who have been present have learned, of certain statements, particularly the statement made by the hon. Gentleman who moved the reduction of this Vote, of a certain number of cases which he has produced, so far as I am concerned, for the first time. One case, he told the Committee, he discovered in the procession, I think on Saturday or Sunday—

Mr. GROVES: Do not you know when the procession took place?

Sir K. WOOD: No, I do not; I think it must have been on Sunday.

Mr. THORNE: That shows your ignorance of general affairs.

Sir K. WOOD: At any rate, I understand that in the course of this procession the hon. Gentleman came across someone or other who produced a letter to him making some complaint against the West Ham Board of Guardians, and the hon. Gentleman has produced that letter to-night, with five or six others. It is, of course, obviously impossible for me, as the hon. Gentleman knows very well, not having allowed me to see those letters before the Debate, to reply to cases of that kind. All I can say is that, if he will send them to me, I will send them to the guardians for investigation.

Mr. GROVES: They have been to them. I would not bring them to you before they had been to the guardians. I always work upwards.

Sir K. WOOD: I hope that next time, when the hon. Member is working upwards, he will begin a little earlier, so that I have them in time for the Debate that takes place. The hon. Member for Plaistow mentioned one or two cases to-night, one of which, at any rate, was a very good example of the type of case that is thrown about without investigation so far as the present board of guardians is concerned. I do not want to mention the name to-night. The hon. Member for Plaistow wrote to the newly-appointed West Ham Board of Guardians on the 20th instant calling their attention to the case of a man who lives at Plaistow and the chairman of the board had the case investigated. This is a copy of a letter that has been addressed to the hon. Member.

[Sir K. Wood.]

Mr. THORNE: Am I quoted?

Sir K. WOOD: I am dealing with a case which the hon. Member has sent to the board of guardians.

Mr. THORNE: I have not used it in this House.

Sir K. WOOD: I am giving it as an example of the necessity of careful investigation before these cases are put before the Committee or outside as evidence that the present board of guardians are not dealing with their duties properly.

Mr. THORNE: Is it not rather unfair for the hon. Gentleman to use a case that I have never touched in the House at all? If I have a bad case I do not bring it here. You do not think I am fool enough for that, do you?

Sir K. WOOD: The hon. Member seems unduly apprehensive. I will read the explanation which has been forwarded to him by the chairman of the board of guardians. He says:

"This man, aged 41 years, has been continuously on relief since January, 1922. He has served two terms of imprisonment for deserting his wife and children during this period and one term of three months' hard labour as a rogue and vagabond. Under the previous Board of Guardians, he was specially assisted to the extent of £10 in order to start a business. Within a short time of receiving this money he was again applying for relief. This is also a case in which administrative efforts must be devoted to make the man work. He is at present receiving discretionary relief for short periods."

Mr. THORNE: Does the hon. Gentleman think—I want to be fair to myself as well as to him—that after I had that information I would touch the man again with a 40-foot pole?

Sir K. WOOD: No, I am sure the hon. Member would not. All I am quoting the letter for is to warn hon. Members that before cases are taken up, they should be verified and checked. The hon. Member who moved this reduction made some extraordinary statement that the newly-appointed board of guardians during the last fortnight had been, as far as I could make out, faking their books and writing against certain entries of people who were in receipt of relief some time ago the words "On loan." He told a tale that was certainly worthy of Edgar Wallace, but I had an opportunity to-night of asking the chairman of the board, who is an interested listener to the Debate, whether there was any truth in the statement that anyone had been at the books and, by his direction or authority, written in those words. He has no knowledge whatever of such a thing. It may surprise the hon. Member to know that apparently the only person who has been having anything to do with the books during the last few weeks is the Government auditor, and I suppose the hon. Member will not accuse him of writing in the words "On loan."

Mr. GROVES: The hon. Gentleman has either misquoted me or misunderstood what I said. I did not say in the past fortnight. I said up to the past fortnight. That puts a different complexion on it. I was referring to people who had loans, so-called—that is, money—during the general strike period.

Sir K. WOOD: I understand that there was no such intention as suggested by the hon. Gentleman. At any rate, the Committee may take it from me, whatever the cause, the newly-appointed board of guardians, as far as I and the Chairman are aware, have not touched the books.

Mr. GROVES: I do not want this Committee to think that I made a statement here that I am going to withdraw. I am willing to prove it. I do not want to take up many moments, but please understand that the books to which I am referring are the books that are in the office of the relieving officer. I know nothing about the Public Auditor or the Chairman seeing this. I do not suppose for a moment that the Chairman knows anything about this. They are what are called the Application or Order Books. It is an important matter. You are not going to get away like that, when people believe they were granted money by the old guardians. I am prepared to produce in any office the hon. Gentleman likes, in the presence of the Chairman, the persons who granted the relief, that is, the old guardians. And they did not grant it on loan. I am prepared to produce the persons who put in the books since the guardians have been deposed or defunct "on loan." That is a fair offer, is it not?

Sir K. WOOD: I shall be very glad to hear from those gentlemen. What good any person could serve through writing those words "on loan," I do not know.

Mr. GROVES: You know very well, you can recover by law when money is granted by guardians on the pretext of a loan. You have to prove that in the County Court.

Sir K. WOOD: The hon. Gentleman is now making a very serious statement. The board of guardians of West Ham have by some means or other, or someone on their behalf, or without their authority, has written the words "on loan" in the books on the assumption that they were going to endeavour to get people to repay money granted on loan which in fact had never been so granted.

Mr. GROVES: The hon. Gentleman referred to the agitation in West Ham. The agitation put up was that any man who got money from the guardians on loan ought honourably to repay it, but any person who got money, I understand, which was not on loan should now be compelled to repay it through these words being put in after the old guardians, as such, had died.

Sir K. WOOD: As far as these guardians are concerned, I happen to know of a number of cases which have been taken to Court. In fact, there have only been 101 cases taken to Court, and in each case the guardians have had to prove their case and in every case the order was made on the defendant with costs. So I venture to suggest to the Committee, that while I shall certainly inquire, as far as it lays in my power, into the statement of the hon. Gentleman, there could be no possible motive for any board of officials taking steps of that kind. As a matter of fact, a very large number of people in West Ham, notwithstanding the very bad advice given to them which I quoted just now, have paid back the money. The actual amount already paid quite voluntarily by a number of people is a sum of over £5,000. Therefore, there is no need for anyone to fake any books or to put words in the books which were improper or which ought not to appear there. As far as the appointment of the board of guardians is concerned, it certainly must be most satisfactory to the great majority of the ratepayers of the district. Borrowing has entirely stopped, and apart from a loan of £300,000 which the appointed guardians had immediately to request to meet the deficiency which they found in the finances of the union no other loan has been raised in respect of the current expenditure of the union. As far as the rate is concerned, there has been a reduction of 4d. since they came into office.

Mr. THORNE: Tell us about the expenditure.

Sir K. WOOD: The hon. Member put a question to me which I will answer as far as the information I have in my possession goes.

Mr. THORNE: What about the repayment of principal?

Sir K. WOOD: The hon. Member, and the hon. Member for East Ham, North, raised a question about not having to repay principal. The position was fully discussed before the Goschen Committee. It was not a matter for the Minister of Health. The guardians represented to the Goschen Committee that they had succeeded in reducing their expenditure on relief to such an extent that they would be able, without recourse to further borrowing, to meet the current expenditure on relief and administration and on the interest on the outstanding loans, and to make some provision for a working balance, but that they would, in order to avoid further borrowing, require some accommodation in the matter of principal repayments. The Committee fully considered the matter and agreed to postpone, temporarily, two instalments of principal, due at September, 1926, and March, 1927, and to discuss further with the guardians the payments to be made on account of principal after that date.

[Sir K. Wood.]

Repayment of principal will be made in September, 1927, of over £80,000, and the provision for repayment during the remaining half year to March, 1928, will be discussed with the guardians before the Budget of that half year is drawn up.

Mr. THORNE: The hon. Member has not given me the difference between what they should have paid and what they have paid.

Sir K. WOOD: I have given the hon. Member all the information I have. There are few boards of guardians of whom it can be said, as it can be said of the newly appointed board of guardians for West Ham, that the annual reduction in the expenditure of the union has reached a figure of over £800,000. I wish every board of guardians could do equally as well in other parts of the country. This Act, although there has been a good deal of complaint about it this afternoon, has certainly proved of great assistance in Poor Law administration throughout the country generally. I remember saying on the Second Reading of the Bill that, in my judgment, this Act would not have to be put into force in very many cases. I think it has only had to be put into force in two or three cases. This Act has undoubtedly prevented any great abuse of local administration. A little time ago, I saw a report of the proceedings of the Bermondsey Board of Guardians, and a statement made by the chairman to a deputation which had made further demands upon the union, with which they were not prepared to comply. The chairman of the board, who is a Labour member, and the board is a Labour board, in reply to the demand said—this shows that this Act has been of some use in places other than West Ham—that:

“The Board's accounts already show a deficit of over £75,000. An increase of the Bermondsey scale would necessitate an application to the Minister of Health, and he felt sure that instead of sanctioning it the Minister would gladly seize the opportunity of superseding the Bermondsey Board.”

The guardians declined to accede to the demand. I suggest to the Committee that when they come to give a vote to-night on this question, which has been particularly related to West Ham, they will consider that no reduction was ever less justified than the one proposed. If anybody has earned the commendation and the thanks of this Committee, and of the public of West Ham generally, it is the newly appointed Poor Law Commissioners, and I hope the Committee will agree that my right hon. Friend is acting wisely in extending their term for another period of six months in the hope that still further economies will be achieved, without interfering or working harshly in the case of any single deserving individual.

Miss LAWRENCE: Will the hon. Member kindly answer the two specific cases I gave him, as to which he has said nothing?

Sir K. WOOD: I did not reply to these cases because I have already communicated with the hon. Member in writing and given her a reply. The West Ham Board of Guardians have to pay attention to the present condition of the law, just as any other board of guardians, and they are not permitted, in giving relief, to ignore contributions which come from outside sources unless they are specially exempted by Act of Parliament. There are only two exceptions, one in relation to Friendly Societies, and the other is another case specially provided for by Parliament. Except in these two cases every board of guardians has to have regard to the income derived by the family. The board of guardians are no doubt acting perfectly within the law. They do not make the law, they are fulfilling the law as it is at present.

Miss LAWRENCE: Is it the law to make brother keep brother?

Mr. GREENWOOD: We have not had to-night a reply to the arguments put forward but a rehash of the case put before this House when the Board of Guardians Default Act was introduced. The Parliamentary Secretary is relying on the docile majority behind him instead of on argument. He knows perfectly well that it does not much matter what he says. He has a majority of 200 to support him, and this vote is not a vote against the old board of guardians or for the new board of guardians, it is a vote against the Government; that is what we intend it to be. Early in the Debate the hon. Member for North East Ham (Miss Lawrence) said that she was not going to make any appeal to the Minister; she did not believe he was ever moved by pity or humanity. That is perfectly true. To the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health and the Parliamentary Secretary, as well as the large mass of hon. Members on the other side, to be poor is to be a criminal. On both sides of the House we agree that poverty is a crime. We believe that poverty is a crime, but right hon. and hon. Members opposite seem to think that the individual pauper is a criminal. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] It is perfectly true. The action of the right hon. Gentleman and the Parliamentary Secretary in their legislation and their administration goes to prove that they have a contempt for the poor. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] Hon. Members opposite may smile, but it is perfectly true. They are prepared to see the laws of this land administered against the poor in a way against which they would revolt if they were administered against themselves. The hon. Lady who spoke said she wished she had eloquence to move the Committee. No eloquence can move hon. Members opposite. Provided it can be shown that the rates have been saved and that, artificially, pauperism has been reduced, hon. Members opposite will be quite happy. We are told, in all seriousness, I presume, that West Ham is satisfied with its appointed guardians. Time will prove. The Minister of Health has extended their lease of life to the maximum allowed under the Act—for a further six months. At the end of that time, there will have to be a re-election. I hope the three appointed guardians will then face the ratepayers. I am prepared to prophesy now that, faced with the electors who are to-day said to be satisfied, they would be rejected with enormous majorities against them.

The chief part of the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary has been devoted to recounting ancient history, and to repeated references to Mr. Bert Killick, who apparently has two characters, when he rightly protests against the policy of certain members of the Board, and when he stands for the representatives of the Board. The hon. Gentleman quotes Mr. Killick with sympathy and gives him his support on the one hand, but when he takes a stand against the repayment of relief by men who on full wages are earning less than £2 per week, he earns the criticism of the hon. Gentleman. But the question before the Committee is not the statement of Mr. Killick. The question before the Committee is the administration by the appointed guardians set in authority over the people of West Ham without their approval by the Minister of Health. We have not had a complete defence of their administration. We have had served up again—we know off by heart now what Mr. Killick said—the old statements that were used by the old board of guardians. That does not matter; they are dead. What we should have liked to have heard more of was a defence of the new board of guardians. One argument the Parliamentary Secretary adduced. It was that pauperism had been reduced. Is that a serious claim? Pauperism, official pauperism, can be reduced just as easily as official unemployment. Pauperism in this country, if all boards of guardians were as flinty-hearted as the Guardians of West Ham, could be reduced very substantially, but the number of the suffering poor would remain the same.

There may have been cases of extravagance—it is admitted—but this reduction of pauperism means that a proportion of people who had been legitimately in receipt of out-relief are to-day being denied it. What the appointed guardians are doing is to put the cost of pauperism on the community as a whole, in debilitation, in impaired health, in disease and death, so that the hon. Gentleman may be able to tell us that there has been a saving of £800,000. It is false economy. It is no saving. If the three guardians are to-day allowing a single child in West Ham to suffer in health because of their administration, their £800,000 saving, so far as I am concerned, does not matter a jot. The pride of the Minister is that they have reduced the rates in West Ham. They have done so by reducing the official figure of pauperism—that is by cutting off the relief given to people who had it before, a large number of whom, I earnestly believe, are still entitled to it. They have done so by not honouring the contractual obligations of the board of guardians to the Goschen Committee. The Parliamentary Secretary draws a distinction between taking a loan and not paying what you owe. I suggest they are both the same thing and that, were the [Mr. Greenwood.] old board of guardians still in existence, they would presumably have been borrowing some money, but they would have been repaying to some extent capital and interest just as in the last half-year of their operations they repaid £127,297. [HON. MEMBERS: "How much did they borrow?"] I am not saying they did not borrow. [Laughter.] I wish hon. Gentlemen would not be so frivolous on a serious matter. I do not suppose I shall be able to make them understand my argument, but I will try to do so, if they will allow me. Had the old board of guardians continued they would probably have been borrowing money. [HON. MEMBERS: "More money!"] Of course they would be borrowing money in addition to the amount they had already borrowed, but the first act of the new guardians was to borrow £300,000.

The old board of guardians would however have paid back some of the capital and interest due under the agreement with the Goschen Committee. They would have borrowed money just as the new guardians did but in order to achieve this extraordinary result of a reduction of 4d. in the rates, the new guardians went cap in hand to the Goschen Committee instead of paying their just debts and were permitted to postpone those debts. That is accepted as equivalent to a loan, so that the net result of the operations of this precious body of autocrats is that they have borrowed money, that they have not paid what they ought to have paid and that they have reduced pauperism by increasing suffering among the people. A number of cases have been brought before the Committee. All that the Parliamentary Secretary did by way of reply was to treat rather frivolously my hon. Friend's reference to the case of a man he saw yesterday and a case, not brought before the House by the hon. Member for Plaistow (Mr. W. Thorne), but one on which, no doubt, there may have been something to be said, and in regard to which my hon. Friend thought at least there was a prima facie case which he was entitled to bring up before the board of guardians. How many times have hon. Members opposite brought prima facie cases before the Minister of Pensions and found out that they were not good cases to which they could give support and have presumably let them drop? That is the kind of case for which my hon. Friend was pilloried by the Parliamentary Secretary. But the Parliamentary Secretary did not reply to a number of cases. What he said was that it was very important that the facts should be verified. There were these cases, two of them cases of the children of ex-service men where the facts were admitted. Here, as my hon. Friend informed the House, is the letter signed by the Parliamentary Secretary himself, which admits that the facts are substantially correct.

Sir K. WOOD: Will the hon. Member read what I said at the conclusion of the letter?

Mr. GREENWOOD: Certainly, the letter says:

"These inquiries show that the facts stated in the note are, at any rate, substantially correct"— and it goes on at the end of the letter to say:

"This decision is one within the legal discretion of the guardians, and the Minister, even if he desired to do so, has no authority to require the decision to be reconsidered."

Let me give some cases. There are two cases in regard to which the Parliamentary Secretary had no reply. He has told us, with the intention of justifying the new board of guardians, that they have reduced pauperism and saved money and reduced the rates by 4d. in the £. The first case is that of a man married to a war widow, and between them there are six children, four of them step-children of the man, and two of them children of the second marriage. They are paying a rent of 18s. 3½d. per week, and living in two, or at the most three, rooms—or they were. Because of their poverty, they were driven to sub-let a room, for which they get 4s. 6d., and the net rent they have to pay is 8s. 9d. per week. These step-children have a war pension amounting in the aggregate to 23s. 6d. per week. It was the intention of Parliament that that money should be devoted to those children and should not be diverted to any other purpose whatever. Previously the pensions of those children were not taken into account by the board of guardians, and quite rightly. There is nobody in this House who dare get up and say they should have taken it into account. Is there anybody who is prepared to say it?

Sir WILLIAM PERRING: Yes, I will.

Mr. GREENWOOD: Thank you very much. There is one hon. Member in the House who believes that War pensions granted to the children of deceased soldiers should be used for other purposes than the maintenance of the children. I should be glad if other Members would make the same admission. Previously these pensions had not been taken into account, and this man received in Poor Law relief £1 in kind and 5s. in money. That was not extravagant, but that, under the new régime, has been reduced to 8s. in kind and 5s. in money. There is another case, equally bad.

Mr. REMER: Read the letter.

Mr. GREENWOOD: Certainly.

"This decision is one within the legal discretion of the guardians, and the Minister, even if he desired to do so, has no authority to require the decision to be reconsidered."

Mr. REMER: I understand that that is an extract. Will the hon. Member read the whole letter?

Mr. GREENWOOD: I will if the hon. Member wishes it, but there is nothing more in it. I have read the last sentence. It is perfectly true that it is within the discretion of the board of guardians to give relief on a scale as low as this, but the right hon. Gentleman has to remember that he introduced the Board of Guardians Default Bill, aimed primarily at this particular board, on the ground, first, that they were corrupt and, secondly, that they were over-generous, and the Debates in this House from that side and the decision of the majority of the Government supporters in this House were the marching orders to the new boards of guardians, who were in honour bound to make extensive economies, at whatever cost to the poor. I am not surprised that the Act was extended to other two boards of guardians. The Parliamentary Secretary said the Act had not been put into operation in many cases, but that it had had its uses. It had terrified other boards of guardians, who, fearing suppression, had been led to economise, also at the expense of the poor. I am not surprised that that should be the effect of this Act. It was intended to have that effect. It was intended, as I pointed out on Second Reading, as an economy Measure. It has succeeded in terms of finance, but it is going to cost the country an infinite expenditure in terms of misery and in terms of disease. If these are the fruits of the victory gained by hon. Members opposite in this Act, they are fruits to which they are welcome.

Question put, "That a sum not exceeding £12,943,493 be granted to His Majesty for the said Service."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 75; Noes, 235.

Division No. 213.]

AYES.

[11.0 p.m.]

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Batey, Joseph
Broad, F. A.
Bromley, J.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Cluse, W. S.
Connolly, M.
Crawford, H. E.
Dalton, Hugh
Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hardie, George D.

Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kenworthy, Lt.-Com. Hon. Joseph M.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
MacLaren, Andrew
Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
March, S.
Mosley, Oswald
Naylor, T. E.
Oliver, George Harold
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.

Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Riley, Ben
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
Salter, Dr. Alfred
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Snell, Harry
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Viant, S. P.
Wallhead, Richard C.
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Wellock, Wilfred
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, David (Swansea, East)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. Whiteley and Mr. A. Barnes.

NOES.

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.

Albery, Irving James
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)

Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astor, Maj. Hon. John J. (Kent, Dover)

Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Baintel, Lord
 Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Bellairs, Commander Carlyon W.
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
 Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
 Blundell, F. N.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
 Brass, Captain W.
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brittain, Sir Harry
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H.C. (Berks, Newb'y)
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Burman, J. B.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prismth. S.)
 Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
 Cecil, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clarry, Reginald George
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
 Colfox, Major Wm. Philip
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Curzon, Captain Viscount
 Davidson, J. (Hert'd, Hemel Hempst'd)
 Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 England, Colonel A.
 Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s-M.)
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Forrester-Walker, Sir L.
 Forrest, W.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Galbraith, J. F. W.
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.

Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
 Grotrian, H. Brent
 Guest, Capt. Rt. Hon. F. E. (Bristol, N.)
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
 Harland, A.
 Harmsworth, Hon. E. C. (Kent)
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Capt. R.R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Capt. H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whiteh'n)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merloneth)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. O.
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Loder, J. de V.
 Long, Major Eric
 Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 MacDonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Macquisten, F. A.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Morrison, H. (Wilts, Salisbury)
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)

Oakley, T.
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Pennetather, Sir John
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pilcher, G.
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Remer, J. R.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs., Stretford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smithers, Waldron
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fyde)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Storry-Deans, R.
 Strauss, E. A.
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A.L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, E. (Ches'tr, Stalyb'ge & Hyde)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Wood, Sir S. Hill- (High Peak)
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Major Sir Harry Barnston and
 Major Cope.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. SCURR rose—

It being after Eleven of the Clock and objection being taken to further proceeding, the CHAIRMAN left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be Reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

—
ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved, "That this House do now adjourn."—[Commander Eyres Monsell.]

Adjourned accordingly at Fourteen Minutes after Eleven o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 28th June, 1927.

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

PRIVATE BILLS [Lords] (Standing Orders not previously inquired into complied with).

Mr. SPEAKER laid upon the Table Report from one of the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, That, in the case of the following Bills, originating in the Lords, and referred on the First Reading thereof, the Standing Orders not previously inquired into, which are applicable thereto, have been complied with, namely:

Abersoch Water Bill [Lords].

Bedford Corporation Bill [Lords].

Coventry Corporation (Boundary Extension) Bill [Lords].

Sunderland Corporation Bill [Lords].

Hospital of St. Mary the Virgin (Newcastle - upon - Tyne) Bill [Lords].

Salford Corporation Bill [Lords].

Bills to be read a Second time.

Yorkshire Electric Power Bill [Lords],

Read the Third time, and passed, with Amendments.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

CHINA (BRITISH FORCES).

10. Mr. THURTLÉ asked the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that Class A reservists at present with the Shanghai Defence Force have been asked if they would have any objections to serve longer overseas than the period of 12 months they are under an obligation to serve; and, if so, will he state why this question has been put to them?

The SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Sir Laming Worthington-Evans): Inquiries have been made by the local military authorities whether any Section A reservists now in China would volunteer to remain in Army service there, should occasion arise. The object of these inquiries is to ascertain what reliefs will be required to take the place of the Section A reservists. The contract with the reservists will be carried out strictly, and no reservist will be retained in the service beyond the 12 months unless he has volunteered to so remain.

Mr. THURTLÉ: When does the right hon. Gentleman hope to bring these Class A reservists home from Shanghai?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: In time to give them their discharge within 12 months.

11. Lieut.-Colonel Sir FREDERICK HALL asked the Secretary of State for War what is the total number of troops of all ranks now in China; what is the approximate daily cost of maintaining this force; and how many casualties there have been from wounds, sickness, or other causes up to the present time?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: As regards the first part of the question, in addition to the normal establishment of three infantry battalions, there are at present stationed in China and Hong Kong 17 infantry battalions and one marine battalion, with ancillary troops. As regards the second part, I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the reply which I gave on 2nd May to the right hon. and gallant Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme. As regards the last part, one soldier has been killed, two officers and nine other ranks have been wounded, and nine other ranks have died as the result of illness or accidents. The average weekly number in hospital during the four weeks ended 17th June was 22 officers and 895 other ranks.

Sir F. HALL: In reference to the reply of 2nd May, in which the right hon. Gentleman indicated that it was impossible to give the approximate cost, does that still hold good? Cannot he give some idea now of the cost of the troops out there?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: I gave a figure of about £250,000 a month, and that is as near as I can give it at the moment. That is in addition to the transport charges.

[Sir L. Worthington-Evans.]

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is not this figure of 900 officers and men in hospital abnormally high?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: No, unfortunately it is not. The medical authorities are quite satisfied with the figure, saying it is quite good.

58. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Air where the air units and machines and pilots that have been sent to China were drawn from; and whether steps are being taken, or have been taken, to replace them?

The SECRETARY of STATE for AIR (Sir Samuel Hoare): As regards the first part of the question the Fleet Air Arm units were drawn from home waters and from the Mediterranean; No. 2 Squadron, Royal Air Force, from Manston; and additional Army co-operation observers from Farnborough. The answer to the second part of the question is in the negative.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: In view of the long stay of the expeditionary force in China will not steps be taken to replace these units?

Sir S. HOARE: It depends on the time which they are required to stay there. Obviously, that is a question which must be taken into account.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: In the meantime, for example, are the Fleet to be deprived of specially trained pilots for Fleet purposes?

Sir S. HOARE: No, Sir.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: How are you going to replace them?

Mr. THURTLÉ: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a reply given by the Secretary of State for War indicates that the Shanghai Force is likely to be kept there for at least 12 months?

SCOTLAND.

HOUSING, CLYDEBANK.

12. Mr. KIRKWOOD asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is aware that, owing to the prolonged depression in the shipbuilding industry, the town council of the Burgh of Clydebank has experienced great difficulty in raising loans for housing schemes, and of the overcrowding in Clydebank, and the necessity of expediting a building programme; that the local council has applied to the Board of Health to recommend the Public Works Loan Board to facilitate a loan; and what steps, if any, he has taken in the matter?

The SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Sir John Gilmour): I am aware that the local authority of the Burgh of Clydebank have experienced difficulty in raising loans for their housing schemes. The Scottish Board of Health have been in communication with the Treasury on the subject and the decision of that Department has now been communicated to the local authority.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Town Council of Clydebank, through municipal banks and otherwise, have done their best, and that it is by the policy adopted by the Government in further flooding the market with ships that Clydebank is in such a state at present? I want to know, owing to these special circumstances, if the Secretary of State would not facilitate a loan?

Sir J. GILMOUR: A communication has been made to the burgh, and advice has been tendered to them on the subject. I think it advisable to await the result of this.

Mr. COUPER: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that instead of prolonged depression in Clydebank, as suggested in the question, shipbuilding is very much better than it has been for many years past?

YOUNG FARMERS' CLUBS.

13. Major Sir ARCHIBALD SINCLAIR asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the inquiries of the Board of Agriculture for Scotland with regard to the Young Farmers' Club movement have been completed; and whether the question of official recognition and supervision of such clubs has yet been decided?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The information obtained by the Board of Agriculture for Scotland shows that the Young Farmer Club movement is progressing, though slowly. The staffs of the agricultural colleges are assisting wherever possible in the formation and the work of such clubs, and the Board will do what they can to support the movement.

SMALL HOLDINGS.

14. Sir A. SINCLAIR asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how soon the 74 holders who are in occupation of small holdings created since the present Government came into power, but who have not yet been registered with the Land Court, will obtain registration; and the average rent of the 43 holders who have been registered since the winter of 1924?

Sir J. GILMOUR: Forty-eight of the 74 holders referred to have been registered by the Scottish Land Court since my reply to the hon. Member's question of 22nd February last. Applications for the registration of the remaining 26 holders are being prepared and are expected to be lodged with the Court next month. The answer to the last part of the question is £7 11s. 6d.

Mr. SKELTON: Are we to take it that that figure is correct, that in the last three years only 74 smallholders have been established?

Sir J. GILMOUR: Oh, no, Sir. Only for this particular season.

Sir A. SINCLAIR: Does not this figure apply to all smallholdings established in the last three years, according to an answer which the right hon. Gentleman gave me a week or two ago?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I am not quite clear on the point. I will look into it.

SAFEGUARDING OF INDUSTRIES.

GAS MANTLES.

1. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Trade what was the total amount of imports of gas mantles in the first four months of 1925, 1926, and 1927, respectively?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister): The imports of gas mantles in the first four months of 1925, 1926, and 1927, respectively, were 67,656 gross, 14,958 gross, and 11,203 gross.

Colonel DAY: Is that higher or lower than the last period of the year?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I could not say without notice.

7. Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any information as to the wholesale and retail prices of gas mantles before and after the imposition of the safeguarding duty?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I am informed that the average price realised by the members of the trade association on the sale by them of all their mantles during the year ended on 31st March last shows an increase of 1s. a gross on the average price realised by them during the preceding year. These sales are estimated to cover 85 per cent. of all the mantles sold in this country. Against this there have been increases in the cost of certain materials. The retail prices of the classes of mantles most commonly used have, so far as I can ascertain, remained substantially unchanged.

Mr. WILLIAMS: May I take it that the statement recently made in the House that there has been a large increase in the price of mantles to the public is in fact inaccurate?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I think so. I have collected the information as carefully as I can in my Department and have passed on the information in the answer.

Mr. RILEY: Who meets the extra cost of a shilling in the wholesale price?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: It is a shilling a gross. If the price of an article goes up owing to the cost of the material having gone up, those who buy pay the extra cost.

WOOLLEN TEXTILE AND IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRIES.

9. Sir FRANK SANDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the continued depression in the woollen textile industry and the iron and steel industry, and the increased importation of these commodities, he will consider modifying the necessary procedure so as to facilitate and simplify the working of the Safeguarding of Industries Act?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Member for the Cleveland Division (Sir Park Goff) on 12th April, a copy of which I am sending him.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

POWER PRODUCTION.

2. Mr. GEORGE HALL asked the President of the Board of Trade the percentage production of power produced in this country from coal, oil, gas, and water-power for the years 1910 to 1914 and 1922 to 1926, respectively?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I regret that the information desired by the hon. Member is not available.

EXPORT PRICES (DUTIES).

3. Sir JOHN POWER asked the President of the Board of Trade whether the prices at which the products of industry which are protected by tariffs are being exported have fallen or risen since the duties were imposed?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: From inquiries which have been made it appears that in the trades protected by Safeguarding Duties there has, generally speaking, been either no change in export prices since the duty was imposed, or a slight reduction in those prices; and that in trades covered by the McKenna Duties a fall in export prices is still continuing.

Mr. A. V. ALEXANDER: Did the prices in the home market remain in the same condition?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I should like notice of that question, but my recollection is that the answers I have previously given have shown that prices either remained stationary or have fallen.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is there not a general reduction in price in all commodities whether protected or not?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman's contention was that if you put on a duty of a third you raised the price.

Sir J. POWER: Has not the policy of safeguarding actually helped the export trade?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: In many cases the export trade has increased, as would be expected if you have a larger output.

Mr. HARRIS: The import prices quoted by the Board of Trade are without the duties on, are they not?

Sir F. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I understood the hon. Member's suggestion was that if you put on a duty it raised prices all round and enabled the home manufacturer to raise prices.

Mr. ERNEST BROWN: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that where prices were not raised the duty probably anticipated a fall to the consumer?

CRUDE PETROLEUM (PRODUCTION).

8. Mr. JOHN asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he can give figures showing the world production of crude natural oil for the years 1910, 1915, 1920, and 1926?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The world production of crude petroleum is estimated to have been about 47 million tons in 1910, 62 million tons in 1915, 98 million tons in 1920, and 150 million tons in 1926.

FRANCE (TARIFF BILL).

5. Major COLFOX (for Colonel VAUGHAN - MORGAN) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he can inform the House as to the present position of the new tariff proposals of the French Government?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The position remains as stated in the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Taylor) on 14th June. The Tariff Bill still awaits consideration by the Chamber of Deputies and is not, I understand, likely to be passed into law before the Summer Recess.

COAL MINING INDUSTRY.

OUTPUT.

15. Sir J. POWER asked the Secretary for Mines how the output of coal per man-shift during the March quarter of this year compares with that during the corresponding period last year?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Colonel Lane Fox): From the information at present available [it appears that the output of coal per man-shift worked was nearly 15 per cent. higher during the March quarter of this year than during the corresponding quarter of 1926.

UPTON COLLIERY (ACCIDENT).

17. Mr. LUNN asked the Secretary for Mines whether an inquiry has been held into the cause of the fatality at the Upton Colliery sinking pit; if he has received a report from His Majesty's inspector of mines; and whether he has given or will give instructions, to avoid similar fatalities in the future, that detonators shall be tested on the surface and not in the pit sump?

Colonel LANE FOX: Yes, Sir; an inspector has investigated the cause of this accident, and I have received his report. It is already the practice to test detonators on the surface, if they are tested at all. The cause of this accident was rather different. The deceased man had charged a round of 21 shots, tested their electrical continuity, and found it defective. He located the fault in a particular shot, and was testing it singly, contrary to instructions, when it exploded and killed him. Arrangements have now been made by which circuits of charged shots are only tested from a safe distance.

Mr. LUNN: What steps are being taken to deal with those responsible for this accident and the way this man was killed by not following the instructions laid down by his Department but perhaps ignored by other people?

Colonel LANE FOX: As I have said, the man was unfortunately acting contrary to instructions.

UNDERGROUND HAULAGE.

18. Mr. DAVID GRENFELL asked the Secretary for Mines the number of collieries where the underground haulage is done entirely by machinery, and the aggregate annual tonnage raised from these mines?

Colonel LANE FOX: This information is not readily available, but I am arranging to send the hon. Member such particulars as can be extracted from the information in my possession.

NYSTAGMUS.

19. Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Secretary for Mines the figures showing how many men are disabled by nystagmus in mines where men work with oil lamps and with electric lamps, respectively?

Colonel LANE FOX: I would refer the hon. Member to my reply of 15th March last to a similar question by the hon. Member for Doncaster (Mr. Paling).

Colonel DAY: Is it a fact that no alteration in the conditions has taken place since the 15th March?

Colonel LANE FOX: The reply I gave on the 15th March was certainly a sufficient reply.

MEDICAL INSPECTOR.

20. Mr. LEE asked the Secretary for Mines what are the reasons that prompted his Department to engage a medical man; whether, in the necessary qualification for the position, regard is being had to the ever-increasing spread of miners' nystagmus, and the varying theories held by medical men as to the causes of this disease and the remedies for it; and what will be the specific duties connected with the appointment?

Colonel LANE FOX: The duties of the medical inspector will be to advise the present inspectorate on the health problems of the mining and quarrying industries, to assist in applying the health Regulations effectively and in improving them, and to ensure that, so far as practicable, the results of medical research are applied to mines and quarries. In making the appointment due weight will be given to the considerations mentioned by the hon. Member.

Mr. LUNN: Has this appointment been made, and is the medical man a specialist in the particular disease mentioned in the question, which is increasing so rapidly and so dangerously in the mining industry?

Colonel LANE FOX: Yes, Sir. With regard to the appointment, perhaps the hon. Member will put down a question.

CANNOCK AND RUGELEY COLLIERIES (ACCIDENT).

24. Mr. W. M. ADAMSON asked the Secretary for Mines whether he has noted the evidence given and the statement of the jury at the inquest on two miners who were killed in a winding-cage accident at the Cannock and Rugeley collieries, Wimblebury, recently; whether he is satisfied that adequate precautions were taken with the working of the new winding engine prior to the accident; and whether he will take steps to have a full inquiry into the matter?

Colonel LANE FOX: I have seen the evidence and the jury's statement, as well as a full report from the inspector who investigated this unfortunate accident. There is no doubt as to its cause; the winding engineman candidly admitted his mistake. Proper precautions were taken in installing the new engine, but I am inclined to agree with the jury's view that this engineman should have had more practice with it before winding men.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman answer the last part of the question as to whether a further inquiry will be made with a view to avoiding such accidents where lack of practice is evidently the cause?

Colonel LANE FOX: No, Sir; I think the inquiry by the inspector was sufficient. There was no doubt about the facts. They were admitted.

Colonel DAY: Can the right hon. and gallant Gentleman say how many men were injured besides the two men who were killed?

Colonel LANE FOX: The hon. Member had better put down a question. I cannot say exactly.

Mr. ADAMSON: Was not the inquiry only with regard to the death of the two men and as to how the accident happened, and not as to who might be responsible?

Colonel LANE FOX: No, Sir. I think the whole thing was gone into, and the cause of the accident to the two men who were killed would equally be the cause of the accident to the others.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is not the management responsible for putting on an engine a winder who has not had actual practice?

Colonel LANE FOX: Yes, Sir. I quite agree that it was unfortunate that the man had not had more practice, but he was not forced to do anything. It was at his own option that he took this risk, as he had had a good many preliminary windings of coal only and felt himself fully competent to do the work of winding men.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: I would like to ask the Secretary for Mines if he does not think that here is something which has to do with these accidents. I have four pay leaves which came up on Saturday from Kirkaldy and Dumfriesshire. The first pay leaf is 4d. for a week, a 1d. for a week, 14s. 10d. for a week, after all the deductions are taken off, and 13s. 7d. Is not that the reason why there are accidents in the mines—because the miners are being starved to death?

AGED EMPLOYÉS.

23. Mr. D. GRENFELL (for Mr. C. EDWARDS) asked the Secretary for Mines if he will give the number of persons engaged in the mining industry for each complete month of this year and the number of men over 60 years of age at present engaged in the industry?

Colonel LANE FOX: The total numbers of wage-earners employed at the end of each month of the present year were as follows: January, 996,100; February, 1,012,700; March, 1,026,200; April, 1,028,700; and May, 1,025,700. With regard to the latter part of the question, the latest information is that obtained from the Decennial Census of Population of 1921, when 5.9 per cent. of the men employed in the coal mining industry were over 60 years of age.

Mr. GRENFELL: Is it not possible to obtain from the collieries the number of men over 60 years of age employed?

Colonel LANE FOX: Yes, Sir, it would be possible, but it would mean communicating with every individual undertaking, and that would involve a tremendous amount of work, and I doubt whether the result would be worth it.

Mr. CECIL WILSON: Is not that information being completed now by the Ministry of Labour?

Colonel LANE FOX: That question should be addressed to the Minister of Labour.

TRANSPORT.

TRAFFIC REGULATIONS (STATIONARY TRAMCARS).

25. Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Transport if, in view of the danger to pedestrians alighting from or entering tramcars at stopping places within the County of London, he will consider the introduction of legislation to compel motorists and other moving vehicles to stop when tramcars are stationary, so as to allow persons to enter or leave tramcars freely?

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Colonel Ashley): I am not satisfied that such legislation, which has been repeatedly refused by Parliament, is necessary or desirable either in the interests of public safety or of traffic by road. In my opinion the existing law with regard to dangerous driving is adequate to deal with the matter, and as the hon. Member is aware I have put forward proposals in the Draft Road Traffic Bill providing for increased penalties in cases where the circumstances seem to call for them.

Colonel DAY: Does the draft Traffic Bill cover the point in my question, and will provision be made for it?

Colonel ASHLEY: It would enable me to make regulations to deal with the matter.

Mr. B. SMITH: Is the right hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that this system is followed in Canada and in the United States of America much to the disadvantage of the pedestrian and the road user?

Colonel ASHLEY: That is the reason why I gave the answer in the sense that I did give it.

Mr. THURTELL: Is the right hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that if he dealt with this question from the point of view of the pedestrian and not from the point of view of the motorist, he would take an entirely different point of view.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter of argument.

UNCLASSIFIED ROADS (GRANTS):

27. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Transport the amount of the grant from the Road Fund in aid of rural roads during the year ended 31st March, 1925, and during the year ended 31st March, 1927, together with the estimated amount for the current year?

Colonel ASHLEY: If, as I assume, my hon. Friend has in mind the special assistance given towards the maintenance of unclassified roads in rural areas, the answer to his question is that no allocation for this purpose was made from the Road Fund prior to last year, and that in each of the years 1926-27 and 1927-28 a sum of £1,400,000 has been provided.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH POLES (ACCIDENTS).

28. Sir DOUGLAS NEWTON asked the Minister of Transport how many fatal and other accidents to road travellers have been caused during the past two years by collisions with telephone and telegraph poles erected alongside public highways?

Colonel ASHLEY: No statistics are available which would enable me to give my hon. Friend the information for which he asks.

Sir D. NEWTON: Is my right hon. and gallant Friend aware that a great many accidents have occurred from this cause, and will he be prepared to make representation to the Post Office authorities that they should fix these posts on the inside rather than on the outside of the fences.

Colonel ASHLEY: I know there are a certain number of accidents which do occur. In North Wales I saw several cases where the local authorities, with the concurrence of the owners of the land on each side, and the Post Office, had moved the telephone posts from the pathway between the roadway and the fence and placed them inside the fence, and this minimises the chance of accidents.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Cannot the right hon. and gallant Gentleman extend the system of putting white paint or white strips on telegraph poles which are situated on the side of the road.

Colonel ASHLEY: I will consider that, but I think it is the presence of the posts rather than their visibility.

CANALS.

26. Captain. GARRO-JONES (for Sir ROBERT THOMAS) asked the Minister of Transport if he is prepared to devote renewed consideration to the question of canals, and especially to the reconditioning of those now derelict, with a view to cheapening the transport of bulky commodities and providing employment on a large scale?

[Captain Garro-Jones.]

Colonel ASHLEY: All forms of transport including transport by canal are continually under my consideration, but I do not propose at the present time to institute any further formal inquiry, either into the question of canals generally or into the question of reconditioning derelict canals.

POST OFFICE.

HORSES AND MOTOR VEHICLES.

31. Major GLYN asked the Postmaster-General the numbers of horses and motors, respectively, used in the Metropolitan area by the General Post Office or by the contractor to the General Post Office; and how do these figures compare with 1922 and 1913?

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir William Mitchell-Thomson): The numbers of horses, horsed vans and motor vehicles employed on mail conveyance work in the London Postal area in 1913, 1922 and at the present time are as follows:—

	1913.	1922.	1927.
Horses	1,369	1,151	771
Horsed vans	798	569	403
Motor vehicles	156	74	384

Colonel DAY: Is it not a fact that motor vehicles are very much more efficient, and does he consider that in the future motor vehicles for this service will be increased?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I would not go so far as to say that. It is our experience, that under certain conditions, horses are more economical than motors.

Captain CROOKSHANK: Is it the policy of the Post Office to employ only British motors for the service?

Mr. MARCH: They are nearly all Fords.

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Practically all the motors employed are motors which are made in this country.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Can we be assured that they are British horses too?

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICES (ADMINISTRATION).

32. Major GLYN asked the Postmaster-General to what extent the administrative and operating staffs for the maintenance and extension of the telephone system are also concerned with the telegraph system; and how far are the two services, telegraphs and telephones, kept distinct as regards contracts for cable burying and maintenance of air lines?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Speaking generally, there are separate operating and supervising staffs for the two services, the main exceptions being at small post offices where this would be wasteful. A joint staff deals with engineering construction, maintenance and contract matters save where economy and other benefits are to be gained by separation. Higher control and questions of policy are in the hands of a unified administrative personnel organised in a manner to secure such advantages as follow from specialisation.

Major GLYN: Is it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to let out on contract the setting up of air lines, as is done in regard to underground cables?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I shall require notice of that question..

LONDON RAILWAY. •

33. Major GLYN asked the Postmaster-General what are the anticipated annual savings that will result from the conveyance of parcels, etc., by the Post Office (London) railway when in normal operation; which are the railway termini that will be directly connected with the General Post Office; and to what extent will it be possible to do away with the existing method of conveyance of postal matter by horse and motor vehicles?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: It is anticipated that there will be an annual reduction of approximately £40,000 in the cost of the conveyance of letter and parcel mails by road when the Post Office (London) railway is fully working. The railway termini, which will be directly connected with the General Post Office, are Paddington Station (Great Western Railway) and Liverpool Street Station (London and North-Eastern Railway). It may be estimated that the railway will relieve road mail services to the extent of approximately 400,000 miles annually or 27 per cent.

Major COLFOX: Can my right hon. Friend give us the capital cost of this railway?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I could give it in reply to a question.

Sir F. HALL: When does my right hon. Friend think it will be in complete working?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I think in a couple of months' time.

Commander BELLAIRS: Can my right hon. Friend say how long this Post Office (London) railway has been building?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Many years.

AUTOMATIC TELEPHONES.

34. Mr. FENBY asked the Postmaster-General if, in view of the time and trouble saved to business and other people by the installation of automatic telephones, he will give the following particulars: what automatic telephone exchanges are now actually in operation; what exchanges will go over to automatic telephones this year; what exchanges will go over to automatic telephones next year; and how many exchanges in all have now been scheduled for future alteration over to the automatic method?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The total number of automatic telephone exchanges already working is 69, comprising nearly 90,000 subscribers' lines. It is hoped to open 34 additional exchanges by the end of this year, about 40 more during 1928 and upwards of 200 more are already scheduled for conversion to automatic working in succeeding years.

Colonel DAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us the difference in the figures as between the provinces and the Metropolitan area?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: There are no automatic exchanges working in the provinces.

TRANS-ATLANTIC TELEPHONE SERVICE (CANADA).

35. Colonel MORDEN asked the Postmaster-General why it is that telephone connection has been made between this country and practically all parts of the United States of America, and yet no provision has been made for such connection with the Dominion of Canada?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The question of extending the trans-Atlantic telephone service to Canada is under discussion between the Imperial and Canadian Governments.

WIRELESS TELEPHONY (TRAWLERS).

36. Mr. GROTRIAN asked the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the advantage to the fishing fleet, it is permissible for private individuals to establish a wireless telephone service with the trawlers and other vessels with which they are connected; and whether he will define the general attitude of the Post Office towards initiative of this nature which is not met by any existing State service?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: In view of the risk of interference it is not practicable to permit the establishment of private wireless stations for communication with ships at sea. Vessels fitted with wireless telegraph apparatus can send and receive messages through any of the Post Office coast stations; and in order to meet the needs of a number of trawlers which have recently been fitted with wireless telephone apparatus, arrangements are being made to equip the new coast station now in course of construction at Mablethorpe with suitable apparatus for the exchange of messages with those vessels by wireless telephony.

STOLEN LETTERS AND PACKETS.

38. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Postmaster-General if he is aware of several recent cases in which letters and postal packets have not been delivered, and proof has afterwards been given to his Department that they have been stolen; and will he consider modifying the regulations in order that compensation may be payable in those cases in which proof is forthcoming that unregistered letters and packets have been stolen by Post Office employes?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The answer to the first part of the hon.

[Sir W. Mitchell-Thomson.]
Member's question is in the affirmative. In view of the facilities provided for the registration of postal packets, I am not prepared to modify the existing regulation which precludes the payment of compensation in respect of unregistered letter packets.

Mr. MORRISON: Does the right hon. Gentleman know any other business that would repudiate responsibility for the loss of packets entrusted to their care when it was proved that the packets were lost by the employés of the firm?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: As I have said, facilities for registering letters exist, and are well known.

Mr. MORRISON: Surely the right hon. Gentleman will realise that this is an exception and deals with the case of letters entrusted to the Post Office which have been stolen by employés of the Post Office. Surely the Post Office is responsible in that case, whether the letters are registered or not?

AUXILIARY POSTMEN.

39. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Postmaster-General if his attention has been called to the case of an auxiliary postman who was charged at Tottenham Police Court on the 8th instant with stealing postal orders, and to the evidence given by a Post Office official that the man's weekly wages were £1 14s. 3d., less deductions; and will he take steps to enable auxiliary postmen to work sufficient hours to earn a living wage?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I am aware of the alleged facts of the case and the man is now awaiting trial. As regards the question of increasing the attendances of auxiliary postmen, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer on this point which I gave him on the 15th of March.

Mr. MORRISON: Cannot the Postmaster-General make a special effort to do away with this wretched system, which is bringing these auxiliary postmen into Courts every week charged with theft because they are not able to earn a living wage?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I have said more than once that it is extremely difficult to devise any other system which would give us the results we require.

TELEPHONE DEVELOPMENT.

40. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Postmaster-General what will have been the approximate capital expenditure this year on new telephone development; and what was the corresponding capital sum in 1926 and 1925?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The estimated expenditure on the development of the telephone system for the current financial year (1927-28) is about £12,000,000. The figures for 1926-27 and 1925-26 were £10,611,000 and £11,902,000, respectively. The expenditure in 1926-27 would have been greater but for the coal stoppage.

TELEPHONE SERVICE (ADVERTISING AND CANVASSING).

42. Sir HARRY BRITTAIN asked the Postmaster-General what proportion of the Post Office revenue from telephones is devoted to advertising the service; and where such expenditure is shown?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: A considerable amount of advertisement is carried out by means of posters, leaflets, booklets, etc., but no definite proportion of telephone revenue is allocated to this form of publicity. New business is sought mainly by personal canvassing because it is regarded as the most suitable and most remunerative method. The expenses of the canvassing staff are borne on the Post Office Vote and those of printing upon the Vote for the Stationery Office.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman considering the advisability of putting this matter into the hands of one of the leading firms who specialise in this important side of business?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I do not apprehend exactly what the hon. Member suggests. If he means printing publicity, the answer is that I am satisfied that we do better by personal canvass. If it is personal canvass, then I prefer it to be under the control of the Post Office.

Sir JOSEPH NALL: Would not the best advertisement of the telephones be a quicker installation and a more businesslike administration in the contract department?

Sir. W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I think the average lag in the installation of the telephone is something within a fortnight or three weeks.

Sir J. NALL: Will the right hon. Gentleman look into the case on which I gave him some information, in which six months elapsed before the telephone was installed?

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: Do not the canvassers waste a good deal of time when a simple letter would furnish all the information that is desired?

Mr. RILEY: Do canvassers perform other duties besides that of canvassing?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: That is dealt with in another question.

Mr. MONTAGUE: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that the employment of an efficient publicity man would be as good for the advertisement of telephones as the employment of a publicity man is for advertising the Empire Marketing Board.

Mr. SPEAKER: These matters can be argued on the Estimates.

43. Sir H. BRITTAIN asked the Postmaster-General what is the average cost to the Department of each new subscriber obtained by the employment of a canvassing staff?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The canvassing staff forms part only of a larger staff employed upon a number of duties, in addition to actual canvassing, including work in connection with removals, cessations, transfers and collection of material for estimating future growth. I regret that it is impracticable to separate the expenditure so as to furnish the information required.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Does not the right hon. Gentleman recollect that only last week he gave me the number of canvassers, which is amazingly small for the whole country? He now states that they have other duties to perform. I should like to ask whether they are paid by results.

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The hon. Member has not heard the answer properly. The canvassers are only part of a larger staff, which deals with various duties. It is extremely difficult to separate the actual payments made to these canvassers from the other payments.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: I really did hear the answer, and I should like to know whether this comparatively small staff is paid by results?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: If the hon. Member will put down a question on that precise point, I will give him an answer.

29. Captain GARRO-JONES (for Sir R. THOMAS) asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that many of the facilities that are available to telephone subscribers are almost unknown to the public because they are not advertised; and whether he will have a simply-worded booklet prepared drawing attention to these facilities?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The Post Office has issued a large number of leaflets and booklets drawing special attention to the facilities available, and these have been widely distributed. Full particulars are, of course, also given in the Telephone Directory and in the Post Office Guide. The question of issuing further publicity literature is constantly under review.

Colonel DAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the question of putting these leaflets and booklets in the post offices so that the public can pick them up, as they do leaflets in banks?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I fancy that in some respects that is done already, but I will consider the matter.

EX-SERVICE MEN (HEIGHT REGULATIONS).

37. Sir A. SINCLAIR asked the Postmaster-General whether he can see his way to waive the Regulation that permanent postmen must be at least five feet four inches in height in the case of men who served in the Navy, Army, or Air Force, during the War?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The answer is in the negative.

The minimum height limit for the appointment of candidates as postmen is [Sir W. Mitchell-Thomson.] fixed at five feet four inches, on account of the nature of the work which they are liable to perform. Sorting normally forms part of a postman's duties, and a man below the minimum height would experience difficulty in reaching the upper parts of the sorting frames. The number of ex-service candidates who satisfy the requirements of the Regulations is greatly in excess of the number of places available, and a candidate below the minimum height could only be accepted at the expense of a candidate who complies with the Regulations.

Sir A. SINCLAIR: What justification can there be for regarding able-bodied ex-service men as physically unfit to perform the duties of postmen? If it is a matter of height and of reaching the sorting frame could not a box be provided on which the man could stand?

Lieut. - Colonel ACLAND - TROYTE: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that a man who is fit to carry a pack in France is unable to carry a package of letters here?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: It is not a question of physical fitness, it is a question of the actual physical height. The particular man whose case was brought to my attention was ineligible on other grounds, not having a sufficient length of service.

Mr. E. BROWN: Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that this Regulation does a great injustice to one of the best battalions which served during the War, the Bantams Battalion?

Major COLFOX: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any idea of whether many of these men are disqualified?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: There are a considerable number of applicants, but we have a very large number of applicants who are of suitable height, and it would be an injustice to them, and I am not prepared to abandon the Regulation.

Mr. HURD: Are those applicants also ex-service men?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Yes, all ex-service men.

Mr. R. MORRISON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he is of the maximum height?

Mr. MACPHERSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the same objections which he is advancing now against the employment of men of that height were advanced by the War Office at the beginning of the War and is he further aware that no battalion covered itself with greater distinction than the Bantams Battalion?

Mr. DUFF COOPER: Is it not a fact that under this Regulation Bonaparte would have been ineligible to be a postman?

DELIVERIES, LLANBADARN-FYNYDD, MODRYDD AND GLYNN.

41. Captain ARTHUR EVANS (for Captain D'ARCY HALL) asked the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that at certain houses in the Llanbadarn-Fynydd, Modrydd, and Glynn districts there is only a delivery of letters on three days a week; if he will state for each district what would be the additional annual cost of providing a daily delivery for all the inhabitants; and if he will cause the position to be reviewed at once with a view to the institution of a daily delivery?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I have received representations on the matter. The additional cost of giving a daily delivery would be about £20 a year in the Llanbadarn Fynydd district and about £35 a year in the Modrydd and Glynn districts. The number of letters for the places concerned is quite insufficient to justify this increased expenditure.

Captain EVANS: Could the right hon. Gentleman give me the number of letters?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: About 85 letters a week.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

PENSIONERS (LEITH).

44. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Pensions the number of ex-service men in receipt of pensions in the port of Leith; and what is the average weekly sum paid to them?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of PENSIONS (Lieut.-Colonel Stanley): I regret that the records of the Department are not kept in a form which would enable this information to be given for particular towns.

COMMUTATION.

52. Mr. SHEPHERD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, seeing that one of the strict conditions governing the grant of commutation is that the pensioner must be certified to possess a normal expectation of life, why a pensioner aged 35 receives less than 14 years' purchase of the amount commuted while the normal expectation of life at that age is over 31 years?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): I think the hon. Member is overlooking the question of date of payment. If a pensioner commutes, he receives cash down now; if he does not commute but lives to a normal age, he may receive a larger sum but only in instalments spread over a very long period. It would obviously be impossible to pay a pensioner £100 present value now in respect of a claim he may have to receive £100 in 10, 20 or 30 years' time.

54. Mr. SHEPHERD asked the Minister of Pensions if he has received representations from the Darlington, Auckland and District Area War Pensions Committee and other area committees protesting against the manner in which a man is informed that he cannot commute part of his pension because he cannot be certified to possess a normal expectation of life; whether he is aware that in certain cases the receipt of the notice has had a detrimental effect upon the pensioner; and if it is proposed to amend the formal answer sent to applicants in cases where commutation is refused owing to the state of health of the pensioner?

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: My right hon. Friend has received representations from the committee referred to, and has fully explained to them the reasons governing the Ministry's practice. Resolutions supporting the representations of the Darlington Committee have since been received from two other committees. My right hon. Friend has most carefully considered this question, but while greatly regretting any distress which may be caused by an official communication of this nature, he does not consider it possible to refuse to explain to a pensioner the reasons laid down by the published statutory Regulations for rejecting an application for commutation which the pensioner is entitled to make, and after careful and sympathetic consideration, he has come to the conclusion that it is less likely to cause distress if the reason is given at the outset than if it is disclosed only under pressure.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Does not the right hon. and gallant Gentleman consider that to give the reply of the Ministry to the local committee and allow them to pass it on verbally and personally to the pensioner, would be a less brutal method than the one now adopted of sending a form.

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: I do not think it would be. In the first place, it would inform all the other people of the particular state of the man's health, and, I am not sure whether we have any right whatever to inform other people of the state of the man's health.

Mr. SHEPHERD: May I press this matter. Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman consider the possibility of someone on the War Pensions Committee who is a friend of the pensioner giving the information to the man first. There are many cases where a man has been seriously affected by receiving a blunt, formal notification.

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: This matter was raised by the Darlington War Pensions Committee and consideration was given to the question of whether there was any better way of dealing with it. After very sympathetic consideration, it was decided that this way was better than being forced to give information to the man which might have a worse effect upon him.

NEED PENSIONS.

53. Mr. W. BAKER asked the Minister of Pensions whether with regard to contributions in the case of surviving sons who are unable owing to poverty to contribute toward the support of parents who are in receipt of need pensions, he is aware that his Department regularly refuses to regard unemployment as a reason for waiving such contributions; and whether, having regard to the many hard cases in which a potential contributor is unemployed and is without financial means or any immediate prospect of securing work, he will cause the official decision in such cases to be reviewed?

[Mr. W. Baker.]

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: I do not think that I can add anything to the answer on this point which my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member on the 16th instant, of which I am sending him a copy.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask if the Ministry of Pensions will give very careful consideration to this request, on the ground that it is unsatisfactory that people should be held liable to contribute to the family income when they are unemployed and have no chance of getting work.

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: That, of course, has been taken into consideration, but the hon. Member seems to forget that the sum given in respect of a deceased son is a fixed sum and remains constant, and the deceased son might not have been able to contribute.

BANK OF ENGLAND (GOLD EXPORTS).

46. Mr. GILLET asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the recent purchase of gold from the Bank of England by the French Government, any representations have been made to that Government pointing out the prejudicial effect on the trade of this country and the increased cost to the Government in the issue of Treasury Bills as the result of this action; and, if so, what answer has been received?

Mr. R. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the statement which my right hon. Friend made on this matter in the course of the Debate yesterday.

NEWFOUNDLAND (CORNERBROOK TIMBER SALE).

47. Viscount SANDON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has received a communication from the Government of Newfoundland on the subject of the possible sale of the Cornerbrook timber and pulp concern to a big combine operating in the United States; and, if so, whether he will, in stating the attitude of the home Government as joint guarantors under the Trade Facilities Act, give full weight to the undesirability of allowing so large a proportion of the colony's assets to pass into non-British hands?

Mr. McNEILL: I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs has received a communication from the Newfoundland Government on the subject of the negotiations now proceeding as to the possible sale of the property in question. It is not possible to make any statement at present with reference to these negotiations, but my Noble Friend may rest assured that all relevant considerations will be borne in mind.

Mr. CONNOLLY: May I ask whether the Government have been called upon to meet any of the loss under the Trade Guarantee, and, alternatively, if the sale is not completed, will they be called upon to do so?

Mr. McNEILL: I cannot say that at present. Negotiations are proceeding, and it will be premature to make any statement.

INCOME TAX AND SUPER-TAX.

48. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can furnish an estimate of the reduction in Income Tax payable under Schedule B as a result of the rate of the reduction in Income Tax and the modification in the earned income allowance under the Finance Act of 1925?

Mr. McNEILL: I regret that under the present system of graduation and differentiation of the Income Tax the total yield of the tax cannot be divided between the respective schedules. The information asked for by my hon. Friend is therefore not available.

49. Sir FRANK NELSON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the cost per head of the Income Tax and Super-tax paying population of the estimated Budget expenditure for 1927-28?

Mr. McNEILL: The number of individuals who pay and bear Income Tax may be taken as about 2,300,000, and the number of Super-tax payers included in this total as 97,000. If the Budget expenditure of £833,390,000 were entirely defrayed by those taxpayers it would be equivalent to £362 per head of Income Tax payers or £8,590 per head of Super-tax payers. But in fact the yield of Income and Super-tax is estimated at £309,000,000, not at £833,000,000.

50. Major BRAITHWAITE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the number of farmers assessed for Income Tax; the percentage who actually pay Income Tax; and how many farmers who had previously paid Income Tax did not do so during the last taxable period?

Mr. McNEILL: I regret that I am unable to give the information required. My hon. and gallant Friend will find the latest particulars of Income Tax, Schedule B, Assessments on Farmers, in the table on page 86 of the 69th Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (Command Paper 2783).

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DEPARTMENT.

51. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the number of Customs officers and other persons employed in His Majesty's Customs service at the present date or nearest convenient date, and the corresponding number for the same or a near date in 1924?

Mr. McNEILL: The total staff employed in the Customs and Excise Department was 11,273 on 1st April, 1924, and 11,795 on 1st April, 1927.

AGRICULTURE.

CREDITS.

55. Major BRAITHWAITE asked the Minister of Agriculture when he will be in a position to put before the House the proposals for long- and short-term credits for farmers?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Guinness): I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the answer given on the 16th of May in reply to a similar question from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Lieut.-Colonel Ruggles-Brise), a copy of which I am sending to him.

Major BRAITHWAITE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that owing to the serious newspaper controversy which is going on at present the banks have shortened credits to farmers, thus causing serious embarrassment to the industry in general?

Mr. GUINNESS: I have had that trouble brought to my notice.

Mr. AUSTIN HOPKINSON: Have the Government any scheme for putting an end to this poisonous campaign?

Major COLFOX: Has any progress been made since 16th May?

Mr. GUINNESS: The matter is being pursued, and, as soon as we think a statement can usefully be made, I shall make it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will precautions be taken by the Minister to see that whatever short- or long-term credits are given for the benefit of agriculture, they shall not go in increased rents to the landlords?

Mr. GUINNESS: It is not a question of the State giving any credits. It is a question of the State mobilising credit and bringing the lender and the borrower together.

Mr. RILEY: Are we to understand that, whatever steps are taken, the credits will be available for smallholders as well as large farmers?

Mr. GUINNESS: The hon. Gentleman had better await the details of the scheme.

CORN (YIELD AND PRICES).

56. Major BRAITHWAITE asked the Minister of Agriculture the total yield last year of oats, barley, and wheat; the average prices received as compared with prices of imported corn; and the total amount of money received by the farmers for these crops?

Mr. GUINNESS: With my hon. and Gallant Friend's permission I will circulate in the OFFICIAL REPORT a statement giving the desired information.

Following is the statement:

The total production of wheat, barley and oats in England and Wales in 1926, together with average prices of home-grown, the declared value of imported grain, and the estimated amount received by farmers in England and Wales for the quantities of these crops sold off farms were as follows:

	Production in England and Wales in 1926.	Average prices per cwt. of home- grown grain in England and Wales, Sept., 1926, to May, 1927.	Average declared value per cwt. of grain imported into Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Sept., 1926, to May, 1927.	Estimated amount received by farmers in England and Wales for quantities sold off farms (see note).
	Tons.	s. d.	s. d.	£
Wheat	1,304,000	11 9	12 7	11,490,000
Barley	916,000	11 3	9 3	6,690,000
Oats	1,490,00	8 4	7 8	3,100,000

NOTE.—It is estimated that on the average 75 per cent. of the wheat, 65 per cent. of the barley and 25 per cent. of the oats produced in England and Wales are sold off the farms.

ENGLISH BEET SUGAR CORPORATION, LIMITED (SUBSIDY).

57. Mr. THURTLÉ asked the Minister of Agriculture how much subsidy has been paid to the English Beet Sugar Corporation in the last two financial years?

Mr. GUINNESS: The amount of subsidy paid to the English Beet Sugar Corporation, Limited, in respect of the operations of the Cantley factory was: 1925-26, £360,872 13s. 10d.; 1926-27, £505,251 1s. 5d.; and in respect of the Kelham factory, which is the property of Home Grown Sugar, Limited, but worked by the English Beet Sugar Corporation in the joint interest: 1925-26, £103,537 0s. 0d.; 1926-27, £270,127 11s. 4d. Approximately one-third of these sums were recovered by the State in the form of Excise Duty.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this company made in trading profit last year over two-thirds of its issued capital and has paid a 20 per cent. dividend tax free, and has two-thirds of its capital already reserved; and does he think that the state of the Exchequer is such as to enable him to make such lavish payments to capitalism?

Mr. GUINNESS: In view of the difficulties which certain companies had in raising money, I do not think that any lower terms would have attained the object.

INDIA (RESERVE BANK SCHEME).

59. Mr. GILLETT asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the fact that the Committee which has been considering the Reserve Bank Bill has rejected the proposals for a reserve bank with a share capital, it is proposed to establish a State bank without share capital?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Earl Winterton): The Committee which has been sitting in Bombay is to resume its deliberations in Calcutta. I am not yet in a position to make any statement regarding any modifications in the scheme for the Reserve Bank that the Committee may propose.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE.

60. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government are considering any alteration in the system of electing Members to this House; and, if so, whether a Bill will be introduced during this Session?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for HOME AFFAIRS (Captain Hacking): I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the Prime Minister on the 10th March to a question put by the hon. Member for North Lambeth (Mr. Briant).

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that in the six bye-elections held this Session, in popular constituencies, no Member has been returned by a majority vote; and does he not think it more important to get majority representation in this House, than to obtain arbitrary powers for a minority number of hereditary Peers in the other House?

RUSSIA.

ARCOS, LIMITED (POLICE SEARCH).

62. Sir F. HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the information obtained as the result of the examination of the papers found at the Arcos offices of the Russian Trading Delegation, showing the extent to which the Soviet diplomatic and trading representatives in this and other countries have used their diplomatic privileges to create trouble, has been communicated to the Governments of the countries concerned?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson): Yes, Sir. Such information as was discovered during the search at Soviet House relating to Russian interference in domestic affairs in foreign countries has been communicated to the Governments of the countries concerned.

SOVIET CRIMINAL CODE.

63. Sir F. HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the Soviet Code permits the putting to death of people in Russia without trial on the order of the police; if he can state how many British subjects have been dealt with under this Code; and whether he will take steps to warn persons desiring passports to enable them to proceed to Russia of the judicial system that is in vogue there, as now officially described?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The Soviet Criminal Code lays down that punishment is to be determined by the judicial bodies in accordance with their socialistic conception of law, but it is notorious that persons are put to death without what would be termed trial in this country. I am not aware of more than one British subject, Mr. Davison, who has suffered the death penalty and, according to the Soviet Government, he had a trial. As regards the last part of the question, the risks are so well ventilated in the Press that I do not think any special warning is required.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: When was Mr. Davison executed, and what was his alleged offence?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The whole matter concerning Mr. Davison was dealt with in a White Paper, where the hon. and gallant Member will be able to find the information he wants.

GUILDFORD INFIRMARY (DEATHS).

64. Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Health whether his attention has been called to the sudden death of Sarah Ann Edgerton and Elizabeth Fagent at the Guildford Infirmary after they were given medicine supposed to be liquorice powder, and that two other inmates at the same institution were given a dose of this powder and have become seriously ill; and whether, in view of the evidence of the doctor who performed the post-mortem examination, he will have a special inquiry held into all the circumstances?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Sir Kingsley Wood): My right hon. Friend has asked to be furnished with a report of the coroner's inquest, which was adjourned until the 27th instant, and will give the matter careful consideration when this report has been received.

Colonel DAY: Will the Minister also take into consideration the second case referred to in which a woman died from the same effects about six weeks previously?

Sir K. WOOD: I will make inquiries.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

TRAINING CENTRES.

66. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Labour the present position of the training centres at Clayton, Birmingham, Brandon, and Wallsend-on-Tyne, showing the number of men in each centre who have completed the full course, the number of men who left before the end of the course, the number of men in training, and the number of men placed overseas?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of LABOUR (Mr. Betterton): With the hon. Member's permission, I will circulate in the OFFICIAL REPORT a statement giving the desired information.

Following is the statement:

SCHEME OF TRAINING FOR YOUNG UNEMPLOYED MEN.

Statement showing the position on 22nd June, 1927.

—	Completed full course.	Left before end of full course.	Men in training.	Men placed overseas.
Claydon	571	271	189	368
Birmingham	595	1,048	337	—
Brandon	316	173	195	268
Wallsend-on-Tyne	655	600	313	—
	2,137	2,092*	1,034	636

* Of this number 1,272 left to take employment.

TELEPHONE EQUIPMENT FACTORIES (DISMISSALS).

67. Sir H. BRITAIN asked the Minister of Labour the figures of dismissals during the past six months from factories engaged in the manufacture of telephone plant and equipment mainly dependent upon Post Office orders?

Mr. BETTERTON: I regret that statistics giving the desired information are not available.

WIDOWS', ORPHANS' AND OLD AGE
CONTRIBUTORY PENSIONS.

Mr. BATEY: I beg to move:

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend paragraph (c) of Sub-section (1) of Section seven of the 'Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925."

This Measure is introduced to effect a small amendment of the present law, but a very necessary one. When the Act was under consideration in this House it was perhaps impossible, seeing that it was a very large Bill, for hon. Members to realise that this difficulty would arise; it was found out only when the Bill came to be put into force. A hardship is being inflicted upon the wives of men who, as we believe, are entitled to a pension under the Act. When the Bill was going through we really did believe that we had made provision for men who had complied with the conditions to obtain the old age pension when they reached 65 years of age, at least when they were 65 years of age on 1st January, 1928. We also thought that when that man's wife became 65 years of age, she too would be entitled to an old age pension. A man who reaches 70 years of age between now and 1st January, 1928, claims the old age pension under the Old Age Pension Act. Although that man would have been entitled to the old age pension at 65 in January, 1928, simply because he has reached 70 years of age, he is told that his wife is not entitled to a pension until she reaches 70 years of age. I have here the case of an old man who wrote to me a letter which is an example that puts the matter far clearer than I could put it, and I propose to read it to the House in order that hon. Members may see exactly what we mean by amending this Clause. I will not give the name or the address of the writer, but the letter is as follows:

"I note that on Tuesday you intend to introduce a Bill to correct a defect in the Contributory Pensions Bill. Take the case of myself and wife, for example. I have paid to the State Insurance both parts since 1912, and am still paying. I am 70 in September and shall be qualified to receive it, but my wife is 67 in September, and she was under the impression that she would be entitled to it in January next, being the wife of an insured person. She filled up the pink form, and gave all the particulars, but has now received a letter from the Ministry of Health informing her that she is not entitled to it until she reaches the age of 70. We could have managed with a struggle to have carried on with the £1 a week between us. They have taken the extra contributions from me and now they have let me down."

The name of the writer is attached to the letter, and he calls himself "A worker in the building trade." It is a case like that we want to meet by this Bill. When a man is entitled to a pension at the beginning of next year that should not deprive his wife from the right of receiving her pension when she is 65 years of age. I content myself with asking for leave to introduce this Amending Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Batey, Mr. Clynes, Mr. T. Kennedy, Mr. Frederick Roberts, Mr. Smillie, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Whiteley.

WIDOWS', ORPHANS', AND OLD AGE CONTRIBUTORY PENSIONS ACT (1925)
AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL,

"to amend paragraph (c) of Sub-section (1) of Section 7 of the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925," presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday, 11th July, and to be printed. [Bill 157.]

MENTAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Reported, with Amendments, from Standing Committee A.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Minutes of the Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed.

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be taken into consideration upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 156.]

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

STANDING COMMITTEE A.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from Standing Committee A: Captain Brass, Major Colfox, Captain Gunston, and Mr. Herbert Williams; and had appointed in substitution: Captain Bourne, Mr. Duff Cooper, Viscount Elvedon, and Major Steel.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON further reported from the Committee; That they had added the following Fifteen Members to Standing Committee A (in respect of the Wild Birds' Protection Bill): Mr. Barclay-Harvey, Colonel Douglas Clifton Brown, Lord Colum Crichton-Stuart, Mr. Rhys Davies, Sir William Edge, Major Hills, Mr. Robert Hudson, Sir William Joynson-Hicks, Mr. Maxton, Mr. Hugh Morrison, Sir Clive Morrison-Bell, Dr. Drummond Shiels, Mr. Snell, Sir Fredric Wise, and Sir Hilton Young.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—

West Bridgford Urban District Council Bill, without Amendment.

Westgate and Birchington Water Bill, with Amendments.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to consolidate the Scarborough Gas Company's special Acts; to extend their limits of supply; to authorise the company to acquire additional lands, to construct additional works, and to raise further capital; and for other purposes." [Scarborough Gas Company (Consolidation) Bill] [Lords.]

And also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to authorise an alteration of the tunnel under the River Mersey authorised by the Mersey Tunnel Act, 1925; and for other purposes." [Mersey Tunnel (Birkenhead Entrance, Etc.) Bill] [Lords.]

Scarborough Gas Company (Consolidation) Bill [[Lords.]

Mersey Tunnel (Birkenhead Entrance, Etc.) Bill [Lords.],

Read the First time; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

WHITLEY COUNCILS.

Mr. DUCKWORTH asked the Minister of Labour the nature of the replies to the letters he recently issued to industrial councils in the effort to ascertain definitely their views on the need for the legalisation of the decisions of Whitley Councils?

Mr. BETTERTON: The majority of the joint industrial councils have not yet reached a decision on the subject of my right hon. Friend's letter, and I think that it is desirable to postpone any statement on the matter until the views of all the councils have been conveyed to him.

LOCAL EMPLOYMENT COMMITTEES.

Mr. MOSLEY asked the Minister of Labour the reason for the delay, from 10th November, 1926, to 29th January, 1927, in replying to a letter from the clerk to the Smethwick Borough Council informing him of the appointment of Councillor R. A. Baker as his council's representative on the local employment committee?

Mr. BETTERTON: The delay was due to the necessity for making certain inquiries before a final decision could be reached.

Mr. MOSLEY asked the Minister of Labour whether he has laid down a new rule that no person occupying the position of political agent shall be eligible for appointment to a local employment committee; whether he will give the date on which this rule was laid down; what are the reasons for this change of policy; and whether he will state specific instances where this discrimination has been exercised, together with particulars of the political parties to which the persons concerned are attached?

Mr. BETTERTON: It has always been the policy to keep the local employment committees as far as possible free from politics, and, owing to the activities in which a full-time political agent must be engaged, my right hon. Friend decided at the beginning of last year that a person occupying that position was not eligible for appointment as a member of a committee. I do not think I ought to publish the cases in which the point has arisen, but no distinction is drawn between one political party and another.

— AFFORESTATION.

Sir R. THOMAS asked the hon. Member for Monmouth, as representing the Forestry Commissioners, whether he is considering the possibility further to extend the present policy of afforestation with a view to relieving unemployment?

Sir L. FORESTIER-WALKER: No distinction is now made between the Forestry Commission's normal and relief work, the latter being met by adjustment of policy, which included the adoption of an annually expanding planting programme. The Seventh Annual Report of the Forestry Commissioners, recently published, dealing with forest policy, shows that the present position is not satisfactory, and sets out some of the chief considerations which have to be borne in mind in laying down the future forest policy of Great Britain.

— RUBBER OUTPUT (RESTRICTION).

Mr. DIXEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that the revenue of the Federated Malay States depends almost entirely on the rubber and tin industries, and in view of the fact that the British rubber industry is in a critical condition owing to the vast planting extensions by the Dutch in Java and Sumatra which in a few years' time will produce all the rubber required, he is considering any scheme for the preservation of the British planters?

Mr. AMERY: As regards production in the Dutch East Indies, I would refer to the reply given on the 10th May to the hon. Member for Shoreditch. The existing rubber restriction scheme aims at the preservation of the planters, and I am not considering any other scheme.

— ESTATES IN LIQUIDATION.

Dr. WATTS asked the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the inconvenience and loss sustained by the creditors of an estate in liquidation by the long delay on the part of the Official Receiver in distributing the assets after their claims have been established and the assets realised; and if he will take steps to have this inconvenience removed?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The Bankruptcy Act and Rules contain special provisions for the speedy realisation of assets in the smaller cases, which form the large majority of those dealt with by Official Receivers, and I have no reason to suppose that long delays are common. If, however, my hon. Friend has any particular case in mind, I shall be glad to look into it.

— BUILDERS' WOODWORK (IMPORTS).

Mr. W. HIRST asked the President of the Board of Trade the total amount, respectively, of imported doors and made-up joinery from the United States of America, Sweden and Holland during the years 1913, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923 1924, 1925 and 1926?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The following statement shows the declared value of the total imports into the United Kingdom of builders' workwork (window-frames, doors, etc.), consigned from the United States, Sweden and Netherlands, respectively, in each of the years specified.

Years.	Consigned from United States.	Sweden.	Netherlands.
	£	£	£
1913 ...	39,898	71,435	3,231
1919 ...	14,000	121,970	51,274
1920 ...	26,921	215,277	1,297
1921 ...	162,943	182,193	1,815
1922 ...	48,771	141,464	8,194
1923 ...	123,239	188,895	12,085
1924 ...	234,130	309,176	34,700
1925 ...	558,641	335,601	55,739
1926 ...	880,554	343,834	79,136

The official description in 1913 and 1919 of the imports shown above was "House Frames, Fittings and Joiners' Work."

Prior to 1st April, 1923, imports into the Irish Free State are included in the figures.

COAL MINING INDUSTRY.

PRICES.

Miss WILKINSON asked the Secretary for Mines what is the average price per ton of coal export and at home, respectively, before the subsidy and at the present day?

Colonel LANE FOX: The average declared value per ton f.o.b. of coal exported was 20s. 1d. in July, 1925, and 18s. 4d. in May, 1927. I regret that figures of the average price of coal sold at home are not separately recorded, and those of the average price of all coal during the first quarter of this year are not yet fully available.

CONSUMPTION.

Mr. W. M. WATSON asked the Secretary for Mines whether he can give figures showing the reduction in consumption of coal per head of the population in the chief industrial countries since the year 1908?

Colonel LANE FOX: The hon. Member will find in Table A of Appendix No. 1 of Volume 3 of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Coal Industry (1925) the figures for this country, and in Appendix No. 18 (pages 161-173) such figures as are available for Belgium, France, Germany and the United States of America.

PRODUCTION (FOREIGN COUNTRIES))

Mr. GRUNDY asked the Secretary for Mines whether he can give figures showing, since the year 1908, the increased production of coal in countries which formerly bought, on balance, a large quantity of coal from this country?

Colonel LANE FOX: The following are the particulars asked for:

	Production in 1908.	Production in 1925.
	(Tons of 2,240 lbs.)
Germany (pre-War territory):
Coal	143,746,000	169,881,000
Lignite	63,709,000	137,543,000
France (pre-War territory):
Coal	36,044,000	41,097,000
Lignite	740,000	992,000
Spain	3,823,000	5,830,000
Italy:
Coal	2,000	186,000
Lignite	472,000	1,090,000
Netherlands ...	894,000	7,003,000
South America:
Brazil	14,000	264,000*
Chile (chiefly lignite)	925,000	1,420,000

* 1924.

POST OFFICE.

TELEPHONE SYSTEM (DEVELOPMENT).

Colonel DAY asked the Postmaster-General what steps his Department are taking for the purpose of developing the telephone system of Great Britain?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: As far as it is possible to reply within the limits of a Parliamentary answer, it may be said that with the purpose of developing the telephone system of this country the Post Office is making continuous efforts to maintain and raise the quality of the service by improved engineering, technique and operating methods, to provide adequate margins of equipment and other plant in order to meet future growth, and to increase the number of subscribers by personal canvassing and other means.

MAILS, TARBERT.

Mr. MACQUISTEN asked the Postmaster-General whether he will again consider the mail which comes to Ardishaig, proceeding on to Tarbert, Loch Fyne, so that letters for Tarbert may be received in time to be answered by the afternoon post?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I regret that in existing circumstances the desired improvement could only be given at an unjustifiable expense. The question will be borne in mind in case any opportunity should present itself of effecting the change with less expense.

TELEPHONE OPERATOR, TARBERT.

Mr. MACQUISTEN asked the Postmaster-General why the post of telephone operator in the town of Tarbert, Loch Fyne, which was advertised as vacant in February last, was given to a female operator, notwithstanding that it had been stated in the notice that preference would be given to ex-service men, when as a result of such intended preference some possible applicants refrained from applying, and of the 10 ex-service men who did apply only two or three were interviewed and considered?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The post in question is one for a telephone caretaker-operator, who is required to attend to intermittent telephone calls during the night and on Sundays, the work being performed either by himself or by members of his family. All the applicants for the post were interviewed but a number of them subsequently withdrew their applications, and I am satisfied that the candidate finally selected, who is the father of the girl referred to, was the most suitable of the remaining candidates, although not an ex-service man.

ROADS (EXPENDITURE ON MAINTENANCE).

Sir A. KNOX asked the Minister of Transport the total expenditure on the maintenance of roads during the year 1926, distinguishing between first-class, second-class, and unclassified roads, and between funds provided by the Exchequer and by the rates?

Colonel ASHLEY: Information regarding the actual expenditure of highway authorities on the maintenance of roads during the year 1926 is not available, but I have had a statement prepared on the lines of my hon. and gallant Friend's question giving the estimated expenditure during the year 1926-27 by highway authorities in England and Wales and Scotland upon the maintenance (as distinguished from major improvements), of Class I, Class II and scheduled unclassified roads, and of the grants made to meet such expenditure.

The statement is as follows:

	Estimated Expenditure.				Grants from the Road Fund.
	Classified Roads.		Sched- uled Un- classified Roads.	Total.	Classified Roads.		Sched- uled Un- classified Roads.	Total.
	Class I.	Class II.			Class I.	Class II.
	£	£	£	£	£	£	£	£
England and Wales.	14,232,830	5,440,153	4,999,634	23,672,617	7,120,189	1,359,859	1,249,278	9,729,326
Scotland ...	1,757,377	556,128	407,728	2,721,233	878,556	139,027	101,936	1,119,519
Great Britain ...	15,990,207	5,996,281	5,407,362	27,393,850	7,998,745	1,498,886	1,351,214	10,848,845

TEACHERS' PENSIONS.

Mr. S. SAMUEL asked the President of the Board of Education what is the number of teachers who are receiving pensions under the Teachers' Superannuation Acts of 1898 and 1912, and what is the average amount of these pensions, excluding annuities; and what is the present number of teacher pensioners under the Acts of 1898 and 1912 who are receiving no increase of pension under the Pensions (Increase) Acts of 1920 and 1924, and what is the average amount of pension received by these teacher pensioners under the Acts of 1898 and 1912?

Lord E. PERCY: On the 31st March, 1927, there were 3,981 teachers receiving superannuation or disablement allowances under the Elementary School Teachers (Superannuation) Acts, 1898 and 1912 and the average amount of these allowances, excluding annuities, was £37 10s. The present number of teacher pensioners receiving no increase of pension under the Pensions (Increase) Acts, 1920-24, is 902, and the average amount of pension received by them under the Acts of 1898 and 1912 is £39 4s.

AGRICULTURE (INQUIRY).

Mr. DIXEY asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the position of the agricultural industry of this country, he will consider the appointment of a commission of inquiry?

The PRIME MINISTER: I should be very glad to appoint a Committee for the purpose suggested if I thought that any useful result could be anticipated. It has to be remembered, however, that several inquiries have been held during the past few years, of which I may instance the Agricultural Tribunal, the Linlithgow Committee and the recent Report on the Agricultural Output of England and Wales in 1925. The Reports provide a considerable body of information in regard to agriculture, and I doubt if a further inquiry would materially add to our present knowledge, or lead to suggestions which would place the Government in a better position to consider the problem than they are at present.

ST. STEPHEN'S HALL (PICTURES).

Miss WILKINSON asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, why the picture of the holding down of the Speaker in his chair has been removed from its place; whether it has been relegated to a Committee Room; and whether, in view of the empty spaces still remaining on the walls of St. Stephen's Hall, room can be found for the new pictures without removing this one?

Captain HACKING (for The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS): I would refer the hon. Member to a reply which I gave to a question on the 7th March last, when the House was informed of the intention to remove the pictures from St. Stephen's Hall. The whole of the eight panels are now occupied by the new paintings.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.

Considered in Committee.

[Captain FITZROY in the Chair.]

CLAUSE 1.—(Duty on Tea.)

Mr. JAMES HUDSON: I beg to move, in page 2, line 5, to leave out the word "fourpence" and to insert instead thereof the words "one penny."

I propose this Amendment to reduce the duty to 1d., but our real intention is to obtain an entire abolition of the Tea Duty. Nevertheless, I wish to say that this Amendment is not of a perfunctory character. It is quite true that it has been moved many times, and seems to be something in the nature of a hardy annual. With the passage of years the need for the acceptance of this proposal becomes greater and greater. When I first had the honour of moving this Amendment two years ago I expressed the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this question might come sufficiently near to the example set by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) who in a previous year had effected a considerable reduction in the Tea Duty, and I was hopeful that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in his turn might be glad to earn the credit of completing the process which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley initiated. I am sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer withstood that temptation and continues to impose the Tea Duty, and states at the same time that the ultimate extinction of the Tea Duty is an important aim of his fiscal policy. I am pleased that in this matter the Chancellor of the Exchequer is following the gleam, although that gleam seems very much like a shadow or a will-o'-the-wisp which appears to get further away as we proceed towards it. The Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer is not alone in the difficulty of finding an ideal which it is not easy to practice. That was also the experience of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who had before them for many years the Newcastle programme, and I believe that programme had some influence at the time on the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the part which had reference to the free breakfast table was particularly useful to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George) in the presentation of many of his speeches in the country. Observe what happened when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs was faced with the possibility of carrying out his ideals. It was very much like what is happening in the case of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. On 2nd June, 1913, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs, when discussing the effect of this class of taxation such as is imposed on tea said it was actually less than in any other civilised country in Europe, and he said:

"It is a proposal to take £10,000,000 of taxation off a very considerable proportion of the population of this country who have great political power. You must not leave a class which has great political power and control over expenditure without any share of responsibility."

It is the theory that it is necessary to impose by a duty of this sort a sense of responsibility upon a considerable class of the community that is preventing successive Chancellors of the Exchequer from carrying out the ideal at which they profess to aim. Unfortunately, the theory of responsibility preached by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs has become, in the mouth of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, a theory of punishment. The idea, evidently, in the mind of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, if we are to argue from what he said to us the last time this matter was discussed, is that it is necessary to retain this type of taxation—taxes upon sugar, taxes upon tea—because something happened last year for which, as he says, the community must pay, for which, indeed, somebody must be punished. Indeed, he used the word "punishment" in the phrase that he adopted in the House on that occasion. I think that, if the right hon. Gentleman will refresh his memory from the OFFICIAL REPORT, he will see that I am correctly representing the point of view that he took, that someone had committed acts last year which prevented him from doing what he would lead us to suppose he otherwise would have done. I can only say that, if it were possible to do unto Governments as they deserve to be done unto, and if there is to be any punishment applied at all in connection with the events that happened last year, the punishment should fall, not upon the taxpayers, but upon those who impose the tax; for I would venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that, if he would consider the case of the tea-drinking miners' wives of this country, and reckon up their deserts and the deserts of a Government who tried to persuade them that by a longer working day somehow or other things would come right, or, at least, would be improved—if he would talk to the working miners' wives to-day, he would find out how very much worse, in spite of all that the Government did, their lot has become; and, if any payment should be made, it should be made by those responsible for those changes.

It has often been said, in the discussions in connection with this matter, that the Tea Duty, like duties placed upon some other commodities, is largely of a voluntary or optional character, that people, if they desire not to pay it, if they find it too burdensome, can avoid the burden by ceasing to consume the commodity upon which the duty is levied. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself has destroyed, or at any rate considerably weakened, that theory by his own admissions. As he says quite frankly—I quote from the discussions that took place last year on this matter—

“Tea and sugar, and commodities of that kind, are the basic comforts on which the household economy depends.”

He does not describe them, it is true, as absolute necessities, but the statement that he makes represents, I believe, not merely a theory, but an undoubted economic fact to the great mass of the working population of this country. The diet of millions of our people is an utterly monotonous diet. The opportunity of change from one type of food to another is entirely denied them. They and their children must continue day after day eating something that is almost as little varied, especially in these days of depression, as the diet of the Irish labourer, which for years was nothing but the one commodity, potatoes. In thousands, probably millions, of English homes at the present time, there is little variation from a constant diet of bread, with, perhaps, a little fat of some sort to enable it to be consumed. Meat becomes more and more a rare article of diet, particularly for great bodies of the unemployed and for those whose wages have been so considerably reduced; and to make such a diet palatable at all it is a necessity—not merely a comfort, as the right hon. Gentleman said, but a necessity—that there should be some means of providing a drink for the people that will enable them to get any satisfaction out of such a diet. For that reason, therefore, the consumption of tea by large numbers of the workers of this country may be regarded as almost as much a necessity as the consumption of bread itself.

If I am correct in that estimate of the position, then I suggest that the next argument which I desire to present to the Committee—and it has been presented already by several of my hon. Friends—becomes of very serious import. The fact that the tax upon tea is a flat-rate tax, and not an ad valorem duty, means that that tax falls most heavily upon the people who most require this commodity to make their diet palatable. Working people buy tea at a price somewhere between 1s. 6d. and 2s. a pound, the poorer working people, particularly, very rarely paying much above 1s. 8d. a pound for the tea that they buy. A tax of 4d. a pound on tea at that price means a 20 per cent. tax upon those persons. A tax of 4d. a pound upon tea consumed by other classes in the community—people who are able to afford 3s. 6d., 3s. 8d., 4s. 0d., or more per pound—becomes a tax of considerably less than 10 per cent.; so that the continuance of the tax on this particular commodity is specially burdensome upon the class that this Committee ought to be most anxious to relieve of taxation.

There is another interesting factor about this unequal incidence of taxation, which I believe is not very often referred to. The tax upon tea operates with a different incidence in different districts. It is a remarkable fact that in certain areas, where the water supply is pure, with a little admixture of lime or other materials, very much less tea is required to get the infusion than is the case where the water supply is not so pure. I know that some hon. Gentlemen may think that this is rather straining an interesting point, but it has a very practical bearing. I was talking only recently to a working-class woman whose home was removed from the Manchester area to the Stockport area. In Manchester they get their water from Thirlmere, while in Stockport they have a water supply that is drawn from the Derbyshire district, and I believe there is a good deal of lime in the water. This working-class woman told me, in the quaint way that working people have in our district, that, when she was in Manchester, for her family of four, she used to put five teaspoonfuls into the teapot, one for each person and one for the pot; but that now she had gone to Stockport, it had to be still one teaspoonful for each person, but the pot now required three. Therefore, the Stockport working woman, to procure the same result in the infusion of tea, is actually paying, not only more for her tea in the long run, but is paying a bigger tax to the community than the Manchester woman: and, I would add, that argument applies particularly strongly when you come to a place like London, with its chalky water supplies, where the quantity of tea required is even greater than in the area to which I have referred. I pass from the question of the difference in the 4.0 p.m. incidence of this tax to another point. The continuance of a tax on this commodity, as, indeed, upon any commodity, as is well known to theoretical economists, gives more and more opportunity to the trust and the large firm to operate the article which is taxed. The artificial difficulties created by taxation of any kind, the difficulty of having to deal with bonded warehouses, the necessity of having to work in a certain area, often means that the small man is driven out by the competitive forces of the time, and it is only the large firm and trust which remain. In fact, we have admitted from these benches, that although my right hon. Friend reduced the tax upon tea considerably in 1924, for a time some part of that reduction could be seized upon by large tea trusts who were able to operate in this particular market, and this possibility remains at a maximum as long as the tax upon tea remains. If you could entirely free this commodity of tea, Free Trade in tea would be much more a reality, as far as the large trust is concerned, than is the case at the present moment. In passing, I may say, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough (Mr. A. V. Alexander) pointed out in the House, in spite of the operations of the tea trust in 1924, it was none the less true that in the co-operative societies alone in that year, there was an increase in the consumption of tea of more than 6,000,000 lbs., and what could be accomplished then would be accomplished to an even greater extent if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to the entire abolition of the Tea Tax.

[Mr. J. Hudson.]

There is a further interesting set of reactions that, I think, ought to be studied by us before a final decision is reached on this question, and if those reactions are to be considered wholly, it is worth while for a moment to-day to consider the general drinking habits of the community. The community to-day is spending upon one set of intoxicants—and I would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this particularly—far more than the community can afford.

Viscountess ASTOR: Hear, hear!

Mr. HUDSON: £300,000,000 and more per annum on the drink bill ought to be a matter of very careful consideration for a Chancellor who pretends that he cannot make reductions of the sort that I am proposing because the community cannot afford it. The community can afford it as long as it can pay for intoxicants a sum of money to the extent I have named.

Viscountess ASTOR: Hear, hear!

Mr. HUDSON: I wish the Noble Lady would let me put my case. I am putting a case which, I think, is of wide application, and if she would hold her peace I think my hon. Friends would quite understand—

Mr. ERNEST BROWN: The hon. Member ought to be grateful for her assistance.

Mr. HUDSON: I am sure the Noble Lady wants to assist, but I can imagine some hon. Members not being quite so open to my argument as they might otherwise be if that support were not so vigorously expressed. Members in this House often argue, when we put the case of too great an expenditure on intoxicants, that the way to deal with that evil is not by legislation but by education. Give the people, they say, through education, through propaganda, through new facilities, an opportunity to know that there is something better than intoxicants to consume. If that be the only valid argument, it becomes very important that the community should give the substitute for intoxicants a maximum of encouragement, and the community that continues to place taxes upon any commodity that should become a substitute for intoxicants is really doing its best to keep the community wedded to the intoxicants. This dependence upon education for the settlement of our difficulties regarding intoxicating liquors is nothing more than a pretence, especially when the purchase of tea continues to be a difficult matter for a large section of the community.

Let me examine this a little more closely. In this Budget there has been an increase in certain taxes upon wine, and I suppose that the people who are taxed on their wine will be able to transfer their burden, if they desire to do so, by drinking tea instead of wine. They will want a good tea if they have habituated themselves to drinking wine. It is comparatively easy, in the present state of the tea tax, for a wine drinker to transfer his habits to tea drinking as far as taxation is concerned, for the wine drinker, if he gives up wine and takes tea, probably gives for his tea 4s. or 5s. a pound, and only pays 4d. in taxation on that tea, or probably from 5 to 10 per cent. But with regard to the person in the slums who has become habituated to drinking beer, whom you want to educate and encourage into different habits, if, as an alternative, he drinks tea at 1s. 8d. a pound, which is about the best he can buy, you place upon that tea a tax of 20 per cent. So that you are taxing a beer-drinker, if he changes over to tea as a substitute, 20 per cent., whereas you tax the wine drinker who takes tea as a substitute only about 5 per cent.

If there be any sincerity in the argument about the educative value of substitutes, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be very glad indeed to support this Amendment. Unfortunately, I am afraid, that the right hon. Gentleman develops like most Chancellors of the Exchequer develop, if I may speak with respect, a strain of idleness with regard to taxes which have continued for many years, and which may be expected to yield, if they remain, a favourable revenue for many years to come. I was reading in Bastable's "Public Finance" the other day, the statement which applied to all Chancellors, that taxes of the kind we are now discussing are both productive, and, in times of prosperity, elastic, without any undue pressure having to be used, and Chancellors of the Exchequer, who may sometimes get worried about the results of pressure which it is necessary to use in the raising of taxes, would prefer to stick to those taxes which prove elastic, whatever their ideals might be about the ultimate end. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman the depression we are in is so long continued, that there can little incentive left to any Chancellor for continuing this tax for, at any rate, the reason given by Bastable.

What I am suggesting is happening now is what happened at the end of the Napoleonic Wars. We are in a position of depression so long continued that it has become one of the first problems of statesmanship to relieve those heavily burdened masses of the community upon whom the real prosperity of our country depends. Economic history has taught us to recognise the beneficent action of Wallace and Huskisson who, in 1823, started us on the road to the dropping of taxes on commodities, even although the financial position of the community at that time was a very hard one, and even although Huskisson, had he been as foolish as the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, might just as easily have said he had the excuse of the disorders of that time for keeping on the heavy taxation from which the people in those days were suffering. But Huskisson and Wallace and other statesmen since have realised that if the community was to be put upon its feet, taxes upon commodities must be more and more diminished until they were finally abolished. In the spirit of the days when Huskisson and Wallace lived, I put forward, as the whole party to which I belong puts forward this Amendment, and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before it is too late, will be able to give some heed to the plea we make.

The CHANCELLOR of the EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): The hon. Gentleman has made a very eloquent speech, and won the approval not only of the Committee but also of the Noble Lady. Even thus fortified, I am afraid I cannot respond to the appeal he has made, although I heartily congratulate him upon its form, and also upon the fact that in part, at any rate, he found something new to say upon this subject. We have debated this tax in the present Parliament nine or 10 times—on the Resolution, on the Report of the Resolution, in Committee and on Report, and this is the Third Budget—and I think there is no one who, wherever he sits, would seriously propose to take a course different from that which we find ourselves obliged to adopt. The hon. Member spoke of the monotony of diet of the British wage-earning classes and their hard existence, but, considering all that we have passed through in the Great War, and in the continued and repeated industrial confusion of our country, the remarkable thing is that the consuming power of the people should not have been prejudicially affected. It has not, on the whole, been prejudicially affected. It compares, as everyone knows, very favourably with that of every European nation. In fact, the foreign wage-earning classes would be delighted if at any time they were able to command either the quantity or variety of food and drink which our people, I am thankful to say, in spite of all our difficulties, are still able to obtain.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The tendency on the whole is for a slight upward movement in the consumption of tea. There has been since the War a strong recovery and, since the reduction the right hon. Gentleman opposite made, a complete recovery in the consumption. It is very remarkable that in spite of the industrial troubles of last year, the consumption of tea, sugar, tobacco, and also of bread and meat, was not seriously affected. On the whole there is no doubt or question that the general condition in which the mass of the people of the country live is superior to that of any European nation, and especially to that European or Asiatic Power which always claims a meed of approbation from those who sit opposite. The hon. Member has reminded me of an argument which he says I used at an earlier stage when I said I was keeping the Tea Duty on as a punishment. Whether I used the word punishment or not—I have not refreshed my mind with the context—it is not the doctrine of punishment that inspires me in the matter. It is the doctrine of consequences. The finances of the year have been completely disorganised and we have had to face an enormous deficit, which with very great difficulty we have endeavoured to circumvent without additions to the burdens of the masses of the people or without imposing still harder direct taxation. We have managed to come through those difficulties but it is obvious that the remission of the Tea Duty is quite beyond my power in the circumstances. The Amendment would, I think, cost something like £2,500,000 or £3,500,000, and a complete repeal of the duties would cost between £5,000,000 and £7,000,000. I cannot contemplate for a moment such as abstraction from my limited resources.

The hon. Member devoted a large portion of his speech to showing how the Tea Tax in its present form fell upon the poorest consumers, and he pointed out how much better it would be if an ad valorem instead of a specific tax were imposed. The argument was specious and was developed with some skill, but I really cannot answer the hon. Member better than similar arguments were answered by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer when he occupied a position of greater responsibility and, from some points of view, less freedom. Dealing with this very argument, the right hon. Gentleman said:

“On the face of it, it would appear reasonable that the duty upon tea should bear some proportion to the value of the article, but whatever strength there is in that demand is derived from the idea that the rich man's tea ought to pay a higher rate of duty than the poor man's, and I shall have occasion to show that, however cogent that reason may appear on the surface, as a matter of fact in practice there is little or nothing in it.”

Little or nothing in the excellent speech to which we have listened:

“It is a mistake to suppose that the working people of the country consume wholly cheap tea. As a matter of fact the working people of the country have discovered that cheap tea is not economical.”
—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 30th June, 1924; col. 962, Vol. 175.]

The consumption of tea on the whole is increasing, and the consumption of alcoholic liquors is decreasing at a rate which causes anxiety to the Exchequer and joy to the Noble Lady. I cannot believe it would be desirable in the interest of temperance for us to place ourselves in the serious difficulty which would result from an immediate abrogation of the duty upon tea. The duty on tea, almost alone among the subjects by which our revenue is raised, is actually lower than it was before the War after eight years of enlightened Liberal and Radical administration; and when we are looking around for subjects for immediate reduction, however desirable a reduction on the duty on tea may be, I am sure it is not one which would have the first claim. I would put it very high in the order of priority of reduction but I am not called upon at present to choose between taxes that can be reduced, because I am only in the position of making my way with great difficulty through a Budget which, in spite of every device I could think of, and which it is my duty to search for, is only now narrowly maintaining its equilibrium.

Mr. E. BROWN: The speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. J. Hudson) was interesting. It shows the different view taken in the House about the Tea Duty according to whether you sit on that side or this. I very well remember when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) introduced the Tea Duty two years ago, certain Members who are now on those benches were not satisfied with the reduction, and they proceeded to set a precedent for the hon. Member for Huddersfield by moving a still further reduction with the purpose, of course, of obtaining leaflets, which were duly used at the succeeding election against those of us who supported the then Chancellor of the Exchequer in trying to get a stable, Radical Budget. The hon. Member for Huddersfield, in his excellent speech, was a little self-righteous, for when he claimed for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley the sole credit for the reduction of the Tea Duty, he should have remembered that there were about 130 members of the party represented on these benches without whose votes that reduction could not have been got. Also when he referred to the breakfast table duties and the promises of pre-War days, despite the one Budget of the right hon. Gentleman, for which we were grateful, two years ago the amount collected, taking a comparison between Great Britain and Northern Ireland, from which area the tax is now collected, and the United Kingdom, for which it was then collected, is relatively higher than it was in 1913.

I find on reference to the figures that in 1913 the Exchequer revenue from tea was £6,499,000 while in 1925 it was £5,789,000. The rate of tax may have been lower, but the amount got from the women and children was higher. So I hope when he is developing his argument outside the House, he will not forget to point out that it is not his party alone that was responsible for the reduction two years ago but there were others concerned. I am sure the Committee have heard with pleasure the last sentences of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, if he gets an opportunity next year, he will make a remission of taxation, and we shall confidently hope that he will adopt the model of the British Navy and put women and children first if any remission of taxation is to be given, such as a remission of the duty on tea, which affects women and children more than any other section of the community.

Viscountess ASTOR: I rise to make a slight protest. I quite understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may not be able to accept the Amendment, and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have done so, but it is a very serious point that the right hon. Gentleman should make the assertion that pleased the Noble Lady the Member for Plymouth that drink was going down. Surely as a nation we cannot go on spending £300,000,000 on drink—in fact, it is more than that—and it will not go down as long as we have men in public life who refuse to face facts that are so disquieting to many of us, who are not only looking to the revenue from a money point of view, but from the point of view of the permanent good of the country. It is disheartening, when people see the great efforts the country is making to get back industrial supremacy, to see that we do not get a lead from our leading men to warn us against such appalling extravagance, which belongs, not to one section of the country nor to one section of the House of Commons. I do not want to make it a party question. It is not a party question but a national question.

[Viscountess Astor.]

Mr. SANDEMAN: Are we not discussing tea?

Viscountess ASTOR: We are discussing drink. It is all very well to try and make a joke, but it is not a joke. We belong to the Conservative party, which is interested in Imperial politics and has an Imperial point of view. Our Dominions have faced this question of drink, and throughout the Dominions they are doing all they can. We are looking forward to the time when we can take the tax completely off tea and the commodities that the people of the country need, but until we face up to the appalling expenditure on drink, I see no chance of reducing the tax, and that is not a question for one side but for all sides of the House. It is pre-eminently a woman's question, because in spite of the hard times we have been through, we must still spend money on tea and sugar. It is a great tribute to the people of the country that when they are hard pressed they will still look after their children, but let the Chancellor remember that women—I know that is a tender subject with him—

Mr. CHURCHILL: I hope not only in their electoral capacity.

Viscountess ASTOR: I would not dare to be so personal as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because my knowledge is too great to deal in personalities. I would say to the right hon. Gentleman, always remember whenever you come to reduce taxation on commodities, if possible, reduce the tax on commodities which the people must have, and raise the taxation on things which people need not have, and one of those things is intoxicating drink.

Mr. SNOWDEN: Although the subject to which the Noble Lady has devoted her observations is only indirectly associated with the matter raised by the Amendment, I do not regret that this question of the enormous and wasteful expenditure upon drink has been introduced into the Debate. I will not pursue it further than to say that I have been amazed during the last few years, knowing all the talk we have had about the need for national economy, to find commercial men, especially, so ignorant in regard to what is the greatest and the biggest form of national expenditure, and one of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to be neglectful. I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended by an observation that he made to convey what appeared to me to be the obvious implication of his remarks, when he urged as a reason why no reduction of the Tea Duty ought to be made at the present time, that an increase in tea drinking might have an injurious effect, from the point of view of revenue, upon the receipts from alcoholic liquor.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I never said anything like that and I never thought anything like that. That was rather fastened upon the remarks I made by the Noble Lady.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I referred to the observation because it was quite clear to me, and I think it must have been to other hon. Members, that that was the only reasonable interpretation that could be put upon the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. I am, therefore, glad, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to be glad, that I have given him the opportunity of repudiating what seemed to me to be the obvious interpretation. I must have listened to between 50 and 60 Debates in this House on the Tea Duty, and upon such a hackneyed subject it is very difficult to say anything new. I should like to join with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in extending to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. J. Hudson) our hearty congratulations, not merely upon the great ability which he displayed in his speech, but upon the introduction of new matter into this well-worn theme. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, as we expected, has declined to accept the Amendment. The reason he has given is that the financial position of the country is such that he cannot possibly afford the small loss of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 of revenue which would be involved in the acceptance of this Amendment. The Noble Lady said that if we had been in office I should not have reduced the Tea Duty still further, or have abolished it. I can assure the Noble Lady that if I had had an opportunity of introducing a second Budget in this House, there would have been neither Tea Duty nor Sugar Duty nor any duty upon any article of food in the fiscal system of this country. The money was there in the right hon. Gentleman's first Budget. He inherited a surplus which would have provided sufficient money to sweep away all food taxation, and have left a considerable margin, but he did not do that. He preferred other means of disposing of that surplus. He reduced the Income Tax and Super-tax.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir FREDERICK HALL: And he increased the Death Duties to the same amount.

Mr. SNOWDEN: He did no such thing. If the hon. and gallant Member was not quite so impetuous in his observations he would be a little more accurate, and perhaps there would be more common sense in his observations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not choose to use the surplus for the reduction of taxation upon the necessities of life, or upon what we describe as the basic comforts of the working classes. One reason why we have a claim upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a reduction of taxation on tea or sugar in this Budget is the record of Conservative Governments since the end of the War. The only reduction in indirect taxation which they have made have been the reduction in the Tea Duty in the Budget presented by the right hon. Member for Hillhead (Sir R. Horne), a reduction of 4d. per pound, and a reduction in the Beer Duty. All the other remissions of taxation, during a period of abounding revenue and huge surpluses, have been in favour of the well-to-do and the rich portion of the community. Therefore, we have a claim upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer now. The right hon. Gentleman has not only not reduced any working-class taxation in any of the three Budgets for which he has been responsible, but he has increased the taxation upon the working classes very considerably. There are, I suppose, at least 12 articles in common use amongst the working classes to-day which are bearing very heavy taxation: taxation which was not in existence or operation before the right hon. Gentleman took charge of the finances of this country. There has only been the comparatively slight reduction in indirect taxation which was made in the Budget of four or five years ago, namely, the reduction of the Tea Duty.

We did not expect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would accept this Amendment. He tells us that he is not in a position to do so. We know that the finances of the country, after three years of business management, are not in a position to afford reductions in this taxation. I do not expect, so long as the right hon. Gentleman remains in his present office, that we shall have any balance. As I have mentioned already, he had a very large surplus from his predecessor, but the two Budgets for which he has been responsible up to now have shown very large deficits. Therefore, we shall have to wait until we get rid of this Government, and with it get rid of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before we can expect a fulfilment of this almost century-old demand for a free breakfast table, and the removal of taxes upon the necessities of life. Judging by all the evidence which the country supplies, I do not think we shall have to wait very long for that desirable event.

Mr. MONTAGUE: It is a remarkable thing that in any discussion of this character opportunity is taken by certain hon. Members to bring up the question of teetotalism. I do not want to make a speech in favour of drink; I am an abstemious person. I wonder why fallacious economic arguments are always put forward when such questions come up. I realise, of course, that this subject is somewhat removed from the question of the Tea Duty, but it has been discussed, and I should like to refer to it. We have been told by the right hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) that one form of national expenditure in these days in regard to which we require economy is of the most wasteful and the most baneful form possible. I am not going to say much about the banefulness of it. Excess of every kind is baneful; but I am comforted by the fact that drunkenness and excess in the consumption of alcoholic liquor is going down very rapidly in this country. That is very satisfactory.

What I want to put to the last speaker is this, that as far as the working-class people are concerned—when it is a question of the reduction of taxation upon food, working-class people are concerned more than any other class of people—the amount expended in recreation of one kind or another is an amount that ought to be able to be afforded by the working-class community, considering the progress that we have been making for many years past in the power of production, in the power of utilising labour and natural resources for the production of wealth. What is it that the workers spend? They spend something like £30 per family, on the average, on intoxicating liquor. It may be a bad thing that they do that, and it might be better that they should spend the money on ginger pop, or something else; but my point is, whether we describe that expenditure as wasteful or not, the workers are entitled to spend £30 a year in recreation, in beverages or anything of the kind, wasteful or not.

[Mr. Montague.]

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now discussing a subject which has no connection with the Amendment, which is, that the Tea Duty be reduced.

Mr. MONTAGUE: I do not intend to occupy the time of the Committee further, but the point has been raised and I regard it as a complete fallacy. Every time this question is raised we are treated to teetotal lectures, and something ought to be said in order to put the economic point of view. The workers are not poor because they drink; they are poor because they are robbed.

Mr. SCRYMGEOUR: I want to deal with the reference made by the right hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) when he said that it is a most important thing from the point of view of securing a reduction in our taxation that the business men of the country do not face up to this question. During the War the business men of this country took a great stand in regard to the subject which has been introduced into this discussion. They called for the stoppage of the drink traffic, which undoubtedly does provide a very considerable sum of money to the revenue. They called for the complete stoppage of that particular business, which meant a tremendous drop in the revenue of the country at a time when, because of the War, it was most essential to raise money by loans. I ask now: How is it that on such an important question we do not have the business men of the country entering into the arena, pressing this particular question, and urging for the complete cessation of this wastage? Reference was made to the question of alcoholic consumption by the hon. Member for Islington West (Mr. Montague), but it does not affect the point. From the Labour standpoint, the money spent on alcoholic liquor is a great loss to the poor. This question baffles every political party in this House.

In dealing with the Tea Duty the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. J. Hudson) undoubtedly presented his case splendidly, and I congratulate him. He stressed the point that the great body of working people in this country consume tea as a food, though not to such an extent as formerly, because they do not use tea at dinner as well as at tea-time; but to a very large extent it is true that the working class use tea as a food, and you are therefore making a tremendous demand upon them in the way of taxation. If there be a desire on the part of the Government to meet the needs of the people, it is not sufficient for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make comparisons between this and other countries.

We are proportionately better off in other respects than any other country, but, if you take that phase of the question which has been introduced into this Debate, you will find that the working people even now are not consuming so much of the particular liquor we are talking about. Why? Because of the prevailing industrial conditions. When industrial conditions are down, down goes your revenue—on this particular kind of beverage. There is all the more reason, therefore, why the Government should wipe out the taxation on such a commodity as tea. My contention goes beyond the proposal of the right hon. Member for Colne Valley to abolish the duty on tea and other taxes on what is called the breakfast table. I contend that every method of indirect taxation should be abolished. It does not matter from the taxation point of view whether it is considered a legitimate commodity or not, but why should people be taxed on the strength of their consumption? Why not put a tax solely, wholly and directly upon what is the particular revenue or income of an individual? By doing that, we should be getting back to the old-time basis of our taxation, every departure from which is a gross injustice to the body of the people.

Mr. R. MORRISON: I only rise to make an endeavour to bring the Committee back to the question under discussion. I think it is very unfortunate that this discussion should have been side-tracked so largely into something else. My objections to the duty upon tea are these. At the present time, there is no duty on the Statute Book which is more indefensible than this duty upon tea. The Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out that in all the industrial troubles we had last year, the people's consumption of tea did not decrease. That, he said, was one of the reasons which led him to think that the working-classes of this country had not suffered so much as some people said. Now, paradoxical as it may seem, when hard times come, the consumption of tea is bound to go up for the simple reason, as was seen in the first week of what is called the general strike, that the working-class people have tea and bread instead of their ordinary dinner. That is to say, the working-class households used tea at the mid-day meal as well as in the morning and evening. This duty is a tax upon a necessary of life, because tea is not a luxury.

One of the objections which we have to this duty is that it is not a case where the strongest back bears the biggest burden. The poorer people are, the more does tea enter into their diet. Compare this duty with the Income Tax. Certain abatements are given to a man who pays Income Tax if he has a family. With the Tea Duty it is just the opposite. The larger a man's family, the more duty he pays. Every working-class woman in this country would look upon it as a great boon if this duty were removed. The women of this country are now taking an increasing interest in politics. That is becoming increasingly evident, and there is no question in which they take a keener interest than in the taxation of the necessities of life. Tea has become a necessary of life.

I do not suppose the Government will accept this Amendment, or that the duty will be abolished, but future Governments will find that they cannot shuffle off this thing and say that it is a hardy annual and that nobody expects anything original to be said about it. To-day, I suppose, the same arguments will be used, and the same division will be taken for party purposes, and nothing will be done. The women of this country—and especially the working women—are, I repeat, taking much more earnest interest in politics and regarding it less as a game. They will not put up with this taxation much longer. Many thousands of women in this country are beginning to realise that since the present Chancellor of the Exchequer took up office, not a penny has come off the taxation of the working-class people. On the contrary, it has been increased. There is not only a duty upon tea, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now put a duty on the teapot as well. I hope the time will come when questions such as this will not be treated as this Amendment has been treated this afternoon, and that something will be done instead of having the same arguments and the same division as we are getting to-day.

Mr. J. JONES: I want to subscribe to and support the theory advanced by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Scrymgeour). He said taxation should be based upon the ability to pay. Therefore, I hope he will get the necessary relief from some future Chancellor of the Exchequer, because if there be any class of people in the community who are taxed up to the eyebrows it is those who indulge in alcoholic liquor. It may or may not be good for them to indulge in this liquor.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: It would unduly prolong the Debate if I allowed a discussion on the taxation of alcoholic liquor.

Mr. JONES: Well, we sometimes mix liquor with tea, so that there is a connection between the two. If one drinks alcoholic liquor, there is no one to defend him. I am speaking as one who drinks a glass of beer. Taxation ought to be based on the ability of a person to pay. The question of how people spend their money is another matter altogether. That is why I object to this discussion of the difference between tea and liquor drinking. The opinion about those of us who drink a glass of beer is that we are very wicked people. We are not. We are just as good and just as clean as those who do not. We never make any money out of drink; we spend money on it. It is a bit too thick to hear people who have made fortunes out of beer lecturing to us about the evils of drink, and the money spent on it. I am in favour of the abolition of all duties on people's food, and I am willing to run the risk of telling my constituents, "Let the Beer Duty continue, but let us have a free breakfast table." We have heard a good deal this afternoon about the general strike. The general strike seems to be like King Charles' head to the people on the other side of the House, for when they want an excuse for their political rascality, they bring it in. I cannot talk about beer any more without infringing the Rules, but it is a subject that could be talked about a lot. The more you get of it, the more you are able to talk. So far as this particular duty is concerned, the Tea Duty, it is the most indefensible tax of all. It strikes at the very poorest of the poor, because the average poor man cannot afford to buy more than one pound of tea per month. Therefore, we are all agreed on these benches that this duty should be removed. Whatever we may say about beer, we are united about tea.

[Mr. Jones.]

Question put, "That the word 'fourpence' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 221; Noes, 121.

Division No. 214.]

AYES.

[5.0 p.m.]

Adland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel	Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)	Holt, Capt. H. P.
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.	Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)	Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Ainsworth, Major Charles	Dalkeith, Earl of	Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
Albery, Irving James	Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)	Hopkins, J. W. W.
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)	Davies, Sir Thomas (Gloucester)	Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.	Davies, Dr. Vernon	Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)
Apsley, Lord	Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)	Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.	Dean, Arthur Wellesley	Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Astor, Viscountess	Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. H.	Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whiteh'n)
Bainiel, Lord	Drewe, C.	Huntingfield, Lord
Barclay-Harvey C. M.	Eden, Captain Anthony	Hurd, Percy A.
Barnston, Major Sir Harry	Edmondson, Major A. J.	Hurst, Gerald B.
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)	Ellis, R. G.	Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
Bellairs, Commander Carlyon W.	Elveden, Viscount	Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)	Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)	Jacob, A. E.
Bennett, A. J.	Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)	James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
Berry, Sir George	Everard, W. Lindsay	Jephcott, A. R.
Blundell, F. N.	Falle, Sir Bertram G.	Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
Boothby, R. J. G.	Fermoy, Lord	King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft	Flelden, E. B.	Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.	Ford, Sir P. J.	Knox, Sir Alfred
Braithwaite, Major A. N.	Forestier-Walker, Sir L.	Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
Brass, Captain W.	Foster, Sir Harry S.	Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
Brassey, Sir Leonard	Foxcroft, Captain C. T.	Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
Brittain, Sir Harry	Fraser, Captain Ian	Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.	Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.	Looker, Herbert William
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.	Ganzoni, Sir John	Long, Major Eric
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H.C. (Berks, Newb'y)	Gates, Percy	Lowe, Sir Francis William
Buchan, John	Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham	Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Buckingham, Sir H.	Gilmour, Colonel Rt. Hon. Sir John	Lumley, L. R.
Bullock, Captain M.	Glyn, Major R. G. C.	Lynn, Sir R. J.
Burman, J. B.	Grace, John	Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
Butler, Sir Geoffrey	Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.	Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward	Greene, W. P. Crawford	McLean, Major A.
Calne, Gordon Hall	Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)	Macmillan, Captain H.
Campbell, E. T.	Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John	Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)	Grotrian, H. Brent	McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Preston, S.)	Gunston, Captain D. W.	Malone, Major P. B.
Cazalet, Captain Victor A.	Hacking, Captain Douglas H.	Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
Cecil, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)	Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)	Margesson, Captain D.
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton	Hammersley, S. S.	Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
Chapman, Sir S.	Harrison, G. J. C.	Meyer, Sir Frank
Christie, J. A.	Hartington, Marquess of	Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer	Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)	Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.	Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)	Monson, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Cobb, Sir Cyril	Haslam, Henry C.	Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.	Hawke, John Anthony	Moreing, Captain A. H.
Cockrell, Brig.-General Sir George	Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.	Murchison, Sir Kenneth
Colfox, Major Wm. Philip	Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.	Nelson, Sir Frank
Conway, Sir W. Martin	Hills, Major John Waller	Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
Cooper, A. Duff	Hilton, Cecil	Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W.G. (Preston)
Cope, Major William	Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.	Oman, Sir Charles William C.
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.	Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)	Penny, Frederick George
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)	Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy	Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)

Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Ramsden, F.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs, Stretford)
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Skelton, A. N.
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)

Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, S.)
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.

Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, Sir S. Hill- (High Peak)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Sir George Hennessey and Captain Viscount Curzon.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Duckworth, John
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Walsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York., W.R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)

Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kenworthy, Lt.-Com. Hon. Joseph M.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
 March, S.
 Montague, Frederick
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Purcell, A. A.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.

Roberts, Rt. Hon. F.O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Calthness)
 Smillie, Robert
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Keighley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spencer, G. A. (Broxtove)
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 224;
 Noes, 120.

Division No. 215.]

AYES.

[5.8 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Ainsworth, Major Charles
 Albery, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Apsley, Lord
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Willfrid W.
 Astor, Viscountess
 Bainton, Lord

Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Blundell, F. N.
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.

Brass, Captain W.
 Brassey, Sir Leonard
 Brittain, Sir Harry
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. J.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newbury)
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.

Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward Cairns, Gordon Hall
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prismth, S.,
 Cazale, Captain Victor A.
 Cecil, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
 Colfox, Major Wm. Philip
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
 Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbrö)
 Curzon, Captain Viscount
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s-M.)
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Foster, Sir Harry S.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Grace, John
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
 Grotrian, H. Brent
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of

Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major J. R. G.
 Hills, Major John Walter
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
 Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)
 Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.
 Howard-Eury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberland, Whiteh'n)
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hurd, Percy A.
 Hurst, Gerald B.
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaughten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (Pitrs'ld.)
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Preston, William
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs. Stretford)
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Skelton, A. N.
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Col. J. (Stoke-upon-Trent)
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Deven, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl.
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Wood, Sir S. Hill. (High Peak)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Cope and Mr. Penny.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.

Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Duckworth John
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwelty)
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)

Fenby, T. D.
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.

Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kenworthy, Lt.-Com. Hon. Joseph M.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
 March, S.

Montague, Frederick
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Purcell, A. A.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Caithness)
 Smillie, Robert
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penlstone)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spencer, G. A. (Broxtove)

Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rbllox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtie, Ernest
 Townsend, A. E.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Whiteley and Mr. Hayes.

CLAUSE 2.—(Additional medicine duties.)

Sir ROBERT HAMILTON: I beg to move, in page 2, to leave out from the word "charged," in line 11, to the end of the Clause, and to insert instead thereof the words, "until the first day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight."

We had a short discussion on this duty during the Budget Resolutions, and it was brought to our notice that the duty which is now existing was doubled in 1915, as a purely war measure. It is now proposed that that should be the duty for all time, and that it should not be brought up for annual review, as we think it should be. We have to remember that this is a duty on medicines, and that is a very important fact. You may call them patent medicines, you may call them quack medicines, but they are medicines which the people of this country buy and use in very large quantities indeed, and it is mostly the poor who buy them. It is a duty with a very long history, with which I do not intend to weary the Committee now, but before the War it was a comparatively small duty. It was, as I say, doubled in 1915, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that £1,340,000 is the exact estimate of the sum that it is to bring in for the coming year. That is a very considerable sum, and we know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has got into difficulties with his Budget, owing to a variety of causes, would find the loss of £1,340,000 at the present time very considerable, and one which would have to be replaced from some other quarter.

Our Amendment, therefore, proposes that this duty should come up for review again next year and should not be made permanent. Hitherto, it has come up for review from time to time, but when the Financial Secretary to the Treasury was asked, in the course of the Budget Resolutions Debate the other day, why it was now going to be made permanent, he said that it was vexatious that the duty should be carried on from year to year without people knowing whether or not it was going to be made permanent. I should like to ask why we should make this duty, which was doubled for war purposes, permanent. Why should we tuck it away in a corner, not to come up for annual review, when we bear in mind, as we ought to bear in mind, whatever views individuals may have about the use of quack medicines, that millions of our poor countrymen use them, and use them with advantage? I do not suppose there is an hon. Member of this Committee who does not use, or has not used, or will not use, at some time in his life, one of these patent or quack medicines, whether as a lotion, an ointment, or a pill.

The whole world uses them, and, of course, that is a reason that was put forward from the Treasury Bench for taxing them. They bring in a very good revenue, but that was a most extraordinary argument used by the Financial Secretary the other day, when he said that during the last three years the duty had gone up by nearly four times and that, therefore, it was a legitimate source of revenue. What an extraordinary argument, that because a thing that everybody uses, and most people want, will stand a high tax, therefore it is a legitimate source of revenue. That could be an argument for taxing bread or meat. It is perfectly true that these patent medicines have stood this extra duty and have brought in a large sum, but how? By the extra cost to the consumers. We have all had to pay more for our medicines. I want to impress upon the Committee all the time that no civilised country to-day is without these medicines. They may be good or bad medicines; they may cure by faith or by some obscure element in them which is secret, but, for all that, they are medicines which we are taxing, and I think I can confidently ask the Committee to support this Amendment, which will prevent this tax being kept on for all time and ensure that it will be brought up for review later on.

[Sir R. Hamilton.]

In the discussion the other day, I could not understand whether or not the Financial Secretary meant that the tax should be raised so as to deter the use of these medicines. He spoke of them as being quack medicines, and I think he said it had always been regarded as a tax on quack medicines. Of course, you can deter people from using them by putting the tax so high as to put it beyond the power of the poor to use them, but I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman intends to do that. What is the principle on which these medicines are taxed? Is it in order to deter people from using them, is it in order to bring in revenue, or is it in some way to help the legitimate kind of doctor? It has always seemed to me rather a curious tax, and, therefore, I confidently commend my Amendment to the consideration of the Committee.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): I am afraid that, notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton) has said, I must beg leave to repeat the argument which he thinks was absurd. I have always understood that it was more or less an axiom of taxation that, when you find that a tax is not in any way decreasing the consumption, but that, on the contrary, in spite of the tax, there is a large and increasing consumption, it was usually taken as a proof that there is nothing oppressive in the tax. The hon. Gentleman has used an argument which is always applicable to indirect taxation of any kind. He says that the tax is derived from the consumer, and, of course, it is. This tax really is not one that falls in any true and wide sense upon medicine as understood at the present day, because there is an exemption, as the hon. Member knows. Any medicine which comes under the heading of a regular medicine recommended by a doctor escapes the tax. I quite admit, as I have admitted before, that this is a very old duty, and that it is an anomalous duty in many respects. It comes down from the eighteenth century, and I quite agree that, if we were devising de novo an ideal fiscal system, it is very likely that this particular duty would not find a place in it, but, as a matter of fact, it has been, and is, regarded by the public and the traders concerned as entirely unobjectionable, and the only question which is raised in this Amendment is whether the additional duty put on during the War is or is not to be upon a permanent basis.

The hon. Gentleman said that, whether it is good or bad, it ought not to be tucked away and put on a permanent basis, but the original tax is on a permanent basis. The only question which has to be debated each year is whether this additional amount put on during the War is or is not to continue. I repeat that as, to all intents and purposes, it is, and is likely to remain, on a permanent basis, it really becomes an absurdity that half the duty should be placed upon an annual basis and the other half upon a permanent basis. As I have said previously, I think that is vexatious. We cannot, so far as the present year is concerned, do without the revenue, and, in fact, the hon. Gentleman does not propose that we should. All that he proposes is that we should debate the duty again next year. Of course, if the hon. Gentleman or anyone else thinks next year that the time has come for it to disappear, it is quite easy for him to bring it up in the discussion on the Finance Bill next year.

Sir R. HAMILTON indicated dissent.

Mr. McNEILL: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he is wrong. All that he has to do is to put down a new Clause next year, and then it can be discussed in exactly the same way as if it came up annually. The only difference is that unless some hon. Member positively wants to raise the discussion in that way, it will not have to be put down as a matter of course, and a Clause passed in order to perpetuate or to continue for another year one half of a duty the other half of which is permanent. Therefore, I must ask the Committee to reject the Amendment.

Mr. HARRIS: I was rather surprised at the line which the right hon. Gentleman has taken. He admits right away that he would not defend this tax as the kind of tax that he would impose if he were arranging for his ideal Budget. What we want is that this tax should not be hidden away from the public gaze. It is a very dangerous thing if taxes are imposed that the public are not conscious of paying. With a little tax of this kind, people come in and buy medicines, and they are not conscious that they are, at the same time, paying a contribution towards the revenue. That is thoroughly unsound. It is the kind of taxation which stimulates and encourages extravagance. But there is another reason, which is more important, why we should review this tax next year and not make it permanent. This is a War tax, and it is a very remarkable thing that practically all the new taxes imposed during the War as temporary measures to meet an emergency have been retained by the Government. Reference has been made to the McKenna Duties. Having sneaked them through in War time, they have taken advantage of them and kept them permanently on the Statute Book, and here is another irritating tax, imposed in an emergency, to meet a national crisis, to bring in revenue for War purposes, which is now to be kept on permanently by the Government.

The Government have been so extravagant and wasteful and incompetent that they have had to scratch for money wherever they could get it, from any corner, in order to make their Budget balance. The right hon. Gentleman says that next year we can put down a new Clause, but he knows very well that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would probably tell the House that he had made his arrangements for the financial year, that he had to balance his Budget, and that, if we knocked off half-a-million or whatever the additional duty might be, his Budget would be spoiled and he would not save his balance. That is a very plausible excuse. We want to tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that next year he must reconsider the whole position. There is a feeling in the House that this is an irritating, a foolish, an out-of-date, and an unwise tax, and, I believe, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury thinks that it is an irritating, a foolish, an out-of-date, and an unwise tax. It is only because the country is so hard-up that we have to raise revenue in this particular way.

When we considered this matter on the Budget Resolutions, the right hon. Gentleman told me that he had a Departmental Committee who solemnly sat and considered these duties, whether they were intelligible and whether their form should be altered. He told us that after they had sat for some considerable time they came to the conclusion they could not exclude the words of the Act of 1812. I looked up the Act. I do think that Members of this Committee have a responsibility to their constituents to look up the Act of Parliament under which the revenue of the country is raised. This Act of 1812 is a very interesting historical document, but, really, seriously to suggest that it provides words suitable for raising revenue is stretching the imagination a good deal. I have no doubt that the Committee was composed of members with a strong historical sense and who liked old-fashioned phraseology, and that they were not very anxious to do lawyers out of a job by making matters clear. The people who framed that Act were, to do them justice, very anxious to make the people understand what articles were to be taxed. Here are four pages of patent medicines advertised as taxable, and I venture to say that not one in 10 of them can be bought in any chemist's or grocer's shop in this country. Here they are:

"Adams's Solvent, Addison's Re-animating European Balsam, Aetherial Anodyne Spirit," and so on, column after column, ending with "Zimmerman's Stimulating Fluid."

[Mr. Harris.]

I would not mind offering a prize to any Member of this Committee who can buy any of these articles that the Committee of 1812 put on the list in order that the public should know whether a particular article was taxable or not. Are we sure that Beecham's pills and Enos fruit salts are rightly being taxed under the Act of 1812? It is true that at the very end of the Act, stowed away in the last Section, are some special exemptions—all drugs named or contained in the Book of Rates subscribed with the name of Sir Harbottle Grimstone. I believe the hon. Baronet was a distinguished member of this House. I am not quite clear on this point, but I have no doubt that some of my medical friends will be able to tell me that this particular book is recognised as an authority on medicines. Anyhow, his medicines are excluded from taxation. Then there is a great number of additional articles, under which, I understand, the right hon. Gentleman takes refuge. It is the Section at the end of the long list of articles on the four pages referred to. It reads as follows:

"And also all other pills, powders, lozenges, tinctures, potions, cordials, electuaries and so on"—

I do not want to weary the Committee by mentioning all of them—[HON. MEMBERS: "Go on!"]—

"made, prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale by any person or persons whatsoever, wherein the person making, preparing, uttering, vending, or exposing for sale the same, hath or claims to have any occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same."

I very much doubt whether it is legal to advertise under our present law that an article is made under an occult secret. I would suggest to the Committee that it is impossible to use that kind of wording to justify the raising of additional taxes in 1927. It is a very doubtful direction to this House. It goes on to say:

"Or hath or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are or shall hereafter be prepared, uttered, vended or exposed to sale under the authority of any Letters Patent under the Great Seal."

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Captain FitzRoy): This is not a question which is before the Committee.

Mr. HARRIS: What I am showing is, that before we make this tax permanent, the Committee should be quite clear that the words governing the tax are on sound principles and intelligible to the public. I most respectfully submit that these words are out of date. I pressed last year, and also on the Budget Resolutions, for new words to be provided. This the Financial Secretary admitted, but, apparently, his Committee came to the conclusion that these words are clear. Having read them to the Committee—and after all we are the chosen of the country, and we are the most intelligent members of the public—I doubt whether the words are clear even to the majority of this Committee. At any rate, they are very complicated and involved. There is only one more sentence with which I should like to trouble the House. First, they must either be as the result of occult secret or art or produced under Letters Patent,

"or which have at any time heretofore been, now are or shall hereafter be by any public notice or advertisement, or by any written or printed papers or hand bills, or by any label or words written or printed, affixed to, or delivered with any packet, box, bottle, phial or other inclosure containing the same, held out or recommended to the public."

I submit that to make a tax of this kind permanent under words of this kind is not only an insult to the Committee, but is treating taxation in a light and frivolous manner. My remarks have caused a certain amount of amusement, but, after all, this is not the way to raise revenue in this country at a time like this. I would suggest to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury that if we are to have this tax, he should give an undertaking next year to reconsider the whole matter, that the words governing the imposition of the tax should be redrafted, and that another Clause should be put in the Finance Bill of next year. I do not suggest that it should be done this year. We do not want to be unreasonable. We are prepared to wait until 1928 with patience. But I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is justified in asking this Committee to impose this tax under an Act passed in 1812, the words of which are out of date and hardly intelligible to the general public.

Commander WILLIAMS: I do not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman into the realms of occult science or in regard to the wording of an Act of Parliament of 1812. I have no doubt that past history rather than looking forward to the future may be of more interest to his party than it is, possibly, to my party. [Interruption.] At any rate, our future is not concerned with occult science. Our future is absolutely assured for many years in this House. I have no doubt Gentlemen on the other side of the Committee dwell on these old Measures because they are more cheerful. I want to say one or two words about this Clause, which is of very great interest from many points of view. Personally, I am not interested in medicines of any kind. I am not at all sure whether there are not almost as many people in this country, if not more, injured through drinking medicines as there are through drinking other beverages.

The DEPUTY - CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is whether the tax should be permanent or temporary, and has nothing to do with the quality of the medicines.

Commander WILLIAMS: I want to be clear whether, in making this permanent, as we are to-day, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is doing something which many of us believe may possibly be a handicap in the future to a particular line of thought and argument. I believe that this putting of Excise Duties on to a great number of articles manufactured in England, is, on the whole, one to be deprecated. I would like to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury if, in discussing the Budget for another year, he will see whether it is not possible to put rather more duty on foreign articles coming in to compete with us, and rather less Excise Duty on British-made medicine, which is of a much higher quality and much more useful. Apparently, all parties except the Liberal party are agreed that this duty shall be made permanent. I conclude that the Socialist party are in agreement with the proposal, because they do not appear to be very interested in the subject. I would ask the Financial Secretary that one simple question, whether, in going into the matter another year, it will not be possible to lower the existing duty on British medicines and tighten up the duty on foreign medicines, and whether, before we pass this Clause, he will give the Committee a definite assurance that by passing this Clause it will not be more difficult to get that preference in the near future?

Sir HILTON YOUNG: There is, I think, a principle involved in this Amendment, and as it is raised by a series of Amendments from the benches opposite, it may be worth while a single brief reference. The proposal is, that this duty should be re-debated annually. Is it not worth while reminding ourselves that the general structure of our financial organisation is that taxes and duties are permanent enactments, and that two only are reserved for annual reconsideration in order to give the House of Commons the opportunity, in short, of imposing its will upon the Executive? Those two which are reserved for annual re-enactment are one great direct tax, the Income Tax, and one great indirect tax, the Tea Duty. It is very important in the interest of the trader that he should not be cast into annual doubt as to the basis upon which he is to make his prices during the coming year. It is in the interests of this House—it is surely common sense—that it should not be called upon to re-debate annually more subjects than it need debate. It tends to overwhelm the proceedings of this House with, at any rate, opportunities for discussions which are apt to lead us aside and possibly into discussions which are not, perhaps, vital to the business of the nation.

Finally, one word on the need of the principle which underlies this duty and which, I think, is so strong that it has strength enough to establish the duty as a permanent duty. One is not, perhaps, in favour of small fancy taxes. With regard to this particular tax, no doubt very large profits are made by vendors of patent medicines, and very largely from the credulity and ignorance of their fellow countrymen. Either the patent medicine, as sold, is worth nothing or contains nothing which is not in the ordinary pharmacopoea. In that case, the unfortunate purchaser has paid 10 times the amount the article is worth and it is quite just that the vendor should make some contribution to the revenue. In those cases where there is some special knowledge or secret of manufacture contained in the articles sold it is surely in the public interest that the secret knowledge should be at the disposal of the whole medical profession, and if it is not put at the disposal of the whole medical profession then it is right that the vendor should pay for this retention of useful knowledge from the public generally.

[Sir H. Young.]

Mr. E. BROWN: I am surprised that the hon. and gallant Member for Torquay (Commander Williams) should take the question of patent medicines lightly. There was an old-fashioned vendor of patent medicines in the West Country who used to sing this song:

“There be fifty cures for every ill,
And each one be the best;
You can drink them down, or rub them in,
Or lay them on your chest.”

Up to recent times, in the hon. and gallant Member's own constituency, there has been a vendor of a particular herb medicine which would be taxed under this provision. It has brought relief to some of the hon. and gallant Member's constituents when the medical profession have been unable to do so. He, therefore, should be careful what he says about patent medicines in this House. We always receive with respect what the right hon. Member for Norwich (Sir Hilton Young) has to say on the general structure of the financial system of this country, but when he stresses the interests of the traders in this matter, I must point out that there are also the interests of the consumers to be considered. The Committee will no doubt agree that if there is one set of duties which should come under annual review it is the series of duties imposed in time of war purely for war purposes. That is why we move this Amendment. A great deal of money is involved. These duties before the War brought in £360,000; according to the last return, that is the year before last, they brought in £1,290,000, and the amount is now about £1,344,000. We consider that our argument is quite sound and, although it is to the interests of the traders not to have great upsets each year, it is to the interests of the consumers to see that before a permanent basis of taxation is reached every single one of these irritating duties, most of which are indirect duties and come out of the purchasing power of the people, is brought under annual review. The Match Tax, which was imposed purely for war purposes, was never discussed from 1915 until this year. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Norwich on the general point, but, in regard to these war duties, I think we are on firm ground in asking that before a permanent basis is reached they shall be brought under annual review, and shall not be missed in the discussions which are occasioned by the new Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided: Ayes, 249; Noes, 125.

Division No. 216.]

AYES.

[5.50 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Ainsworth, Major Charles
Albery, Irving James
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astor, Viscountess
Balfour, Lord
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Bettarton, Henry B.
Blundell, F. N.
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Bralthwaite, Major A. N.
Brass, Captain W.

Brassey, Sir Leonard
Brittain, Sir Harry
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Caine, Gordon Hall
Campbell, E. T.
Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbert R. (Preston, 3.)
Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
Ceell, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chapman, Sir S.
Chilcott, Sir Warden
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer

Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Cooper, A. Duff
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Curzon, Captain Viscount
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
Davies, Sir Thomas (Clarence)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Drewe, C.
Eden, Captain Anthony
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount

Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Foster, Sir Harry S.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Goff, Sir Park
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E)
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
 Grotrian, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
 Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)
 Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whiteh'n)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hurst, Gerald B.

Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'n & P'bl's)
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Kidd, J. (Lnlithgow)
 Kindersley, Major Guy M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lowe, Sir Francis William
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir Robert J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marlott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (P'ts'ld.)
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, Sir Basil E. (Devon, Barnstaple)
 Pownall, Sir Asheton
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick

Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs, Stretford)
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast.)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C. Y.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Stuart, Crighton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterlon, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Wood, Sir S. Hill- (High Peak)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Sir George Hennessy and Major Cope.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.

Dalton, Hugh
 Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Duckworth, John
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.

Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydfil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harney, E. A.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhonda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)

Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kirkwood, D.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
March, S.
Montague, Frederick
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Mosley, Oswald
Murnin, H.
Naylor, T. E.
Pain, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)

Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
Rose, Frank H.
Runciman, Rt. Hon. Walter
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Calthness)
Smilie, Robert
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
Snell, Harry
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
Spencer, G. A. (Broxtowe)
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, J. (St. Rolfox)
Strauss, E. A.
Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)

Thurtle, Ernest
Townend, A. E.
Viant, S. P.
Wallhead, Richard C.
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
Wellock, Wilfred
Welsh, J. C.
Whitelev, W.
Wiggins, William Martin
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Wright, W.
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Sir Robert Hutchison and Mr. Fenby.

Motion made, and Question put, The Committee divided: Ayes, 258,
“That the Clause stand part of the Noes, 123.
Bill.”

Division No. 217.]

AYES.

[5.59 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Ainsworth, Major Charles
Albery, Irving James
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Asbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Bainiel, Lord
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterson, Henry B.
Blundell, F. N.
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
Braithwaite, Major A. N.
Brass, Captain W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Brittain, Sir Harry
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Caine, Gordon Hall
Campbell, E. T.
Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbert R. (Preston, S.)
Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
Ceill, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chapman, Sir S.
Chilcott, Sir Warden
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer

Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Cooper, A. Duff
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Cooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Curzon, Captain Viscount
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
Davies, Sir Thomas (Gloucester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. H.
Drewe, C.
Eden, Captain Anthony
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s-M.)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Fairfax, Captain J. G.
Falls, Sir Bertram G.
Fermoy, Lord
Fielden, E. B.
Finburgh, S.
Ford, Sir P. J.
Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
Foster, Sir Harry S.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
Gadls, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
Ganzoni, Sir John
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Goff, Sir Park
Gower, Sir Robert
Grace, John
Grattan-Doyse, Sir N.
Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E.)
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
Grotrian, H. Brent
Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Hartington, Marquess of
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
Haslam, Henry C.
Hawke, John Anthony
Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
Henn, Sir Sydney H.
Hennessy, Major J. R. G.
Hills, Major John Waller
Hilton, Cecil
Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy
Holt, Captain H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)
Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
Hudson, R. S. (Cumberland, White'n)
Hume, Sir G. H.
Huntingfield, Lord
Hurd, Percy A.
Hurst, Gerald B.
Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'n & P'bl's)
Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
Jacob, A. E.
James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
Jephcott, A. R.
Kidd, J. (Linthgow)
Kindersley, Major G. M.
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
Knox, Sir Alfred
Lamb, J. Q.
Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
Long, Major Eric

Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lowe, Sir Francis William
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (Pitshill)
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, Sir Basil E. (Devon, Barnstaple)
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.

Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs., Stretford)
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savory, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Smith, R. W. (Aberdeen & Kincardine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.

Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinné, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Wood, Sir S. Hill (High Peak)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Cope and Captain Margesson.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Duckworth, John
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)

Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merloneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
 March, S.
 Montague, Frederick
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Pailin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Runciman, Rt. Hon. Walter
 Scrymgeour, E.

Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Caithness)
 Slessor, Sir Henry H.
 Smillie, Robert
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spencer, G. A. (Broxtowe)
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
 Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Whiteley, W.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Sir Robert Hutchison and Mr. Fenby.

CLAUSE 3. — (Exemption of motor tyres from Customs duty to cease.)

Mr. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 16, to leave out the words "motor bicycles and motor tricycles."

The name of McKenna has been so much taken in vain by various Chancellors of the Exchequer, and his War taxes have been pleaded as a justification for so many bad taxes, that it is interesting to note the provisions of this Clause. Even Mr. McKenna, hard up as he was for revenue, and ingenious as he was in finding the necessary money to carry on the War, came to the conclusion, after taking careful advice, that it would not be either wise or satisfactory to tax motor tyres. At this stage of these proceedings I am only going to refer to one side of the question. The principle underlying the general taxation of motor tyres can be considered subsequently on the main Question of the Clause standing part, but I am going now to ask the Committee, whatever it may decide on the larger question of policy, to exclude taxes on tyres of motor bicycles and tricycles. When we consider this as a question of policy I think there is an unanswerable case. It may be argued that our importation of motor bicycles and tricycles is comparatively small compared with our production and export of those articles. No doubt, thanks largely to the import of untaxed materials, we have been able to do the main motor-bicycle trade of the world. The English motor bicycle and the English motor car stand supreme, not only in our own Dominions but throughout the world, for price, wearing qualities and efficiency.

We depend largely on our export trade, although at present, in spite of the duty on the completed article, we are still importing a considerable number—some thousands each year. The Committee, by this Clause, is being asked to impose a tax on an important accessory of the motor bicycle, and, in fact, on a component part. Does it not seem a little unwise and short-sighted, in view of the immense export trade which we are doing, to throw out this challenge to foreign countries with which we are doing a large business? Does it seem a sane policy, even to those who believe in protection? There is also the point of view of the users of the motor bicycle. In many parts of the country, especially in the Midlands, the motor bicycle has become essential to the ordinary working man. In certain towns you will see hundreds of motor bicycles carrying men to and from their work. The motor car is outside the reach of these men in price. In America the Ford car very largely does this work, but in England, partly because of the character of our roads and partly because of the adventurous spirit of our people the noisy bumping of the motor bicycle is preferred. Further, a man, who would never dream of owning a motor car, is able to keep a motor bicycle because it is easily stored, while the initial outlay is lighter and the tax smaller than in the case of a motor car. It may be said that the tyre is a very small part of the bicycle, but I would remind the Committee that in taxing the tyre they are coming very near to another road tax. The tyre tax is very near the old wheel tax, and the wheel tax nearly brought down at least one Government owing to the great outcry against it. This blessed Conservative and reactionary Government by taxing tyres is ingeniously restoring the principle of the wheel tax and, perhaps, a window tax will be the next experiment if we live long enough under the reckless extravagance of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The principle in this Clause seems to me to be unsound. I am not in a position to state the percentage of imports of tyres coming under the categories of motor bicycles and motor tricycles, but I think there is a very strong case for exempting this very essential part of a popular means of conveyance. The housing problem is a burning question with social reformers, and one of the difficulties experienced in London and elsewhere has been that of carrying people from the centres of population to the new garden suburbs which are coming into existence. In London the motor bicycle has not solved the problem but in provincial towns, where the difficulty of access is not so serious, the motor bicycle has been of tremendous assistance and has enabled men to live six or 10 or 20 miles away from their work. There is an overwhelming case against the inclusion of motor bicycles in this Clause.

I am glad to see in his place my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bournemouth (Brigadier-General Sir Henry Croft). I admire his frankness, sincerity and courage. There is no mincing of words and no quibbling on his part. He does not profess to be at heart a Free Trader, or to be against the imposition of taxes. He is, frankly and honestly, a Protectionist. Not only does he believe Protection is a good thing, but he has the courage of his principles. That is the type of opponent I respect, and his attitude helps the cause far better than does the attitude of Members on the Treasury bench, who assure us they are really Free Traders, not in favour of tariffs, but only going in for safeguarding, or, in the case of some duties, supporting them not in order to safeguard industry but merely for the sake of obtaining revenue. As I understand it, the Financial Secretary will justify this tax not because it is protective but because the country is hard up, and other sources than films and matches must be found in order to provide money. I have no doubt that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bournemouth will say that already a new factory is going to be put up in this country by a French firm which is fighting the great tyre trust, the Dunlop Company. I am informed, however, that arrangements were made to erect that factory before ever this tax was thought of.

Brigadier-General Sir HENRY CROFT: May I correct the hon. Member, as he referred specially to me? May I tell him that his information is out of date, because I think two other factories are coming to this country?

Mr. HARRIS: That is quite possible, but our experience is that so soon as a tariff is put on, and Protection is thus provided, these big concerns come together and either fix up a selling agreement or form a trust. Tariffs are the friends of trusts. The tyre companies in this country have always had against them the healthy breeze of foreign competition, and they have not been able to establish any combines or to bring all the various companies into line; but experience in America and in other parts of the world proves that so soon as a tariff wall is put up arrangements are made whereby if the price of the article is not raised, at any rate it is stabilised; which is very similar to raising prices, because otherwise prices would tend to fall as production improves. As soon as this tariff wall is properly fixed and entrenched these big manufacturing companies, powerful, wealthy companies, will come to an arrangement and a combine or trust will be formed; and to avoid that I think it is essential that we should have the advantage of imports to protect the consumer and prevent the trusts from withholding the advantage of low prices from the public. I think I have made a very strong case, and I hope the Financial Secretary will listen to the light of reason, and at any rate exclude tyres for motor bicycles, which are so essential for the convenience of the working class.

Mr. LEES-SMITH: I rise merely to ask whether the Financial Secretary to the Treasury proposes to make any reply.

Mr. McNEILL: I certainly propose to make a reply if a case is made out on the other side of the Committee.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Surely the Financial Secretary is not going to dispose of a question of this importance by a sneer at the case which has been put up from these benches? I feel quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman will never be lacking in courtesy, and if he has been listening, as I have no doubt he has been, to what my hon. Friend has said, he will know that a case has been made out which merits some reply from the Treasury bench.

Mr. McNEILL: May I interrupt to say that is quite true, but the right hon. Gentleman has put his own name to this Amendment, and I thought courtesy required that I should allow him to strengthen the case of his hon. Friend.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The right hon. Gentleman need have no anxiety on that score. I do not propose to detain the Committee, because my hon. Friend has made out a sufficiently good case to merit a reply from the right hon. Gentleman and I hope we shall have it.

Mr. McNEILL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends to give the Committee the benefit of his views on this matter? Otherwise, I consider I am entitled to choose my own time for addressing the Committee.

Captain GARRO-JONES: I think it would be the very minimum of courtesy for the Financial Secretary to tell us for what reason it is impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment. There is a great deal to be said in favour of it, apart from the arguments which have been advanced by the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris). I consider that in the interest of the health of the nation it would be a splendid thing—[Laughter—this is no laughing matter—for those poor people who are unable to afford motor cars, but are able to afford bicycles and motor cycles, to be able to get tyres a little cheaper. In my constituency in the East End of London there are hundreds of people whose sole recreation, whose only means of getting out into the fresh air, is on a bicycle or a motor bicycle, and I know the sacrifices to which some of them submit in order to save enough money to purchase one. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman is asked whether he can see his way either to reduce or altogether remove this tax on tyres, I think we are entitled to some reply. We are not asking him to remove the tax on tyres altogether. I ask him why the Government are unable to make this reduction in the tax on cheap tyres and I hope he will let us have some reply, or we shall have to speak at considerably greater length on the subsequent Amendments on the Order Paper.

Mr. McNEILL: I do not like to dis-appoint the Committee any longer as hon. Members seem anxious that I should make a reply at the earliest possible moment instead of waiting in order to collect the various views, which are not always identical, in favour of the Amendment, a course which I thought would be more convenient. I do not propose to take up the time of the Committee by rising repeatedly to make a reply to everybody who chooses to address it. I have sometimes heard complaints that an individual reply is not given on every occasion, but I was proposing to wait until a number of Members had addressed the Committee before attempting to give a reply on behalf of the Government. As it is, I have to be content with the speeches of the two hon. Members and it is quite true that the hon. and gallant Member for South Hackney (Captain Garro-Jones) did strengthen the case which had been made by the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris).

The hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green supported this Amendment on a number of different grounds. First of all, there was the orthodox Free Trade argument. That did not surprise me at all. He saw that this particular Clause is some infringement of that doctrine, and naturally he did not lose the opportunity of pointing it out. His second point was that as compared with motor cars the motor-bicycle is used by the comparatively less well-to-do. Then he passed on to the point that injury might be inflicted upon our export trade if the Amendment were not accepted. To these arguments the hon. and gallant Member who followed him added the cause of national health. So now we have all these various grounds, including national health, as a reason for making this particular exception to the duty which will be imposed upon motor tyres by this Bill.

I do not think the Committee will expect me to go over all these various reasons, including national health. I admit at once that motor cycling is a delightful, a healthy and a desirable recreation, and that as many people as possible ought to go out into the country on motor cycles, and therefore I cannot be accused of being unsympathetic on that score. I also admit that the owner of the motor bicycle is, as a rule, a less wealthy person than the man who has a large motor car. I do not see, however, that either of these reasons affords any sufficient ground for making this exception to the duty. We have been talking about the duties on tea and other commodities consumed by the mass of the people. Taking a broad general view, there is no doubt that all people who are fortunate enough to own motor vehicles of any sort are, on the whole, comparatively well-to-do as compared with the large mass of the people, and I do not think there is any legitimate ground for claiming that the owner of a motor cycle is distinguished from any other user of imported tyres.

The hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green said it was to the advantage of everybody owning a motor car to have tyres imported into this country, because in that way he would be able to get them cheaper. I am not at all sure that is the case. The motor-car tyres manufactured by Dunlops have not risen in price since the announcement of this duty, and I do not believe they will. At any rate, if they do, the rise will be perfectly trifling. In addition to that, as the hon. Member himself mentions, some foreign manufacturers have set up, and are intending to set up, factories in this country, and I have no doubt that the competition which that will cause amongst manufacturers in this country will prevent any real rise in the price of tyres such as could give any legitimate cause for complaint.

Let me point out the most important reasons for not accepting this Amendment. Last year an exception in favour of commercially-used motor cars was done away with, and the main reason for that, as was explained at the time, lay in the very great administrative difficulties of distinguishing in the case of the parts and accessories of motor cars whether or not the imported article was for use on a commercial vehicle, in which case it would be exempt from duty, or for use on another sort of car, in which case it would be subject to duty. It was for that reason, mainly, that that distinction was swept away last year. If this Amendment were accepted, we should be reintroducing that difficulty in another form, and in some ways a more obnoxious form, because I am advised that it would be quite impossible for the Customs Department to say when a tyre reached our shores whether it was to come under the exemptions which this Amendment would introduce or whether it would be subject to duty.

For that reason, and for no other, I must ask the Committee to reject this Amendment. Really, I can see no reason whatever in its favour. I have already explained the reason why an exemption was made in the case of the duty on these tyres in 1915. The Committee will remember that originally tyres were not exempted from the duty imposed in 1915 upon accessories and parts, but it was by an Amendment introduced in 1915 that an exemption was made in the case of tyres for reasons with which the Committee is familiar. Those reasons have absolutely passed away now, and there is no reason why that exemption should be continued which, for special reasons, was introduced in 1915. Those reasons apply all round to all sorts of tyres whether for use in the case of motor cycles or large cars. No satisfactory reason has been adduced by the hon. Member who moved this Amendment in favour of its acceptance, nor has he made out any case for his proposal. I admit that the hon. Member has brought forward some reasons which might be considered valid against a duty on tyres all round, but he has made no case for this particular exemption. This Amendment is one which would cut into the administration of the duty, and it would mean a certain amount of loss to the revenue. For these reasons, I hope the Committee will reject the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 255; Noes, 130.

Division No. 218.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Ainsworth, Major Charles
 Alberty, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Apsley, Lord
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atkinson, C.
 Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Balmlel, Lord
 Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Betterton, Henry B.

AYES.

Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Blundell, F. N.
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.
 Brass, Captain W.
 Brasse, Sir Leonard
 Brittain, Sir Harry
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Caine, Gordon Hall
 Campbell, E. T.

[6.34 p.m.]

Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)
 Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Chilcott, Sir Warden
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, *Crewe)
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Dartford)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Curzon, Captain Viscount
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.

Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)	Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.	Rice, Sir Frederick
Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)	Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.	Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
Davies, Dr. Vernon	Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)	Salmon, Major I.
Dawson, Sir Philip	Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whiteh'n)	Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
Dean, Arthur Wellesley	Hume, Sir G. H.	Sandeman, N. Stewart
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert	Huntingfield, Lord	Sanders, Sir Robert A.
Drewe, C.	Hurst, Gerald B.	Sanderson, Sir Frank
Eden, Captain Anthony	Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'l'n & P'b'l's)	Sandon, Lord
Ellis, R. G.	Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)	Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
Elveden, Viscount	Jacob, A. E.	Savery, S. S.
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)	James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert	Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
Everard, W. Lindsay	Jephcott, A. R.	Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
Fairfax, Captain J. G.	Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)	Shepperson, E. W.
Falle, Sir Bertram G.	Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)	Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Fielden, E. B.	Kindersley, Major Guy M.	Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
Finburgh, S.	King, Commodore Henry Douglas	Skelton, A. N.
Ford, Sir P. J.	Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement	Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
Forestier-Walker, Sir L.	Knox, Sir Alfred	Smith-Carington, Neville W.
Foster, Sir Harry S.	Lamb, J. Q.	Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.	Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.	Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
Fraser, Captain Ian	Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)	Sprot, Sir Alexander
Gadlie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony	Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip	Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'ealand)
Ganzoni, Sir John	Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)	Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Gates, Percy	Long, Major Eric	Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton	Looker, Herbert William	Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham	Lougher, Lewis	Styles, Captain H. Walter
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John	Lowe, Sir Francis William	Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
Glyn, Major R. G. C.	Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman	Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
Goff, Sir Park	Lumley, L. R.	Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
Gower, Sir Robert	Lynn, Sir R. J.	Tasker, R. Inigo.
Grace, John	Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)	Templeton, W. P.
Grattar Doyle, Sir N.	Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)	Thom, Lt.-Col. J. G. (Dumbarton)
Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter	McLean, Major A.	Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Greene, W. P. Crawford	Macmillan, Captain H.	Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
Greenwood, Rt. Hn. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E)	McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John	Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)	Makins, Brigadier-General E.	Tinne, J. A.
Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John	Malone, Major P. B.	Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
Grottrian, H. Brent	Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn	Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.	Marriott, Sir J. A. R.	Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
Gunston, Captain D. W.	Meyer, Sir Frank	Wallace, Captain D. E.
Hackling, Captain Douglas H.	Milne, J. S. Wardlaw.	Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)	Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)	Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Harrison, G. J. C.	Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)	Warrender, Sir Victor
Hartington, Marquess of	Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.	Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)	Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)	Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)	Moreing, Captain A. H.	Wells, S. R.
Haslam, Henry C.	Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive	Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
Hawke, John Anthony	Nelson, Sir Frank	Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.	Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hn. W. G. (Ptrs'ld.)	Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)	Oman, Sir Charles William C.	Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.	Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William	Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Henn, Sir Sydney H.	Penny, Frederick George	Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)	Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)	Wise, Sir Fredric
Hills, Major John Waller	Perkins, Colonel E. K.	Withers, John James
Hilton, Cecil	Perring, Sir William George	Womersley, W. J.
Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.	Preston, William	Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)	Price, Major C. W. M.	Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy	Radford, E. A.	Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
Holt, Capt. H. P.	Raine, Sir Walter	Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)	Reid, D. D. (County Down)	Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)
Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)	Remer, J. R.
Hopkins, J. W. W.	Rentoul, G. S.
Hopkinson, A. (Lancaster, Mossley)	Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Major Sir George Hennessy and Captain Margesson.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)	Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.	Gillet, George M.
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')	Connolly, M.	Gosling, Harry
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bliston)	Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)	Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Baker, Walter	Crawford, H. E.	Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)	Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)	Groves, T.
Barnes, A.	Day, Colonel Harry	Grundy, T. W.
Batey, Joseph	Dennison, R.	Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
Bondfield, Margaret	Duckworth, John	Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.	Dunlco, H.	Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Briant, Frank	Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Badwelley)	Hardie, George D.
Broad, F. A.	Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)	Harney, E. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)	England, Colonel A.	Harris, Percy A.
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)	Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)	Hayday, Arthur
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel	Forrest, W.	Hayes, John Henry
Charleton, H. C.	Gardner, J. P.	Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Clowes, S.	Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.	Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Cluse, W. S.	Gibbins, Joseph	Hirst, G. H.

Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Maclean, Neil (Glasgow, Govan)
 Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
 March, S.
 Montague, Frederick
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.

Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Runciman, Rt. Hon. Walter
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Calthness)
 Slessor, Sir Henry H.
 Smillie, Robert
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penlstone)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spencer, G. A. (Broxtowe)
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell

Stewart J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
 Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Whiteley, W.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Sir Robert Hutchison and Mr. Fenby.

Motion made and Question proposed,
 "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. GILLET: I might remind the Committee that the subject we have now before us brings up that hardy annual known as the McKenna Duties. Possibly many hon. Members would have been quite glad if some Clause, possibly similar to that dealing with medicines, had been introduced taking the McKenna Duties out of the purview of this Committee. I know we have discussed this question until it has become almost stale, and the arguments must inevitably be very much the same year after year. The McKenna Duties seem to have been used by the party opposite rather as an excuse—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope): I must remind the hon. Member that this Clause only refers to the duty on tyres.

Mr. GILLET: May I put it that the exemption is due to the fact that originally they were part of the McKenna Duties. For definite reasons they were taken out of that category, and they are now being placed in the same position as the other McKenna Duties.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member wishes to deal with the McKenna Duties, he must put down a new Clause. The discussion on this Clause must be confined to tyres.

Mr. GILLET: I should be the last person to desire to discuss the whole question of the McKenna Duties, because I am sure the Committee is tired of discussing that subject. I take it, however, that I shall be in order in reminding the Committee that it was as a part of the McKenna Duties that this duty on tyres first came before the House, and the reason, although the Financial Secretary did not mention it, was that tyres were taken out of the original duties during the War, because it was thought that their inclusion would give offence to certain American interests at a time when the relationship between this country and America was in a rather difficult position, on account of the stoppage by our Navy of goods that were coming to Europe and other parts of the world. The reason for their exemption was, therefore, purely a political reason. I take it that the argument of the Financial Secretary is that excuse has now been removed, and that, as there is great need for money, the duties might as well be put back. It seems to me that, whether we are dealing with tyres or with the McKenna Duties, one great principle is involved in this question, and that is whether it is desirable to impose any form of Protection whatever on any kind of article coming into this country. In this case the article under consideration happens to be tyres.

Why should we impose a protective duty on tyres and not on many other things? I do not wish to seem to be encroaching on a subject which has been ruled out of order, but the answer given to that question is that this duty was a part of the McKenna Duties. If hon.

[Mr. Gillett.]

Members opposite were really going to have Protection, it is quite obvious that they should start, not with things like this, but with agriculture, or something of that sort. Why is it that we have these protective duties on a certain number of articles, thereby imposing a hardship on many trades and industries which, according to hon. Members opposite, are most in need of Protection? It is going to make it harder, for instance, for the farmer who has a motor car; it is going indirectly to increase the cost of his car. I know the right hon. Gentleman will say he has been assured by the traders that there is not going to be any increase in cost, but it is quite impossible to argue that a protective duty will not ultimately increase the cost, except, as I am quite willing to concede to the right hon. Gentleman, in certain circumstances. For instance, it may be that the price is going to fall in any case, and, if at that moment you put on a protective duty, then, instead of the price falling, it may remain as it is. I think many of the articles on which the Government have imposed duties have been in that position. The duty has been imposed at a time when, probably, the price would have fallen, and what has happened has been that the price has remained stationary. Then hon. Members opposite have said that that proved that the argument used against the protected duty was false. It seems to me that the object of a protective duty is only obtained if the price of the article is raised, because, if the price of the article in this country is not raised, Protection will not be sufficient to keep out the article from another country. Ultimately, the cost of a protective duty must fall in some way on the consumer, and I should be glad to see any arguments adduced from a large number of cases that prove that to be false.

If you once arrive at the principle that goods are going to cost more, then, if certain articles are taken, one here and one there, a hardship is bound to be inflicted. Hon. Members may say that, as the duty has been imposed on motor cars and certain other things, therefore this duty ought to be maintained, but that is really no argument. Some of these duties which are now protective were not really imposed as protective duties, but were imposed with the object of keeping out certain goods which were luxuries, and which at that time were not wanted in this country on account of the effect on the exchange and the monetary position. Hon. Members opposite have often taunted those who introduced these duties, and who are Free Traders, with not having held to their principles, but to judge anyone upon action taken during the War is hardly fair, and in any case it is quite legitimate to say that the object was really not protective, but that it was a purely War measure designed to keep out these goods. We have already been told that two or three factories are going to be started in this country, and it may be that hon. Members opposite will say that so many more people have been found employment. On the other hand, it must always be remembered that this will have an effect on certain other trades. Supposing it were possible to realise the idea of certain hon. Members that everything could be provided in this country, our shipping trade and many other trades would inevitably have to suffer, and hon. Members opposite would find it exceedingly difficult to prove that that was not the case. I object to any form of Protection, and it is on that ground that I oppose this Clause.

Possibly other Members of the House, like myself, have received a protest on the question of motor taxation, not, I think, directed specially to this particular tax, but to the imposition of taxation on the motor industry generally. It came from the National Road Transport Employers' Federation, and it was sent to other Members of the House as well as to myself some three or four months ago. Certain figures are quoted, supplied by the Ministry of Labour, in reference to the number of wholly unemployed persons registered as motor drivers, chauffeurs and so on. The number for London in 1926 is given as 2,275, and that number had increased in the following January, about a year after, to 2,643, or an increase of 18 per cent., while over the whole of Great Britain the increase was 15 per cent. That has been the effect in the motor transport industry, and it is also the effect which will be produced upon industry generally. Hon. Members opposite argue that factories are being brought here, and employment is being found, but the effect must inevitably be that the shipping and transport industries will suffer if any large measure of protective tariffs is introduced. I know that this duty in itself is a very small thing. We were told in the Budget statement that the total sum for this year is only something like £700,000, but the underlying principle remains the same, and it is on that ground that I oppose the Clause.

Mr. CRAWFURD: I think it would be as well if the Committee could come to a decision as to the reason for imposing this particular tax. During the Report stage of the Budget Resolutions, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, replying to some observations that I made, was good enough to say that all I had done was to trot out the old Free Trade argument, and that, therefore, he did not propose to waste the time of the Committee in answering it, because he thought that the Committee and the House were rather tired of this line of argument. I do not quote that in order to enter a complaint against the Financial Secretary, but I want to examine this particular duty from the point of view of the Protectionist case. It does not seem to me that there is a single valid reason for this particular duty. It is true that the Financial Secretary said just now that the reasons for exempting motor tyres from the general scheme of taxation in regard to motor cars were special reasons existing at the time, and that they have now ceased to operate. It is equally true that the reasons for all these duties have ceased to operate. I am within the recollection of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Swansea (Mr. Runciman) when I say that, at the time when those duties were imposed and when tyres were exempted, neither revenue nor Protection was concerned, but what was sought was the prohibition of certain imports for certain specific reasons. If, therefore, the argument of the Financial Secretary is to hold good, that the time for the exemption has passed, that argument applies equally to the whole range of these taxes. I want to inquire into the particular reason why this tax is imposed. Is it, in fact, imposed for purposes of protection? On the occasion of the Second Reading of the Finance Bill, a speech was made by the hon. Member for Darwen (Sir F. Sanderson), in the course of which he said:

"The industrial world is pleased to see that the pottery industry and the motor tyre industry have received consideration at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the present Budget, but industrialists are disappointed to find that more use has not been made of the Safeguarding of Industries Act."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 19th May, 1927; col. 1484, Vol. 206.]

Mr. REMER: Hear, hear!

Mr. CRAWFURD: The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer), as usual, reinforces my argument. There is no more useful Member of the House than the hon. Member for Macclesfield for certain purposes. I would like to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the simple question: Is this tax introduced from that point of view, or is it not? Is it intended and meant to be a Protective tax, or is it not? If it is meant to be a Protective tax, then I say that there is no industry, or, at any rate, there are few industries in this country which are less in need of protection than this particular industry. I know the argument of the hon. and gallant Member for Bournemouth (Sir H. Croft) about the setting up of foreign factories in this country, but let me remind him that as long as a year ago arrangements were made for setting up factories in this country by practically every 7.0 p.m. one of these foreign companies. Of course, the hon. and gallant Member may say it was intelligent anticipation, but I do not think it was. I think it was the exigencies of trade. But, leaving that aside for the moment, is there any reason at all—even if one accepts the Protectionist position—or any conceivable excuse for giving a protective duty to the industry? Let me again quote the hon. Member for Darwen on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Finance Bill, when he quoted a statement made by the Chairman of the Dunlop Rubber Tyre Company at the annual meeting of that company early in this year. His quotation was as follows. It is the Chairman of the Dunlop Company who is speaking:

"Coming down to the future, our main revenue comes from the sale of tyres, and during the first three months of the present year our sales have consistently beaten all previous records. Our principal factories are working at the greatest pressure, and it is with the greatest difficulty that they are able to meet the demands placed upon them. and exceptional efforts are being made to relieve the situation.”—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 19th May, 1927; col. 1485, Vol. 206.]

[Mr. Crawford.]

Here is an industry which has only recently undergone a drastic reconstruction after being vastly over-capitalised, which on the statement of its chairman is working at the highest possible pressure and cannot fulfil a single additional order and can hardly meet the orders it has got, and yet this is the industry which is singled out for protection.

May I ask the indulgence of the Committee to trouble them with a very few figures dealing with the imports and exports of tyres? I am going to take five years, and I am very glad indeed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) is in his place, because reference has already been made to his Budget—that very good Radical Budget of 1924, and I am going to offer a further testimony. In 1922 the exports of British tyres were worth £2,000,000. The total exports, including re-exports, were £2,300,000. The total imports were £4,250,000 or, using an expression which is commonly used, the balance of trade against this country with regard to tyres was very nearly £2,000,000 in value. In 1923, the balance of trade against this country was £1,300,000. Then came the right hon. Gentleman and in 1924, for the full year, the balance of trade was £158,000 in favour of this country.

Mr. SNOWDEN: It only operated for six months of the year in 1925.

Mr. CRAWFORD: The next figure will confirm what the right hon. Gentleman says. The balance of trade in regard to ingoings and outgoings of tyres of all sorts in 1925 was £360,000 and in 1926 was £349,000 in our favour. There is very little doubt if it had not been for the industrial disturbances of last year that balance would have shown an increase on the year before.

Sir H. CROFT: May I ask the hon. Gentleman to give the figures of the imports for 1924 and 1926?

Mr. CRAWFORD: The figures of the imports for 1924, in value, is £3,037,000 and in 1926 £4,849,000. During the same two years the figures for British exports were £2,730,000 in 1924, and in 1926 £4,525,000—a vastly greater increase, proportionately, than the increase in imports. If there was ever a case for the protection of an industry, it is not in regard to this industry, and I find it very hard to believe that the right hon. Gentleman is really introducing this, at any rate, in his own mind or with his own consent, as a measure of protection.

May I turn for a moment to what the right hon. Gentleman himself said when he made his Financial Statement? After detailing with, let us say, a colourable amount of accuracy, the history of the exemption of tyres from the ordinary run of these duties, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was an anomaly that out of all the accessories of motor cars tyres alone should be exempted and he said:

“I propose, aliko in the interests of symmetry and revenue, to rectify this anomaly and to perfect the work of Mr. McKenna and his colleagues.”—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 11th April, 1927; col. 89, Vol. 205.]

Therefore, as far as the Chancellor of the Exchequer is concerned, it is not a question of a protective tax, but a question of a tariff in the interests of revenue and symmetry. I have not the slightest doubt, if the right hon. Gentleman sees fit to reply to this discussion, that he will have some very interesting definitions of symmetry. What he means by symmetry I do not pretend to know. I have never heard of a symmetrical tariff. I have heard of many kinds of taxes, but never of a symmetrical one. When we talk of a revenue tax we do know more what we mean and have some common ground. If this tax was imposed in the interests of revenue, then I submit to the right hon. Gentleman the simple proposition that he should have conformed to the definition of a revenue tax which he himself has offered and defended upon thousands of platforms in this country, namely that a revenue tax should be a tax imposed not only on the foreign article which enters, but should be accompanied by a countervailing excise duty on that which is made at home. If the figures I have produced give a true picture—and, as far as I know, they do—of the state of the tyre industry in this country, it is a monstrous thing that this particular industry should have been singled out to be helped at the expense of the rest of the country.

I am not going to dwell upon this point at any length, but I am going to remind the right hon. Gentleman once more of the pledge with which this Parliament began, that there should be no general attempt to introduce Protection during its lifetime, and, further, I would remind him of the subsequent words of the Prime Minister to the effect that no industry should receive any measure of protection unless by means of the machinery of the Safeguarding of Industries.

Sir H. CROFT: And by analogous measures.

Mr. CRAWFURD: Surely there is nothing analogous to safeguarding in this? Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member remembers the terms of the White Paper which set out the conditions, and there is nothing in the tyre industry which corresponds to those conditions by which alone any industry could even ask for a measure of protection under the safeguarding machinery. Bearing that in mind, it does seem little less than an outrage that this particular article and industry should have been singled out for a Protectionist measure. For these reasons I support the Amendment.

Mr. HILTON: I hope the Committee will bear with me for a few moments because this is a subject which is very near to my heart, both politically and commercially. I have not heard a single argument which would prevent me from supporting this Clause. The argument used is the same old stereotyped argument that we get from the Free Trade benches. I have listened to Free Trade discussions and taken part in them for the last 17 years, and I have not heard anything new. I should like to devote myself not to the general application of Free Trade principles as regards this matter, but to its actual application to the manufacture of tyres. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Runciman) is not in his place, because he is very keen on shipping. [HON. MEMBERS: "He is here."] It cannot make the slightest possible difference to shipping, because everything that is contained in the tyres is imported in its raw state. The composition of a tyre, speaking from a financial standpoint, is half cotton and half rubber, both of which are imported from our Colonies or from Egypt or the United States. When that cotton or rubber has been brought to Lancashire, it is for us to make it up. The cotton is spun, and in the spinning we use the finest, strongest and best cottons that are grown in the Sudan and Egypt. To-day we in Lancashire are spinning more than ever, and I take no account of the figures of value given by the hon. Member who last spoke, because in 1921 the price of cotton was twice the price to-day and the figures are very misleading. The number of people employed in Lancashire on spinning cotton into fabric is more than twice as large as it was in 1922.

Mr. CRAWFURD: Without a tariff.

Mr. HILTON: It was the natural growth of engineering and the fact that motor cars are being made every week and that there are over 5,000,000 tyres used per annum. The average weight of cotton in a motor tyre is, approximately, just under 3 lbs. As a general principle, I submit that if we do not buy tyres made at home and thus keep the work at home it will be a foolhardy policy. It is better to keep your work-people working even if you have to pay a penny more, though it is not proved in this instance that you have to pay more. Only last week a large firm—I am not advertising any particular firm—placed an order for 100,000 cotton spinning spindles and 600 looms, and the necessary preliminary machinery to erect a mill in Castleton. That will employ engineers in Lancashire and goods will be made in Castleton, thus employing another thousand Lancashire workmen on this particular job. I may point out, as has already been pointed out, that during the development of the manufacture of tyres in this country many millions of pounds have been lost by foreign competition and by dumping. I was in America in 1919 and I bought a tyre which was very satisfactory, but I came over here and bought the same tyre much more cheaply than I could buy it in America. At that time there was, near here in Middlesex, a company with £2,000,000 capital trying to make this particular tyre. That company no longer exists. There was also in Scotland one which went under. I think it is the bounden duty of the Government to make the first consideration not the exact price that the wealthy man has to pay for the tyre, but that our work-people, who can make tyres which are better than any other tyres in the world, should be fully employed at high wages. I think it is the duty of all Members on this side to support this Clause.

[Mr. Hilton.]

Lieut.-Commander BURNLEY: I would like to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon having introduced this duty on motor tyres. I pressed him last year to introduce such a duty with an object very different from that mentioned by the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. Crawford), namely, with the object of getting cheaper tyres in this country. Some arguments put forward by the hon. Member for West Walthamstow suggested that hon. Members in some cases will not take into account quantity so much as value in considering the effects of a duty. Almost the whole criterion, surely, is the actual output in numbers. If the output in numbers could be made greater, the price would naturally tend to become lower. I had a very great confirmation of that only 10 days ago, when I was talking with the president of the largest of the American motor tyre companies, who was over here selecting a factory to put down in this country because of this duty. The figures he gave me were rather startling. In his factory they have turned out 66,000 cases a day, whereas the Dunlop Company, which is by far the biggest manufacturer in this country, is doing under 16,000 cases a day, including all its American business. When you get output on that scale, it is impossible to compete unless you can manufacture in this country on something approaching the scale on which they are manufacturing in America. It was the opinion of the gentleman whom I have mentioned that it would be cheaper for him to manufacture in this country than to transport his tyres over here; that is to say, that he would not alter his price, but that he would be able to produce more cheaply. When it comes to a consideration of duties, if the Government—and I know the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a very lukewarm supporter of any duty from a protective standpoint—would really consider the kind of article, I believe that if all the articles that could be manufactured by mass production methods were protected, we should not only get the articles cheaper here, but we should also greatly increase our export trade.

Mr. LEES-SMITH: The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Hilton), who spoke from personal knowledge of this industry, began by saying that most of the arguments against this duty that he had heard were old, stereotyped, and antiquated. I am afraid that, in spite of the personal knowledge contained in his speech, exactly the same comments could be made upon the arguments that he used. His first argument was that, as a result of this duty, certain new factories were being established in his area, factories which, I think, represented capital coming in from abroad. The same argument was used by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, that this duty is inducing foreign manufacturers to establish businesses in this country. How stereotyped, how familiar, how stale that argument is, and how often has the answer been given! We do not deny that, if you put a tariff upon some particular industry, you will attract capital into that industry, whether from home or from abroad, but you will do so only by inflicting a greater proportionate injury upon the other industries in the land. You can have no better example of that truth than this particular duty which we are now discussing. It is proposed to impose a duty upon the importation of motor tyres.

The hon. Member for Bolton himself practically told us that, as a matter of fact, this is one of the most prosperous industries in this country, and that in Lancashire the amount of cotton which they were spinning for the fabric of motor tyres was twice as great as it was in 1920. That is the industry which is going to obtain the advantage, but what about the other industries of this country? What about engineering? What about iron and steel? What about cotton? What are those industries asking for? Every time any speech is made on their behalf, those industries tell us that the one thing which this House can do to assist them is to help them to lower their costs of production. They are industries dependant upon export trade, and they insist that, unless they can reduce their costs of manufacture, and so bring down their prices, they cannot hold their own in the competition with rivals in foreign markets. That is our argument. What is the effect of this duty on those industries?

Sir H. CROFT: None at all.

Mr. LEES-SMITH: Motor tyres are practically a raw material. Directly or indirectly, motor tyres enter into the cost of production of practically every manufactured article in this country. I have worked it out in the case of some cars with which I am familiar, and I remember that the Secretary of the Automobile Association himself, when this duty was proposed, said that the duty upon quite a small horse-power car would amount to £15. What will the duty be upon motor lorries used for business purposes?

Sir H. CROFT: Does the hon. Member suggest that the price of home-made cars has gone up?

Mr. LEES-SMITH: The duty has been imposed only for a few weeks so far, and how can we tell until we have had some time in which to judge the results? The answer to the hon. and gallant Member has been given by the one man in this Committee who speaks from experience, and that is the hon. Member for Bolton. He did not tell us that this was going to reduce the price of motor tyres. He said, "What does it matter if you increase the price of motor tyres by a penny or so? Why should the Government consider the price of motor tyres provided you give employment to the men who are making them? But let us take it on broader grounds. If it be true, as hon. Members argue, that a tariff on these articles is not only going to leave their price the same, but is actually going to reduce it, then why is the Safeguarding of Industries Act opened by the statement that no tariff must be imposed upon any article of food or drink? Why, in case after case, when hon. Members are introducing these Safeguarding Duties in this House, if some portion of the import is specially important, is an exception introduced into the Safeguarding Duty itself saying that that shall have no tariff put upon it?

Sir H. CROFT: Ancient prejudice!

Mr. LEES-SMITH: Take cutlery. When we were discussing that duty, we found a special provision that knives that were necessary for surgical purposes and knives that were part of the material used by other industries, were to be excluded from the duty. If it is going to lower the price of those knives, why not bring them in? As a matter of fact, in the whole of the argument for a tariff which is used by hon. Members opposite, I notice that in every tariff which they draw up they lay it down that the duty shall be imposed upon fully-manufactured articles, and that semi-manufactured articles which enter into the cost of production of articles at a further stage shall be excluded. Why? If the duty is going to lower their price, why not give the whole of British industry the advantage of imposing it on semi-manufactured articles. The fact is that hon. Members themselves do not believe the arguments that they put forward. They try to convince us, and they cannot convince themselves. That, then, is the reason why we assert that it is no argument whatever to tell us that foreign manufacturers are going to set up motor-tyre factories in this country. That will only be done at the expense of the other industries, which are suffering under burdens from which the motor-tyre manufacturers are free.

The result of this duty is very plain. Reference was made by the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. Crawford) to the recent speech made by the chairman of Dunlop's. They held their annual meeting a month or two ago, and I noticed that the chairman of Dunlop's, a firm which is going to get more advantage from this duty than any other firm in the land, pointed out that, in spite of the industrial difficulties and the general trade depression, he was going, as a result of last year's working, to ask the shareholders of Dunlop's to accept an increase of dividend from 15 to 20 per cent. This duty means that the great export trade of this country, which is staggering under heavy burdens and which needs assistance if any trade needs it, is going to be injured in order to add another five, 10 or 15 per cent. to the dividends of the shareholders in one of the wealthiest corporations in the world.

Major-General Sir JOHN DAVIDSON: The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) mentioned Dunlop's, but he did not tell the whole story, and I think it would have been only fair to mention that there was a reconstruction of the capital of that firm, and that their £1 shares were written down to 6s. 8d. I cannot believe that the hon. Member is really serious when he suggests that a duty on tyres is going to cause an increase in the cost of production of other manufactured articles in this country. It has not done so yet, and I shall be very interested to see whether it does. I think those arguments are futile. I want to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on bringing in this duty. What I am much more concerned about is that our working people in this country should have a reasonably good wage for a reasonably good day's work, and this duty is producing that result. Hon. Members have said that concerns have set up factories in this country but that they have done so quite irrespective of these duties. I would ask the hon. Member who has just spoken whether he is aware that Pirelli are establishing a factory in Hampshire, and whether they ever had any intention to establish a factory here before these duties were imposed. Obviously, they had not. I represent a division in Hampshire, and I am very glad that they are putting up a factory there, and I hope that it will employ a great many people from my division and neighbouring divisions. I look at the question from the point of view of the prosperity of the men who get work there. In my division there are a great many people who are out of work, and it gives me a great deal of pleasure when I see employment found in these new factories. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on bringing forward these duties, and hope he will extend them to many other industries. The safeguarding of industries is the one salvation of this country.

Mr. SNOWDEN: Are we not to have a reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. CHURCHILL: We have had a very full reply. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] There has been a full reply to the Amendment by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and the Debate that has taken place on the Clause itself has been of such a general character, so evenly balanced, so well contested on both sides and so free from any intrusion into any novel sphere, that I hardly thought it was necessary for me to add to the already lengthy toil which the Committee have before them by making a restatement of the reasons which led to the imposing of this duty. I would not have spoken but for the stern attitude adopted by the right hon. Gentleman for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) in asking for my intervention. I will first give an answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Walthamstow, West (Mr. Crawford). He asked me whether this duty is intended to be protective. I made it perfectly plain in the speech with which I introduced this matter to the House that there is no protective intention behind the re-imposition of this duty. It is imposed for revenue purposes and it yields a revenue of £700,000. It was also imposed on the ground of dealing with what is a luxury commodity to a very large extent. In this respect, of course, we have the authority of Mr. McKenna, the right hon. Member for Swansea West (Mr. Runciman) and all the leaders of the Liberal party, who proposed this tax as part of the McKenna Duties and only omitted it from the scope of those duties in view of some very special war-time arrangements which were made with manufacturers of tyres in the United States. It is a revenue duty, and it is, to a very considerable extent, a luxury duty. It is true that, incidentally, those who hold the Protectionist theory may derive some satisfaction from the workings of this duty, because it has had the effect of bringing certain foreign firms inside the ambit of the duty, and they have started works in this country and provide much employment, which gives satisfaction to hon. Members in whose constituencies those factories are put up.

Sir H. CROFT: And to the country as a whole.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Yes. In addition, the mass production possibilities which are open to the great manufacturers, Dunlop's in particular, may very likely lead to diminution in the cost of production which will prevent any rise in prices in particular cases. I understand there has been no increase in prices during the three months the duty has been imposed in regard to the cost of British tyres. Dunlop's tyres, except to the extent of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of their production—in regard to a particular kind of case, to what I believe are called giant tyres. On $96\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. of the production of Dunlop's there has been no increase in the price, and we are deriving considerable revenue, while certain reactions of a favourable character have already manifested themselves in the labour market. In these circumstances, we are fully justified in completing the original design of the framers of the McKenna Duties, by putting this duty within the scope of the scheme.

It would be unprofitable at this stage to endeavour to extend the area of the argument beyond this particular duty. I have no wish whatever to embark at the present time upon theoretical discussions, but there is one point which I would make. The right hon. Member for Colne Valley, when in 1925 we imposed the McKenna duties, made a striking declaration of his intention, when he had the power, to repeal them at once, as he had done before. Words of this kind spoken by the right hon. Gentleman, with the authority of his party behind him, exercise a certain depressing effect upon the industries which are subject to the McKenna duties. I am informed, on authority which cannot be disputed, that considerable extensions of the Dunlop works would be undertaken but for the apprehension that the duties may, all of a sudden, be removed, without any regard to the merits of the situation, or the prices ruling in the home market, or a general study of the labour market, that suddenly the protection which is afforded to these commodities may be removed as a political manoeuvre, to gain cheap applause from this or that quarter and to cement alliance with another political faction; that for that purpose and with that object the duty may be suddenly swept away and, in consequence, the whole basis of industry be violently deranged.

In view of this cloud of uncertainty which is hanging over the industry, some of the manufacturers, to whom hon. Members have drawn attention, are operating much more slowly than they would otherwise have done. As I have been called upon by the right hon. Gentleman to intervene in this discussion, I am glad to have the opportunity of appealing to him to remove this uncertainty which hangs over the industry, and not to commit himself, because it may be many years before he is called upon to take the decision, to sweep away these duties, regardless of the interests of those who are concerned in them, employes as well as employers, and regardless also of the success or failure of the duties from the revenue as well as other points of view.

Mr. SNOWDEN: One can understand the reluctance of the right hon. Gentleman to take part in this Debate and that he did not rise until we insisted that we should get some explanation from him. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury has a consistent Protectionist record, but the right hon. Gentleman has a past in this matter, and it must be exceedingly inconvenient for him to swallow all his previous professions. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was glad to have an opportunity of making his observations, but the funereal tone in which his explanations were made were hardly in consonance with the feelings of lightness and enthusiasm which he professed. The right hon. Gentleman says that this is a revenue duty. He admits that it has a Protective effect. He made an appeal to me that if I should ever be in a position to deal with these matters, I should not recklessly undo the work that he has done.

Mr. CHURCHILL: My appeal to the right hon. Gentleman was, not prejudge the decision which will be taken, if and when that situation arises, and not to prejudge it in such a way as to exercise a depressing effect upon the industry.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I do not think, indeed I am quite certain, that anything that is likely to happen as a result of the operation of these duties is likely to demand any very close consideration in regard to them, because there are broad principles involved which would determine our action. The right hon. Gentleman is the last person in the world to advise somebody else not to take precipitate action. He says that if we repealed these duties it would be in order to cement some [Mr. Snowden.] alliance with another Parliamentary group on whose support we might have to rely. The right hon. Gentleman is the last person in the world to charge others with being actuated by motives which are not backed by conviction. He had not been in office three or four months before he repealed duties which had been imposed six or eight months before. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman then adopt the advice he now gives, and wait and see what was going to be the effect of the repeal of these duties? He did not wait. Why? Because it was necessary for him to bring forth some fruit that would prove to that party upon whose support he now depends that he was prepared to concede to them some part of their protectionist policy. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had had representations made to him of the disastrous effect that might follow if the duty upon motor tyres which he is now imposing were suddenly repealed. I know the source from which he got that information. That same source has made precisely the same suggestions or comments to me. But that same source said to me at the same time: "Ours is an industry that does not need Protection." The right hon. Gentleman says that, although this duty may have a protective effect, his sole purpose in imposing it is revenue—incidentally, that it will give symmetry to the duty upon motor cars.

The right hon. Gentleman is concerned about symmetry. Why cannot he give other taxes symmetry? For instance, we were discussing in an earlier part of the proceedings the duty upon tea. Associated with tea is bread and butter. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman's desire for symmetry induce him to impose for revenue purposes a duty upon corn and a duty upon butter? Why?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Because precise pledges have been given against anything of that kind.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I waited for that retort. There have been precise pledges, too, that there should be no duty of this kind. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said that there would be no Protection given to any industry except through the machinery of the Safeguarding of Industries, but that procedure has not been adopted in this case, for this reason—that the British motor car industry has not made a case for a duty under any one of the five heads they would be required to substantiate. We have had a quotation from the speech of the chairman of the Dunlop Company, that they are so busy that they cannot take any more orders. The prosperity of that company during the past several years has been one of the romances of British industry. It is quite true that they got into financial difficulties a few years ago and had to write off two-thirds of their capital, which ought never to have been called. The nominal value of their shares to-day is 6s. 8d., but he did not tell us what was the Stock Exchange quotation of those shares. I see from the Stock Exchange Report that Dunlop shares were very active to-day, and they are standing at 34s. 6d.; that is to say, that the Stock Exchange quotation is five times more than the actual paid-up capital, and yet this is an industry which is getting Protection from this Government. What has the Prime Minister to say about it? What has he got to say about the Chancellor of the Exchequer imposing through a back-door—

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Budget is not a back-door. It is very much a front door.

Mr. SNOWDEN: It is by a back-door procedure, simply under the pretext of imposing a revenue duty. What has the Prime Minister to say about a proceeding like that? Is not that a violation of the right hon. Gentleman's pledges? Undoubtedly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may say what he likes about this being a tax imposed for revenue purposes. Every speech that has been made by Members on that side of the House in the course of the Debate has welcomed this proposal as an instalment of Protection, and only, mark you, as an instalment. Practically every speech has finished with a peroration to this effect, that they hope this is only an earnest of more things that are going to come.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to come to his peroration, because he is getting on ground beyond tyres. I have had to stop perorations before.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I have no recollection of you pulling up any of the hon. Members.

The CHAIRMAN: They sat down too quickly.

Mr. SNOWDEN: There has been one point that has been raised by almost every speaker, and that is as to the effect the imposition of this duty will have upon the price of the manufactured article. Our Tariff Reform pundits have said that the effect will not be to cause an increase in the price with one single exception. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Hilton) said it did not matter if the price were increased. Is it the confession, not merely in regard to this particular case, but it is the confession of Protectionists in this House that a duty upon the imported commodity does not increase the price of the corresponding home article? May I state in a word or two what our view of that matter is?

"The object of protection is to encourage home industries. The means by which you attain that object is that you so arrange import duties that the prices obtained in those industries are increased. If industries are encouraged it is by raising prices."

That, in a nutshell, is Protection properly understood. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Then hon. Members repudiate the greatest of living Tory statesmen, for that is a quotation from a speech by Lord Balfour. But I will call to my support the right hon. Gentleman himself. He said this afternoon, when he had to defend this duty, that an import duty did not necessarily and always raise the price of the corresponding article at home. When one of my hon. Friends said, "You are passing it on to the consumer," the right hon. Gentleman said last year—I admit it was in reply to an interjection, and perhaps he did not give the matter sufficient thought and care, but, at any rate, when a man is thrown off his guard, the truth generally comes out—said, "Show me any tax where the consumer does not pay, and where the tax is not passed on to the consumer." That is the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his present Tariff Reform companions, and it shows that the right hon. Gentleman after all, although he may on occasion be content to give lip-service to Protection, may be compelled—of course, the right hon. Gentleman has on every occasion when he has proposed some protective Clause shown his contempt for it, and his contempt for the arguments that have been put forward by Members of his own party.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have no contempt for £700,000.

Mr. SNOWDEN: He shows contempt for the protective effect of this proposal, and he has got a contempt for the arguments by which it is supported by members of his own party. Of course, this will pass, and I repeat what I said when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to reimpose the McKenna Duties. He is getting the finances of this country into such a desperate condition that his successor will be in a very difficult position indeed. It may not be possible in one Session of Parliament, and in the first Budget, to undo the mischief that the right hon. Gentleman is doing over a period of three or four years.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!

Mr. SNOWDEN: "Hear hear," the right hon. Gentleman says. That is part of the policy of this Government, not only in regard to this matter but in regard to many other matters. They are creating a situation in which any labour Government which succeeds will have to spend perhaps one or two Sessions of Parliament in undoing the mischief that this Government has done.

Sir F. HALL: You will not have the trouble.

Mr. SNOWDEN: Therefore, they think that during these one or two Sessions we shall be prevented from coming out with some of the bigger and more far-reaching reforms—

The CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to this discussion.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I think it is relevant in this respect, that this is one of the difficulties they are putting in the way of the next Labour Government. The Chancellor of the Tory party may rely upon it, that at the first possible practical opportunity this duty and other protective duties the Government are proposing will be repealed.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to a division.

Miss WILKINSON: On a point of Order, Mr. Chairman. Can you explain to the Committee what we are proposing to do? Are we engaged in a Division?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member The Committee divided: Ayes, 236; may only speak covered when a Division Noes, 119.
has been called.

Division No. 219.]

AYES.

[8.0 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T
 Alberty, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atkinson, C.
 Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Bainiel, Lord
 Banks, Reginald Mitchell
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Bellairs, Commander Carlyn W.
 Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Blundell, F. N.
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Buchan, John
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burney, Lieut.-Com. Charles D.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth.S.)
 Cazale, Captain Victor A.
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Chilcott, Sir Warden
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Croke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Phillip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadle, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Grotian, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Holbrook, Sir Arthur Richard
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hurst, Gerald B.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Llithgow)
 Kindersley, Major Guy M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir Robert J.
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Pilcher, G.
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Popner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aber'd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streetfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Crichton-, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinné, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wholer, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)

Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
Wise, Sir Fredric
Withers, John James

Womersley, W. J.
Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. F. C. Thomson and Captain
Margesson.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bliston)
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Bondfield, Margaret
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Brant, Frank
Broad, F. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Clowes, S.
Cluse, W. S.
Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
Connolly, M.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Crawford, H. E.
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwelty)
Fenby, T. D.
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W.R., Normanton)
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Hardie, George D.
Harris, Percy A.
Hayday, Arthur
Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kirkwood, D.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
MacLaren, Andrew
Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
March, S.
Morris, R. H.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Mosley, Oswald
Murnin, H.
Pain, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F.O. (W. Bromwich)
Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)

Rose, Frank H.
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Smillie, Robert
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
Snell, Harry
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Phillip
Spencer, G. A. (Brompton)
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Strauss, E. A.
Sullivan, J.
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Townend, A. E.
Varley, Frank B.
Viant, S. P.
Wallhead, Richard C.
Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Welsh, J. C.
Wiggins, William Martin
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Wright, W.
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Mr. Whiteley and Mr. Hayes.

CLAUSE 4.—(Amendment with respect to duty on cinematograph films.)

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 224;
Noes, 120.

Division No. 220.]

AYES.

[8.9 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Atkinson, C.
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Bainiel, Lord
Banks, Reginald Mitchell
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
Bellairs, Commander Carlyon W.
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Blundell, F. N.
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
Brass, Captain W.
Briscoe, Richard George
Brooklebank, C. E. R.
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.
Buchan, John
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Cassels, J. D.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth. S.)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chapman, Sir S.
Chilcott, Sir Warden
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips

Cooper, A. Duff
Cope, Major William
Couper, J. B.
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Cpt. R. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Dalketh, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Clarence) (Clarence)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dawson, Sir Philip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Drewe, C.
Eden, Captain Anthony
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Elliot, Major Walter E.
Ellis, R. G.
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Fairfax, Captain J. G.
Finburgh, S.
Ford, Sir P. J.

Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E)
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Grotian, H. Brent
 Guest, Capt. Rt. Hon. F. E. (Bristol, N.)
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Walter
 Hilton, Cecil
 Holbrook, Sir Arthur Richard
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whit'eh'n)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aymer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)

Kindersley, Major G. M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Mason, Lieut.-Colonel Glyn K.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw.
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Pilcher, G.
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)

Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Willfrid
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich W.)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Mr. F. C. Thomson and Major Sir
 Harry Barnston.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Gardner, J. P.

Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Kelly, W. T.

Kennedy, T.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
 March, S.
 Morris, R. H.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Eiland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shells, Dr. Drummond

Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Smillie, Robert
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spencer, G. A. (Broxtow)
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.

Sullivan, Joseph
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Welsh, J. C.
 Whiteley, W.
 Wiggins, William Martin

Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. B. Smith and Mr. Hayes.

CLAUSE 5.—(Increased duties on wines.)

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Captain FitzRoy): The Amendments on the Paper will increase the charge and are therefore not in Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: The main object of this Clause is to increase the duty upon wines. We on this side do not propose to controvert the main object of the Clause, but in addition to the general increase in tax it also perpetuates and extends the principle of Imperial Preference by making a special allowance on Empire wines, and it is in regard to that aspect of it that some of us desire to say a word. This Imperial Preference dates from the time of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, who proposed to establish an Imperial Zollverein and this preference on wine is in fact part of that original scheme. It was pointed out from the beginning that there were two great objections to an Imperial Zollverein. In the first place the Dominions were not prepared to open their ports to us, and in the second place it was realised by many people that it was not desirable to try to cement the ties of blood relationship by business bargains. From that point of view, in our opinion these taxes are objectionable and we consider firstly that the ties that bind us to the Dominions are sentimental ties, and in the second place so far as the Dominions benefit us through the preference they concede, and we quite acknowledge that they do, the right method by which we can reciprocate is not by altering our fiscal system but by giving the Dominions various advantages which are natural to our method of conducting our trade and industry and our general life. We consider that the best reciprocal action we can take is to continue the defence of the shores of the Dominions and continue the very valuable assistance we give them through allowing them to float their loans with special advantages in our markets.

These duties on wines, spirits and liquors are primarily revenue taxes, and it stands to reason that any suggestion that part of the Wine Duty should be remitted in the case of wines coming from the Dominions, must be in itself a loss to our revenue. The consumer pays the additional tax. The revenue does not reap the whole of the benefit but a part that the consumer pays goes to the Colonial producer. It is open to the Chancellor to argue that though there is this loophole by which the revenue does not get the whole of what the consumer pays, nevertheless it is worth while because going, as it does, to the Colonial producer, we get a quid pro quo in the preference that is given to us. I have already attempted to show that there are other forms of quid pro quo that we might give more suited to our system than this preference that we are asked to extend in this Clause, but in addition to that I want to stress the point that there is some doubt at present whether the various Dominions, and particularly Australia, which this wine preference is largely intended to benefit, are prepared to give us a quid pro quo in the actual form of preference in that country. It is true that, from the beginning, Australia and other parts of the British Empire have frankly stated that they were Protectionist. They have frankly said, "We are not going to admit your wares free of duty but it is our permanent policy to impose a certain amount of duty in order to make good the high conditions of labour and the other high costs that we have in our country." There is a certain amount that can be said for that moderate Protectionist policy.

But in Australia there is a move to-day to do a great deal more than that. In particular in the case of hosiery an attempt is being made to impose duties which are not by any means of that reasonable protective kind. They amount to 50 or 60, 70 and sometimes over 100 per cent. of the cost in this country. In hosiery the Australians, by these new forms of taxation, by charging in addition to an ad valorem duty a duty of 1s. on cotton goods and half a crown on woollen and silk goods per individual garment in the case of knitted underwear, are taking action of a prohibitive character against British trade. The point we want to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this. If, throwing over what we believe the sound methods of relationship between the home country and the Dominions, we are going to have this bargaining system of Preference, setting the preference that we give them against the preference that they give to our goods, are you assured that you are getting a good bargain? We do not like the matter of bargaining between blood relations. We think it is an unsound and unsatisfactory principle. But if you are going to bargain, at least we demand that your bargain should be a good one, and when we find that in the Dominions, particularly Australia, such examples of a high tariff against this country, with a small Preference it is true against other countries, but so large a tariff as to be in fact a prohibition against goods coming from this country, we say to the Chancellor, "Is it not time you discussed these things with the Dominions on the ground that unless they can meet us we ought not further to extend our Preference to them," and it is for that reason that I have raised this point on this Clause.

[Mr. Pethick-Lawrence.]

Mr. CHURCHILL: The hon. Gentleman deprecated a bargain or agreement of this kind between the Mother Country and the Dominions, and spoke of the difficulties which arise when such bargains take place. We have never bargained about our preference. There is only a very limited field, in accordance with the pledges which have been given, in which preferences can be afforded. We offered, voluntarily, to the Imperial Conference in 1917 to give preference to the Dominions on all commodities in respect of which duties were imposed or might hereinafter be imposed by the British Parliament for its own purposes. We made a promise that we would give that preference to the Dominions, but our list is a very small one compared with the whole volume of trade. We made that promise and undertaking, not as a matter of bargaining but out of the sincere gratitude and affection which we felt towards those Dominions who at that moment had sent armies thousands of miles across the sea to fight in the line in France and elsewhere. We are proud to carry on that policy, which, imposed and sanctioned by Parliament, automatically gives these preferences, making no bargain and seeking for no return. On the other side, there is a great desire to develop their own industries and manufacturers under protective tariffs, but, apart from that, there is a great desire to buy as much produce as possible from Great Britain.

Although it is true that the duties are so high in some cases in Australia as to be very nearly prohibitive on certain articles, yet, over the whole range of the Australian tariff, very considerable preferences are afforded to British goods, with the result that by far and away the best customer of this country is the British subject resident in Australia. There is no individual who takes so largely from us of our goods as the Australian, and, therefore, I think, it is very much better that we should occupy ourselves in counting up the advantages rather than in trying to balance one side of the case against the other. We should do the best we can for each other according to our various systems.

There is no doubt that the concession given on these Wine Duties have been gratefully received in Australia. It has undoubtedly brought assistance to the Australian wine cultivator, a proportion of whom, at any rate, are ex-service men. I was very glad indeed to take a step this year, following on the one we took in 1925. It has had the effect of encouraging the consumption of Australian wines in this country. This has been shown by a notable increase. Apparently, these wines are extremely popular, and a new taste is being cultivated among the public. The consumption of these wines is very considerable and affects the revenue in this respect, and is an integral part of the general policy which we have been pursuing and to which we have set ourselves ever since 1917. It is far better that this policy should be developed, not on the basis of bargaining and hard and fast agreements. Preferences which are given as the result of commercial treaties —as it were, hard and fast agreements—are what I have always called locked bargains. If by any chance there was any reversal of policy at the termination of Parliament to take off the duties by which these preferences were granted—if these preferences were part of a hard and fast bargain—very serious tension might arise. Whereas, if they are given freely on both sides—both doing the best they can for each other—there can be no question of the hands of Parliament being tied in any way, and, at the same time, the currents of inter-Imperial trade flow more steadily in the right direction and that good will on which we must continually rely in our Empire receives a certain fostering assistance.

Mr. MORRIS: The right hon. Gentleman says that the preferences given are not the result of any bargaining between the Mother Country and the Dominions, and that may very well be true. But if this preference be given, as he says, in order to mark the appreciation on the part of the Mother Country of the services rendered by the Dominions during the War, then it becomes highly important that that mark of appreciation is given in such a way that if any later Government by its action reverses the policy of the right hon. Gentleman—and some parties would certainly be pledged to do so—it is not interpreted by the Dominions as meaning that that appreciation no longer exists. This might be the cause of bitter feeling on the part of the Dominions, who might, on their part, charge the Mother Country with a breach of faith. Surely, the Mother Country ought not to express its appreciation by a policy which is not adhered to by other parties of the State. This is a very false policy. It may very well be that these duties may have to be maintained in order to maintain this bond of affection. It is a fallacy of the preference case altogether, that in order to maintain the preference you have to maintain the preference duties. I confess I fall between two allegiances as far as these particular duties are concerned. I have no objection to any duties that increase the price of wines and spirits. If they have the effect of doing so, I have no objection to that result. On the other hand, it is bound to have the effect later on, not of facilitating that good will between the Mother Country but of increasing—if later on another party came into power and there was a reversal of this particular policy—the difficulty. For this reason, I am opposed to the proposal, and regret that these duties have been imposed to give this advantage to the Dominions.

Mr. SCRYMGEOUR: I was wondering, when the right hon. Gentleman referred to the popularity of the importation of Australian wines, whether he had reflected on the other side of the “popularity” picture. I read in the evening papers to-night that a baronet received six months’ imprisonment, and that the Judge told him that if he went in for any more of this drinking he might be rendering himself liable for murder. That raises the question to which the hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. Morris) referred. It is frequently put forward by those who represent the temperance aspect of this question, that they do not object to the imposition of these increased duties on wines if they mean an increased price of the article. I do not follow that line of reasoning at all. If there is anything in the case presented from temperance platforms against the use of intoxicating liquors it means that their production and importation involve national disaster. To talk of binding our Imperial interests together by an agency which necessarily involves national disaster is preposterous, especially from the point of view of the Conservative party, which should be out for the conservation of the best interests of the people. Any revenue which you exact from this prolific source of revenue, no matter what amount comes to the national Exchequer, is, in my opinion, a dead loss in the highest sense of the term.

This trade or industry is one of the mightiest financial powers in the Conservative party. It has the Conservative party tightly in its grip. They will have to break that grip, and other political parties will have to break that grip. Many men who have stood at that Box as Chancellors of the Exchequer have declared that it would be comparatively easy to find all the requisite revenue which might be involved by giving up the revenue which is now derived from intoxicating liquor. Such a policy would give a tremendous impetus to the country at large; it would be one of the most substantial contributions that could be made to the present industrial depression and to the provision of more employment. A bottle of wine is broken on a ship when she is launched. It is used at various times in our everyday life. It is used at the marriage ceremony, and it may be used at the funeral ceremony. Almost inevitably disaster follows in its train. How can any man, speaking with any sense of deep-seated moral responsibility, talk in the way the right hon. Gentleman has about the increasing popularity of an insidious agency which cannot be introduced into the House of Commons without a licence, or into the House or Lords, or into the Lord's House, without involving that trouble which is laid down explicitly by the declaration:

[Mr. Scrymgeour.]

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Mr. VARLEY: I am not animated by the scruples which trouble the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Scrymgeour); mine is a purely business point. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking a narrow survey. He talks with that benign magnanimity which characterised his utterances for a continuation of this preference, but he leaves out of account altogether any question of reciprocity. The hon. Member for Leicester West (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) said something about the origin of preference. I am not sufficiently au fait with the beginnings of preference, but I have always understood, looking at it from the British point of view, that there was something unwritten whereby we had a right to expect reciprocity. We have been told that we are getting a quid pro quo for anything we do, but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer happened to come from the particular district that I do, in which a considerable body of trade is threatened by the action of the Dominions, he would probably consider in any continuation of the policy of Imperial Preference some steps whereby he could bring to the notice of the Dominions the serious effect of their policy upon the idea of Empire. I understand that the Amendment is not to be pushed to a Division, but I hope, as a result of the few words that have been said to-night, that we shall be able to bring to the notice of the Dominion Parliaments the consideration that as Imperial Preference is not founded on a business bargain it cannot be indefinitely continued if we are to expect a continuation of the policy which animates them.

Mr. WILLIAM GRAHAM: My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester West (Mr. Pethick Lawrence) who moved the Amendment, indicated that we did not intend to press it to a Division, but he pointed out one or two considerations which should be kept in view in discussing this matter of preference. I should not have said a single word at all in this Debate but for the line of argument which was, as I think, unfortunately adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman indicated quite clearly that there would be some ingratitude, in the light of the sacrifices made by the Dominions and Colonies during the War, unless this particular policy was pursued and maintained. The hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. Morris) in reply to that said that if any party later in the day in this country, for perfectly sound reasons, wanted to go back on this policy, that the argument regarding war-time gratitude would be reviewed. It is important that we should have on record exactly what we think of a matter of this kind. No one on this side of the House would for a single moment minimise the sacrifices made by any section of the people, wherever they were found, during the War. While we paid the highest tribute to them, it is just as important to make it clear that, in our judgment, if this policy is to be defended at all, it must be on a strictly economic basis. I do not mean in a narrow or niggardly way at all, but on an economic basis which contains a considerable element of generosity to the Dominions and Colonies.

We on this side are, broadly and generally, opposed to tariffism in any shape or form, and, speaking for myself, I am rather inclined to favour Preference as against tariffs, because Preference involves a modification of the tariff system. It involves a reduction of the duties on certain classes of articles, and on that ground it may be defended. But by far the better way in which to state this case from the point of view of the Colonies and Dominions is, in the first place, to relate it to an effort to cultivate what we should call the economic field within the Empire; a problem which excites less division of opinion to-day in this House than at any time in our experience. In the second place, to relate this policy to what is being attempted by the Imperial Economic Committee, and particularly at the present time by the Empire Marketing Board. That is a very much better basis for a proposition of this description, and, accordingly, I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in the argument relating to war-time conditions, with all their hectic and artificial influences, and sought to lay that down as some kind of permanent basis for this proposition. It can never be anything of the kind, and while we on this side of the Committee are not without sympathy, and will not fail in gratitude for the sacrifices made by the Dominions, do not let us land ourselves into a form of false argument upon what is a very simple and plain economic proposition. I think it is our duty to have that on record to-night for the purposes of any Debate which may emerge in the House of Commons when, in the near future, another Government, presumably of our persuasion, is on the other side of the Table.

Mr. McNEILL: I wish to add a very few words to those which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He thought it was necessary to record the opinion of himself and his friends that there should be no element in this preference system of gratitude. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] I understood him to say that it should rest entirely on an economic basis, altogether apart from what we may call the emotional basis. He blamed my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having introduced that element in defence of the system. The party opposite have already given as clear notice as is possible to give, that if they get an opportunity they intend to do away with the system of preference which we stabilised last year. Therefore, it was hardly necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to add to the warning already given. I entirely agree with him that the main basis upon which a system of preference should rest is purely an economic one and, as he knows very well, the party to which I belong, many years before the War, advocated a system of preference or rather of reciprocity to the preference which had already been given by the Dominions and Colonies, on a purely economic basis. We hold very strongly that, apart from any sentimental reasons, a system of preference is calculated better than any other policy we can pursue to develop inter-Imperial trade, especially having regard to the fact which is so often insisted upon that infinitely the best markets for this country in proportion to population are already the Dominions and that the prospects which they hold out are infinitely greater and more favourable to British trade than those of any other form of overseas trade.

Therefore, we can accept the idea that the economic basis is the more important one, but we altogether decline to exclude the other. I did not hear my right hon. Friend's statement on the matter—I was not here at the moment—but I take it from the right hon. Gentleman opposite that my right hon. Friend defended the policy which we are pursuing on the ground of the great services rendered to the Empire by the Dominions. These, he thought, called for some acknowledgment in this respect as in others. I entirely endorse that view in addition to the economic view. It is true that the Dominions for many years past have been giving us a preference for which they have got no reciprocity, and I think, apart from all other views, that the great services which they rendered call for some acknowledgment and, even if it had been necessary, for some sacrifice on our part to meet them in this respect. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has put upon record that we accept that point of view and that we intend to make the preference system a stable one as far as we can do so. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks that the warning he has given will commend him and his party to Dominion opinion—I do not know whether he attaches much importance to it or not—I think he is very much mistaken. What he has said, dissociating himself entirely from the point of view of my right hon. Friend, is not, I think, likely to endear his party to opinion in the Dominions or other parts of the Empire.

Mr. W. GRAHAM: I am sorry to intervene again, but I cannot leave the

[Mr. W. Graham.]

Debate on the note on which the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has concluded his speech. I think I made it perfectly plain that we on this side had the very warmest admiration for the sacrifice made by the Dominions and Colonies and we shall continue to have that admiration but I went on to develop a point, which, apparently, the right hon. Gentleman himself accepts, namely, that we must rest this matter very largely upon an economic basis because here you are dealing, not with a mere few lines in an Act of Parliament, but with proposals which have a profound influence upon business operations in this country. May I say just a word or two in reply to the right hon. Gentleman on the mere point of our recognition of War-time sacrifices by other parts of the Empire. Even if there were no question of preference at all, we make many contributions in other directions and, not least, as the right hon. Gentleman must know, in the sphere of finance. In point of fact the market in this country has within recent times done a great deal for overseas Empire finance and I could go on to cite many other cases in which the people of this country are making contributions. I am not saying very much about it. They are doing it, partly as a duty and partly because they desire to do it. I must however correct at once the impression which would be left by the last few sentences of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. They do not, as I am sure he will agree on reflection, accurately represent our view on this side of the House and I must put that fact beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Miss WILKINSON: We on this side of the House are accustomed to the methods of Debate employed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has left his colleague to "carry on." No one sticks harder to the hard economic facts than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he has those facts on his side, and no one is more capable of throwing in a peroration, or some kind of sentimental appeal, with his tongue in his cheek, and then leaving the matter for other people to criticise when he has gone, than is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Epping (Mr. Churchill). I, therefore, suggest that the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew perfectly well when he made that statement, that this preference which we are giving to the Dominions is no mere generous gesture made because of the deaths of the Dominion and Colonial soldiers in the War. No one knows better than he that it was not so. I am sure he would not insult our Dominions by suggesting that such magnificent sacrifices as were made by these lads who fought at Anzac and Gallipoli, were to be met by some pettifogging duty on wines. They are dead, and they died for an ideal. Are we going to suggest that a pettifogging thing like this, in which neither they nor their families are concerned, which is obviously a bargain, intended as a bargain and never anything else but a market bargain, between two sets of hard-fisted capitalists, is going to be in any sense the reward or recompense for what those boys did during the War? The Chancellor of the Exchequer insults the intelligence of the House of Commons if he imagines that that is the sort of thing we are going to do.

We know, as everybody knows who has followed the discussions at the Imperial Conference or met any of the delegates, that the economic discussions there are as much a question of bargaining as any other kind of market bargaining. In this case, as has always happened in the relations of this country with the Dominions or in our foreign policy, it is not our industrialists but our financiers who are in control. The people who wish to make the London market a favourable venue for floating loans to the Dominions are prepared to sacrifice any of our industrial interests in order to keep the London market as the favourable market for the flotation of Dominion loans. That is exactly what has happened with regard to this preference on wines. Certain of our industries are in very low water indeed. Formerly they had large markets in the Dominions and Colonies, but those markets are now practically closed by prohibitive tariffs. The hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick Lawrence) and the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Varley) represent districts where two of those industries are carried on. The hosiery industry in particular is affected. The Australian tariff, particularly that against every kind of ladies' garment and every kind of knitted fabric, has practically closed that market to this country. It matters nothing that a slight preference is given to us as against America, for example. Compared with the high tariff, the preference is so slight as to mean nothing in practice. The Australian market is practically closed to those goods, except the very highest qualities of them, and the very finest counts, which cannot be manufactured in Australia. Australians with money are prepared to pay the duty in order to have the finest qualities of English goods—though the French compete with us there—but on the cheaper classes of goods, which give the largest amount of employment, especially to women workers, the tariff is prohibitive.

If there was anything in this coming together of the Dominions and ourselves, this question of the extraordinarily high tariff against Hosiery might be brought up at one of those love talks. The right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary says we have to look forward to the future, to a time when we shall get this new, warm homely feeling between the Dominions and ourselves—that if we leave it all to their good will, and say nothing about it, that as a result of these preferences a homely feeling will grow up which will bring about a lessening of these tariffs.

Mr. McNEILL: I did not say anything of the sort, though I have not the least objection to the hon. Lady crediting me with those sentiments.

Miss WILKINSON: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I was not quoting his exact words. What I meant to imply was that that was the line of the right hon. Gentleman's argument—that, looking to the future, we could feel certain that as the result of these preferences trade between the Dominions and ourselves would be increasing. So far as our experience goes, the exact opposite is happening. The Australians are developing their industries and raising tariffs, and are becoming more and more concerned to keep out as far as possible the imports from this country and other countries which compete with their own infant industries. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman is keenly interested in providing employment in this country, is keenly interested in the workers of this country who, after all, put his Government into office, he would do a very good stroke of business for them if he would make it very clear, when next this question comes up for discussion, that if there are going to be preferences—I do not care for these preferences at all—there should be a quid pro quo in the shape of a reduction of the very high tariffs of the Dominions.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 230; Noes, 111.

[Division No. 221.]

AYES.

[9.1 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Albery, Irving James
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W
Atholl, Duchess of
Atkinson, C.
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Bainiel, Lord
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brass, Captain W.
Briscoe, Richard George
Brooklebank, C. E. R.
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.

Buchan, John
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Cassels, J. D.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth.S.)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chapman, Sir S.
Chilcott, Sir Warden
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
Cooper, A. Duff
Cope, Major William
Couper, J. B.
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)

Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Clarence) (Cirencester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dawson, Sir Phillip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Drewe, C.
Eden, Captain Anthony
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
England, Colonel A.
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Fairfax, Captain J. G.
Falle, Sir Bertram G.
Finburgh, S.
Ford, Sir P. J.
Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
Forrest, W.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gadlie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
Ganzoni, Sir John
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton

Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'ith's'w, E)
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Grotian, H. Brent
 Guest, Capt. Rt. Hon. F. E. (Bristol, N.)
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hanbury, C.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Booth)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aymer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 Kindersley, Major G. M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. O.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William

Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Pilcher, G.
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs., Stretford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West- (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)

Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yerks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Spott, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streetfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. G. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Sir Harry Barnston and Mr
 Penny.

NOES.

Adamsen, W. M. (Staffs., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bondfield, Margaret
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, S. (Monmouth, Badwellty)
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)

Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kirkwood, D.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.

Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Maclean, Neil (Glasgow, Govan)
 March, S.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scurr, John
 Shephard, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Widnesbury)
 Smilie, Robert
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees- (Keighley)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Sullivan, Joseph

Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtlo, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)

Weish, J. C.
 Whiteley, W.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)

Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE 'NOES'.—
 Mr. Briant and Mr. Morris.

CLAUSE G.—(Excise Duty on Sweets.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Miss WILKINSON: Can we have some explanation from the Financial Secretary as to what is meant by sweets in this case. I know it does not mean sweets of the feminine sort such as chocolates or eatables, but I would like to know if the term includes as sweets such things as unfermented fruit juice and wines.

Mr. McNEILL: The word "sweets" has been defined under the Finance Act of 1910, as follows:

"The expression 'sweets' means any liquor which is made from fruit and sugar, or from fruit and sugar mixed with any other material which has undergone a process of fermentation in the manufacture thereof, and includes British wines, made wines, mead, and metheglin."

In case the hon. Member does not understand the last two terms, I may explain that they are ancient drinks made of honey which at one time were very popular in this country.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 230;
 Noes, 113.

Division No. 222].

AYES.

[9.12 p.m.]

Apland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Albery, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Apsley, Lord
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atholl, Duchess of
 Atkinson, C.
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Baldwin, Lord
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.
 Brass, Captain W.
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth. S.)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
 Cooper, A. Duff

Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Dalketh, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
 Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Forrest, W.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Colonel Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w. E.)
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Griotian, H. Brent
 Guest, Capt. Rt. Hon. F. E. (Bristol, N.)
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hanbury, C.

Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Col. Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 Kindersley, Major Guy M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lucas, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.

Meyer, Sir Frank
Milne, J. S. Wardlaw-
Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
Moreing, Captain A. H.
Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
Murchison, Sir Kenneth
Nelson, Sir Frank
Neville, Sir Reginald J.
Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
Oman, Sir Charles William C.
Pennefather, Sir John
Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
Perkins, Colonel E. K.
Perring, Sir William George
Pilscher, G.
Pownall, Sir Assheton
Price, Major C. W. M.
Radford, E. A.
Raine, Sir Walter
Rawson, Sir Cooper
Rees, Sir Beddoe
Reid, D. D. (County Down)
Remer, J. R.
Rentoul, G. S.

Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
Rice, Sir Frederick
Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs., Stretford)
Ropner, Major L.
Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
Rye, F. G.
Salmon, Major I.
Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
Sandeman, N. Stewart
Sanders, Sir Robert A.
Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
Savery, S. S.
Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
Shepperson, E. W.
Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
Smith, R. W. (Aber'd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
Smith-Carlinton, Neville W.
Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Streatfeild, Captain S. R.
Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
Suter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
Templeton, W. P.
Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
Tilne, J. A.
Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
Wallace, Captain D. E.
Ward, Lt.-Col. A.L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
Wells, S. R.
Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern,
Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
Wise, Sir Fredric
Withers, John Jamer
Womersley, W. J.
Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Major Sir Harry Barnston and Mr.
Penny.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Bondfield, Margaret
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Briant, Frank
Broad, F. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Clowes, S.
Cluse, W. S.
Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
Connolly, M.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gilliet, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)

Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kirkwood, D.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
MacLaren, Andrew
Maclean, Neil (Glasgow, Govan)
March, S.
Morris, R. H.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Mosley, Oswald
Murnin, H.
Naylor, T. E.
Pallin, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.

Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
Rose, Frank H.
Salter, Dr. Alfred
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Smillie, Robert
Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
Snell, Harry
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Phillip
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, I. (St. Rollox)
Sullivan, J.
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Townend, A. E.
Varley, Frank B.
Viant, S. P.
Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Welsh, J. C.
Wiggins, William Martin
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, East)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Mr. Whiteley and Mr. B. Smith.

CLAUSE 7.—(Duties and drawbacks on tobacco.)

Mr. MOSLEY: I beg to move, in page 4, line 4, after the word "twenty-seven," to insert the words "until the twelfth day of April, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight."

During a previous stage of this Measure, hon. and right hon. Friends of mine argued with very great force, and their arguments were never answered, that this new Tobacco Duty constitutes a very clear instance of that class and discriminating taxation which the present Government, throughout its tenure of office, has seen fit to impose. Figures produced by the Colwyn Committee were adduced in those Debates to show that the Tobacco Duty was in fact levied in almost exactly inverse proportion to the ability to pay, and, with this wealth of new facts and new figures in support of those contentions, the Government spokesmen found it somewhat difficult to answer those broad considerations. On a limited Amendment of the character of that which I am now moving, it will, perhaps, be more appropriate if I deal with the precise operation of this tax as experience has shown its development to date, and as we may anticipate its future operation for the rest of this year.

At a previous stage of this Measure, I drew the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the possibility, and, indeed, as it seemed to be, the fact, that the great tobacco companies, in respect at least of pipe tobacco, were actually making additional profits on the excuse of handing on taxation to the consumer. That argument was based upon the fact that, after tobacco has entered this country, extra moisture is added to the tobacco during the process of manufacture. That is not an illegitimate operation in itself; it is a necessary operation to render the tobacco fit for smoking. But it appears from this fact that, when extra moisture is added during the process of manufacture, the tobacco has increased in bulk when it is handed over the counter for sale to the consumer. Tobacco is imported into this country with a moisture content of some 10 per cent. on an average. During the process of manufacture, an extra 20 per cent. of moisture, in the low-grade tobaccos, is added. It is thus apparent that, for 16 ounces of tobacco which enter the country, and on which the great companies pay tax to the Exchequer, they actually sell 19 ounces of tobacco over the counter to the consumer, and from this consideration arises the substantial point that if, in respect of each ounce of tobacco which they sell, the big companies are handing on the $\frac{1}{2}$ d. of taxation per ounce which they pay to the Exchequer in respect of the original tobacco which they introduce, they are, in fact, handing on to the consumer even more than the amount which they have paid to the Exchequer.

The right hon. Gentleman challenged the whole basis of my argument by telling me that I laboured under entire ignorance of the facts, and that I was under a misapprehension as to the whole process of the manufacture of tobacco. But, unfortunately for the right hon. Gentleman, an authority of the very highest character saw fit to animadvert upon his observations in a letter to the "Times." Sir Arthur Tedder wrote a letter to the "Times" which entirely destroyed the fabric of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, and, to my great surprise, I found that I was quite right and the right hon. Gentleman was quite wrong. Sir Arthur Tedder is an authority on this subject. He was Chief Inspector of Excise and Customs from 1906 to 1911, and a Commissioner of Customs and Excise from 1911 to 1918; and, as he entered the Inland Revenue Department originally in the year 1871, his knowledge and authority on these subjects are probably second to none in the country. It might be worth while reading this very brief letter of comment on the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. He wrote to the "Times" in the following terms:

"In your report of the Debate upon the Budget Resolutions on Wednesday, Mr. McNeill, replying for the Government, is stated to have made the following remarks on the subject of the Tobacco Duty:

'The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mosley) spoke about moisture being added. There was never any addition of moisture. Tobacco leaf naturally contained moisture. It was a question, not so much of adding moisture as of eliminating it.'

Sir Arthur proceeds to comment on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman:

"It is a pity that the Minister should have been so ignorant of the facts."

Civil servants are accustomed to the use of euphemistic language, and he proceeds to suggest to the Minister that he might look at the article on tobacco in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" for some elementary information on the subject. Sir Arthur proceeds:

"Added moisture is an absolute necessity in the manufacture of tobacco; it is not added simply for the purpose of profit; the law, however, steps in to safeguard the consumer by limiting the percentage of moisture which may remain in the tobacco when ready for sale."

In another letter Sir Arthur points out that when the tobacco enters the country it contains about 10 per cent., while in the process of manufacture some further 20 per cent. is added, making a moisture content of 30 per cent. Let us observe

[Mr. Mosley.] the actual effect of this process. We are told, and it was generally admitted in the Debate on the Budget Resolutions, that in respect of pipe tobacco, anyhow, the full extra tax of 8d. a lb or a halfpenny per ounce had been handed on to the consumer. The right hon. Gentleman did not make any excuse or attempt to defend the position of the Government in this matter. He said it was perfectly right that indirect taxation should be handed on to the consumer, and that was what indirect taxation was for. It is true that in another portion of his speech he tried to pooh-pooh that, saying that in respect of cigarettes it had not been handed on but had been paid by the companies. But in trying to have the best of both worlds, he admitted that it was probable and just that the taxation had been handed on. In relation to pipe tobacco, at any rate, it was universally admitted that the whole tax of one halfpenny per ounce had been handed on to the consumer.

If that be so, it means that these companies are making large extra profits, because the Treasury have seen fit to tax tobacco. See how it works out. The tobacco comes in at the port, and a tax of 8d. per lb. is imposed on it when it contains only 10 per cent. of moisture. During the process of manufacture, that 16 ounces is transformed into 19 ounces. If that 19 ounces is then handed over to the consumer with an extra charge of one halfpenny per ounce, the company is getting back from the consumer 9½d. in respect of that 19 ounces for every 8d. which it has paid out in respect of the original 16 ounces imported. Thus, on every pound of tobacco, as a result of this taxation, if my argument be correct, the companies are making an extra 1½d. profit. It is very easy by a simple calculation to show how greatly augmented the profits of the companies must be on this basis. Every penny of this taxation brings in £425,000, that is to say, each penny per lb. Therefore, the extra 1½d. per lb. would bring in an extra profit of £637,000.

That is a most extraordinary situation. It really is a most extraordinary condition of affairs if the imposition of the tax, which the right hon. Gentleman suggests the consumer should properly pay, is made the subject of extra profits for the great companies at the expense of the unfortunate consumer by whom the additional tax has already been paid, and the Government have no remedy or device to deal with profiteering of this kind. This actual consideration of the operation of the tax seems most appropriate to this Amendment, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to deal in detail with it and, after consulting the Encyclopædia Britannica, with rather more information than was in his possession last time, and that he may be able to tell us whether, in his opinion, this profiteering is actually taking place and what measures he can suggest to arrest its progress. I am sorry that we have had in regard to this Debate to summon to our aid in the public Press the weight and authority of ex-civil servants to correct the information of the right hon. Gentleman, and I trust that after perusing that letter, and after consulting with his expert advisers, he is now in a position to correct his previous misapprehension, and to inform the Committee upon the subject which is committed to his charge.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Committee will realise that the actual Amendment is a somewhat narrow point as to whether the tax should be an annual one instead of a permanent one, but I have allowed the hon. Member to speak on the whole Clause, as it may meet the wishes of the Committee to discuss it on this Amendment rather than on Clause 7 standing part of the Bill.

Mr. MOSLEY: On a point of Order. I endeavoured specifically to confine my observations to the operation of the tax with a view to suggesting that it should have a limited period of trial, as suggested in the Amendment. I was very careful not to deal with any broad question of principle, which I thought would be raised by other of my hon. Friends on the question of the Clause as a whole, and I merely dealt with the operation of the tax on administrative grounds.

Mr. STEPHEN MITCHELL: It is not often that I intervene in these Debates, but I feel compelled to-night to speak on this Clause dealing with tobacco, and I do so for two reasons, first, because it is probably well known to some hon. Members that by birth, and formerly by occupation, I am not unconnected with the tobacco trade, and, secondly, because I wish to correct some rather inaccurate statements, doubtless unintentional, but foolish, made in the Debate on the Budget dealing with the tobacco question. I wish to be perfectly fair, and to say that these inaccuracies to which I refer were not confined by any manner of means to any one side of the Committee. They were doubtless made partly through ignorance and partly through Members not taking the trouble to confirm the information they had received or the rumours which they had heard. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given a gigantic bill for the tobacco world to face. This bill, undoubtedly, could, quite honestly and logically, have been passed on to the consumer, but I am glad to say that to the very large extent of some 75 per cent. this bill is being footed by tobacco manufacturers, and the pocket of the consumer is being saved to this extent.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has imposed an additional tax of some 8d. per pound, bringing the total duty on tobacco up to 8s. 10d. Now we see at a glance that this works out at about 6½d. per ounce of duty, and this has got to be paid long before the tobacco can be brought into the factories in order to be manufactured. I wonder if the Committee realises how much this duty amounts to in the case of the popular brands of cigarettes sold at 10 for 6d. I think it might interest them if I told them. For example, on the popular brands of cigarettes sold at 10 for 6d., the amount of duty is very nearly 3d. per packet, and in the case of the cigarettes sold at 10 for 4d. the duty amounts to approximately 2d. per packet. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when dealing with the question of the Tobacco Duty, made two predictions. With the first I agree, but with the second I strongly disagree. The first prediction was this. He said:

"I may add that I have no reason to believe that the whole increase of this tax will be passed on to the consumer."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 11th April, 1927; col. 93, Vol. 205.]

The right hon. Gentleman's hopes have been fully realised, and our large manufacturers of cigarettes, generally speaking, have made no alteration whatever in the price or size or quality of their cigarettes, and they have stated so frankly and boldly in the Press. The cigarette trade of this country is approximately 75 per cent. of the total tobacco trade, and I estimate that this piece of generosity or, shall I say, patriotism, on the part of the tobacco manufacturers is undoubtedly going to cost the tobacco trade some millions of pounds per annum.

The second prediction which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made was this, that this increase of 8d. per lb. on raw tobacco would bring him in an additional income of £3,400,000 per annum. I disagree with that entirely, and I think that this additional tax will produce in a full year in the neighbourhood of £1,400,000 per annum, that is, if there is no reduction made in the consumption. I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer can anticipate a reduction in the consumption. I cannot conceive that any Chancellor of the Exchequer would impose an additional duty with a view to stifling consumption. Unfortunately, it has been necessary to increase the cost of pipe tobacco, for reasons which are very obvious and into which I will not go. It is extremely hard lines on the pipe smoker and on the man who is, unfortunately, earning a very low rate of wage, but I think the tobacco manufacturers can be exonerated from all blame. They have shouldered this additional burden of taxation which the Chancellor is imposing to the extent of some 75 per cent., and they are leaving only some 25 per cent. to be borne by the public.

With all due respect to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on this occasion as far as tobacco is concerned, I do not think he has been guided by very expert or skilful advisers. A different decision on his part would have saved the pipe smoker from sharing the burden with the tobacco manufacturer. I am not a very old man, but I well remember the day when the rate of the Tobacco Duty was 3s. per lb., or 2½d. per ounce, whereas to-day it is 8s. 10d. per lb., or approximately 6½d. per ounce. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to realise what has happened in the past, and that following over-taxation on whiskey and on expensive wines and expensive cigars, there is no doubt that the consumption of these articles has been greatly retarded. I think the right hon. Gentleman took a very bold line when he increased the Tobacco Duty. It could quite well have been passed on by the tobacco manufacturers to the consumer, but on this occasion the tobacco manufacturers have seen him through. But I wish, with all due respect, to warn the Chancellor that tobacco is not like the widow's cruse of oil; it has its limits. For many years the Tobacco Duty has been the goose which has laid many a golden egg for the Treasury. In these days, we hear much about the intensive system of egg production, but I hope that in the future the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not overstrain the vitality of that goose, and I warn him that the most prolific goose we know in the tobacco world, namely, the Gold Flake goose, may even succumb to the great strain which he is placing on her reproductive powers.

[Mr. S. Mitchell.]

I would like now to deal with one or two statements which have been made by hon. Members, which, I think, are somewhat inaccurate. The hon. Member for Springburn (Mr. Hardie), speaking on 27th April, said:

"I was talking to my tobacconist this morning, and he told me that they were reducing not only the length but the circumference of the cigarettes, and were adding more moisture. He told me that there had been a big addition of moisture to cigarettes."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 27th April, 1927; col. 911, Vol. 205.]

That statement is absolutely absurd. Many days prior to that date practically all the large tobacco manufacturers had broadcast through the Press that there would be absolutely no alteration in the quality, size, or price of any of their cigarettes. As far as cigarettes are concerned, the character of their manufacture absolutely prohibits the possibility of adding increased moisture consistent with good smoking qualities. I would have thought it was perfectly obvious to most hon. Members that if you were to add excessive moisture to cigarettes, the delicate paper of which they are manufactured would be badly stained and the paste would not adhere. The hon. Member for Springburn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he did not fix a percentage of moisture in sales. I can assure the Committee that for generations past there has always been a limit set for the moisture at which tobacco may be sold, and any party exceeding that moisture limit is heavily fined. I can assure the Committee that the Excise officers are very vigilant in looking after the interests of the Treasury most carefully in this respect. I wish to refer to a matter which has already been raised by the hon. Member for Smethwick (Mr. Mosley) in regard to a statement which was made by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman made the following statement:

"He (Mr. Mosley) spoke about moisture in certain proportions being added. As far as I understand, there was never any addition of moisture, though I will not say it is never done; but the main thing is that the tobacco leaf has natural moisture in it. Hon. Members do not seem to be aware of that fact."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 27th April, 1927; cols. 916-917, Vol. 205.]

With all due respect to my right hon. Friend, I think that is a somewhat misleading statement. I know quite well that it is purely an error, but I wish to refer to it, because moisture is always added to tobacco in the process of manufacture. It always has been, and it always will be. Tobacco, generally speaking, imported into this country contains moisture of between 10·5 to 11 per cent. If you attempted to manufacture tobacco in that state, it would simply crumble up into atoms. Even if it were possible to manufacture it, the tobacco would not smoke; it would simply burn out in no time. As far as I can see, there are very few Members of this House who seem to have much knowledge in regard to moisture. They do not seem to realise that practically every material contains moisture, and that material which one would consider absolutely bone dry contains a considerable amount of moisture. Take, for example, the massive oak box on the Treasury Bench. It would surprise hon. Members to know that that box, made of well-seasoned wood, probably contains moisture to the extent of 8 per cent. The right hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden), the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 27th April, said:

"I shall show in a moment that it is not correct or true that the great bulk of this increased duty on tobacco is not being passed on to the consumer."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 27th April, 1927; col. 867, Vol. 205.]

The right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer for nine or ten months and he, obviously, has a knowledge of the various sources of taxation. He ought to know that the cigarette trade of this country is in the neighbourhood of 75 per cent. of the total tobacco trade. Days before he made that statement he must have seen in the newspapers a statement broadcast by practically all the tobacco manufacturers that there was to be no alteration in the size, quality or price of their cigarettes. There may be some isolated cases, perhaps in some of the more expensive lines, or there may be an isolated case of a small tobacco manufacturer making a slight alteration, but I can assure the Committee that that is only a bagatelle, and may be discounted. The right hon. Gentleman produced in this House two cigarettes presumably of the same brand, one which we presume was manufactured before the Budget and one after, and he stated that the cigarette manufactured after the Budget was about one-eighth of an inch shorter than the one manufactured before the Budget. After the clear and frank statement which was made in the Press by important and leading tobacco manufacturers in this country it was a little unjust on the part of the right hon. Gentleman not to state in this House what brand of cigarette it was or the firm that manufactured it. My further comment is, that if an alteration has been made in any popular brand of cigarettes such as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, then its doom is sealed. But it may have been a cigarette of one of the more expensive brands which is generally smoked by the class of people known to the right hon. Gentleman as the idle rich.

I wish further to refer to a statement made by the hon. Member for Camlachie (Mr. Stephen). I am sorry that he is not in his place. He said, with regard to the Chancellor of the Exchequer:

"He tries to tell us that this tax is not going to the consumer. He knows it is going to the consumer, and the probability is that not only will there be a large tax on the consumer but the Imperial Tobacco Company will take advantage of the shortening of the cigarette just to take a little bit of commission on the tax."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 27th April, 1927; col. 890, Vol. 205.]

I can assure the Committee and the hon. Gentleman, if he will read the OFFICIAL REPORT to-morrow, that not only have the Imperial Tobacco Company not increased the price but that they have not shortened the cigarette. In this case, and possibly in many other cases, the hon. Member for Camlachie has proved himself to be a false prophet. During the Debate we have heard a good many complaints that the rich man's smoke has not had additional duty passed on to it; that it has not been passed on to the consumer of the Havanna cigar. I would remind the Committee that the increased duty on tobacco amounts to 8d. per pound, while the increased duty on Havanna cigars has been made to the extent of 1s. 3d. a pound. Whether or not it has been passed on to the consumer I cannot say. Another complaint has been made that a good deal of money has been made by tobacco manufacturers clearing tobacco out of bond prior to the Budget. That is not the case. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is much too wise to allow that, and the Customs authorities rationed the amount of tobacco which could be drawn out of bond for many weeks prior to the Budget. Another complaint is that the price of cigarettes is at the same figure as in War time. I would remind the Committee that the duty at the present time is 8d. higher than in War time and that, nevertheless, the prices of the popular brands of cigarettes remain the same and the same size.

I should like to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on continuing and increasing the preferential rate given to tobacco grown in the Empire. Tobacco grown within the Empire and manufactured in this country for the year ending October amounted to the very large quantity of approximately 18,000,000 pounds, an increase on last year of about 5,000,000 pounds. That is approximately one-seventh of the total amount of tobacco consumed in this country in any one year. That means that at the present time we are purchasing 18,000,000 pounds weight of tobacco from the Empire which would otherwise be purchased from foreign countries. I would have preferred had the Chancellor of the Exchequer left the duty where it was, and I have no doubt that the pipe smoker would have preferred that but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a difficult job. He has to make arrangements to pay for the general strike and he has to make arrangements to pay for the strike in the coal industry. But in order to meet abnormal conditions, this Clause is going to have my full support. One thing to which I would like to refer is the statement made by the hon. Member for Smethwick (Mr. Mosley) who stated that tobacco manufacturers were making abnormal profits over the moisture. I grant you, and I said it in the House, that there is a certain amount of moisture added to tobacco, which is bound to increase its weight. The hon. Member must remember this—when you manufacture a pound of tobacco you do not sell 16 ounces. You have to take the stem out of the tobacco which is approximately 18 per cent. You have a certain amount of natural dust and sand in the tobacco, and when you sell it you have a certain amount of the “turn of the scale.” So that you cannot sell 16 ounces out of one pound of tobacco. I grant that if you take out the stem, sand and dust, you get a rebate for that, but you make a loss. I am sorry I have detained the House so long.

[Mr. S. Mitchell.]

Mr. McNEILL: I confess I have some doubt as to whether I ought to attempt to reply to the Amendment that is on the Order Paper, and which has been formally moved, or to say anything about either of the speeches which have been delivered—either that of my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark (Mr. S. Mitchell) or that of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, neither of which had any relation to the Amendment. My best plan will be to do a little of both. First of all, may I point out the disadvantage that would occur if the Amendment itself were accepted—the Amendment to which the Mover did not refer at all? The increase of the duty which we hope to gain by this Clause is estimated at rather over £3,000,000 in the current year, but I think it must be clear that if, as the Amendment proposes, it were decided to make that only for one year, we should certainly not raise within a considerable margin the amount we estimated to receive—for this very obvious reason, that an expectation would be held out that possibly next year an alteration might be made that this additional duty would not be continued. The consequence would be that there would be, probably, a very large holding up of tobacco shortly before the end of the financial year. Considering that over 1,000,000 pounds weight would reduce this year's revenue by very nearly £500,000—£420,000—and the weekly clearances of unmanufactured tobacco amount, approximately, to 2,500,000 pounds, it would be quite possible that the postponement that would be encouraged by this Amendment, if it were carried out, would amount to a very considerable sum.

Further, I think it is quite clear that we cannot accept the Amendment, and I do not think the Committee should have any hesitation about rejecting it, seeing that the Mover has not 10.0 p.m. thought it necessary to say a word in its favour. The reason the hon. Member could not find time to say anything about his own Amendment was that he was enjoying himself so much over pointing out what he believed to be a mistake that had been made by me on a former occasion. That evidently caused him a great deal of enjoyment. He pointed out that a great authority on these subjects wrote a letter to the “Times” saying that an observation of mine in the Debate on the Budget Resolution was a mistake. If I recollect rightly, the observation I made, to which he dissented, was that I said moisture had to be extracted from tobacco, not added to it. Well, my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark has also pointed out that this is an error. But I regret to say I am not young enough to be ashamed of making a mistake. I wish I were. It is only the youngest of us who are infallible, and I can very well comfort myself with a very familiar story about a gentleman I might introduce to his notice called Dr. Johnson. He, on one occasion, was asked by somebody how he came to have made such a mistaken statement, and he replied, “Sheer ignorance, Madam, sheer ignorance.” I do not want to diminish in the smallest degree the satisfaction of the hon. Gentleman with which he has convicted me of being sheerly ignorant on the question of the manufacture of tobacco. It was quite apparent I was, and I stand here in a white sheet. I now confess that moisture is added to tobacco and not taken from tobacco, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will feel he has had a real, comfortable parliamentary triumph this evening.

But my satisfaction does not quite end there. The hon. Member took his cue from the gentleman who wrote to the “Times”—a gentleman who said, it is perfectly true, that it was a pity that the Financial Secretary was so ignorant. I quite agree. Then this gentleman went on, and the hon. Member endorsed it, by saying I could not do better than gain:

some information about the process of the manufacture of tobacco by reading the eleventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. That gives me great satisfaction, because several years have passed since I was one of the editors of that book, and I am bound to admit that although I took part in editing that great work of reference, I cannot pretend in any way to have assimilated the whole of the knowledge contained in that work. But I am delighted to find that, although many years have passed, the book is still of such commanding authority that it is quoted in Parliament by the hon. Member. The only other observation with which the hon. Member has honoured me was a reference to what he called my inconsistency with regard to the passing of the duty to the consumer. As a matter of fact, on this occasion I was perfectly correct. The proposition is a simple one—and I notice also in a letter to the "Times" by another gentleman, that the proposition is really a simple one—that the natural incidence of indirect taxation is that it is passed on to the consumer.

I said, perfectly consistently, when discussing this Budget Resolution, that, so far as our anticipations went, so far as tobacco was concerned, or, at any rate, the larger part of it in its most popular form, it would not in consequence of the duty be passed on to the consumer. Both these things have actually happened. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark, with his great authority on these matters, has said, up to this time, in the price, quality and size of the cigarettes, which account for some 70 per cent. or more of the total amount of tobacco smoked, there has been no alteration. On the other hand, it is quite true that there has been a considerable alteration in the price of the higher-priced cigars and a small addition in the price of pipe tobacco. But it remains true, as I said, that the popularly-smoked tobacco has not been affected by the duty. The hon. Member made an elaborate calculation which, to his own satisfaction, proved that very large sums were being made, in consequence of the duty, as additional profit by the manufacturers, his argument being based upon the assumption that 16 ounces of unmanufactured tobacco would, by the addition of moisture, produce 19 ounces of finished tobacco.

I do not think there is anything inaccurate in his calculation if his data were correct; but if his calculation, which he worked out as showing an extra profit of £637,000 a year, were correct, the manufacturers would be selling in the year about 128,000,000 lb. of tobacco at an increased price of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. an ounce, and containing 15 per cent. of added water. But that state of things does not occur. The total consumption of tobacco is, approximately, 140,000,000 lbs. a year, and it is estimated that about 70 per cent. of this consists of cigarettes which, if my information be correct, on the average do not contain even as much as 5 per cent. of added moisture over the natural moisture of the raw leaf. Of the remainder of the tobacco consumed, some 40,000,000 lbs., it is only some of the inferior varieties which contain as much added water as the 15 per cent. which the hon. Member made the basis of his calculations. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that nothing approaching 120,000,000 lbs. of tobacco is sold which contains 15 per cent. of added moisture. The quantity is much smaller. Consequently, the figure of £637,000 a year of added profit has little or no relation to the facts. I do not know if it is necessary for me to follow my hon. Friend in his very interesting and very authoritative exposition of the tobacco position. I do not know whether I shall be called upon to discuss it at any future stage. We have had a very exhaustive examination of the whole position on this Amendment, the actual purpose of which is merely to make this an annual tax. At the present time, I must merely content myself with pointing out that we cannot possibly accept the Amendment as it stands, and that the strictures which have been passed upon my own conduct and observations in the past, although correct up to a certain point, really have nothing to do with the business before the House.

Mr. HARRIS: We have just heard a very interesting confession from the right hon. Gentleman, and I congratulate him upon it. May I say that I would like to congratulate the hon. Member for Lanark on his very excellent and informative speech. Most of the facts which he stated to the Committee are those which he has of his own knowledge and they can be accepted. It is quite clear that, in the case of the cheap cigarettes, the extra duty has not been passed on. The hon. Member, with a certain amount of justification, claimed credit for various tobacco manufacturers for their patriotic action. But I think we want to dig a little deeper. I am afraid that we cannot quite give all this credit to the unselfishness of the great tobacco trade. It is common knowledge, and I have taken the trouble to confirm these statements, that there has been a tobacco war. The big combine, or trust, bought up most of the big tobacco factories and are waging war on one or two of the other firms. Some tobacco firms announced in the newspapers that they were to bear the whole of the burden and not pass it on to the public, and the big combine was forced to follow suit. I am not certain that it was all altruism. I am informed and I think my information is correct, that there is a great desire on the part of the combine to take advantage of this opportunity to drive out of existence some of the small manufacturers who have been striving in the last few years to keep their heads above water. While some of the big combines are making big profits, some of these factories have a hard struggle. I am not sure, if this tax is kept on, that, when some of these people have been knocked out, in due course this tax will be passed on to the public either by increased price or short weight. But it was not of cigarettes that I wanted to speak. It is very unfortunate that the chief burden of this tax has to be borne, as usual, by the people who are least able to bear it. In every case, these new taxes have been born by the poorest people in the community, the men with the lowest wages, the agricultural labourers, the men with large families, the men who smoke the cheap tobacco.

[Mr. Harris.]

I find in my own constituency, and I think it will be the usual in the East End of London, that a popular tobacco is one which is known as British Oak. It is manufactured by one of the component parts of the Tobacco Trust, Lambert and Butler, and it used to be sold at 4½d. a packet. It still can be bought at some places at 4½d., which means that the 8d. per lb. increase is passed on to the consumer. I have the label. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to see it. It is an interesting exhibit. We are getting accustomed to making exhibits. We are constantly having articles taxed, and we have to produce evidence in illustration of our arguments. In most cases what has happened is that the old price of 4½d. a packet has been retained. The "ounce" has been marked out in ink and above the "4½d. an ounce" have been put the words "1/34th of a lb." In other words, the quantity has been reduced; the price has been retained, and short weight has been given. There is no deception. It is quite plain what is being done, though the ordinary working man does not notice the "1/34th of a lb." That means that instead of the consumer paying 8d. a pound he is actually paying 9d. a pound. The Committee ought to realise that that sort of thing is going on. It would be a great pity to think that the ordinary working man who buys cheap tobacco is not feeling the burden of the duty. To think that would be misleading both the tobacco consumer and the Committee.

I wanted, for a moment, to support what the hon. Member for Smethwick (Mr. Mosley) said about the amount of moisture in tobacco. I have taken the trouble to inquire into the subject, and I find that what is really happening is that, as the Financial Secretary pointed out, 10 per cent. of moisture is allowed by the Customs on the importation of tobacco. I am informed that in the case of the higher qualities it is impossible to add much moisture because the tobacco would go mouldy, but the cheap tobacco, the very tobacco in this package, the homely shag of the ordinary working man, will stand moisture without deterioration, and in almost every case something like 22 per cent. of moisture is added. So in the cheap tobaccos not only is the consumer paying, but it is true to say, as the hon. Member said, that the big tobacco manufacturers are not only making their ordinary profit but are making some extra profit on the duty, in the fact that the moisture is added and the price remains the same. For that reason, I think it is very unfortunate that, as in the case of all the new taxes, the brunt of the burden is being borne, not by the well-to-do, but by the poorest of the community.

Mr. GROTRIAN: I should like to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he can get more revenue by decreasing the duty. I, of course, refer to Havana cigars. In 1899, the revenue obtained was £604,000. In 1916, when the duty had gone up to 10s. 6d. a lb., the amount of revenue obtained had fallen to £453,000. In 1921, when the duty had been again raised to 15s. 7d. a lb., the revenue had fallen still further to £322,700. Those figures show conclusively that as you put the duty up the amount of revenue goes down. The reason is obvious. When the rate of duty was not more than 10s. 6d. a lb. the bulk of the Havana cigars sold in this country were retailed a 6d. a piece. Now, when you have a duty of 15s. 7d., the duty on each cigar amounts to 2·4d., which, of course, renders it quite impossible to sell it at 6d. It is a curious thing that you do not get an increase in the British-made cigar as you drive the Havana cigar out of the market, because, for some reason or other, they seem to rise and fall together. When one goes down, the other goes down. I do not know why that is, quite, but the figures show that it is so. Instead of endeavouring to get more revenue by trying to drive people on to pipe smoking—in spite of certain eminent examples of that virtue or habit—I think we ought to try and get more revenue out of the poor Havana cigar smoker, and the only way to make him disgorge more revenue is by putting down the rate of duty.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 128; Noes, 264.

Division No. 223.]

AYES.

[10.23 p.m.]

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Bondfield, Margaret
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Briant, Frank
Broad, F. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Clowes, S.
Cluse, W. S.
Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
Connolly, M.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Crawford, H. E.
Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Duckworth, John
Dunnico, H.
Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
England, Colonel A.
Fenby, T. D.
Forrest, W.
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)

Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Harris, Percy A.
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
Hudson, J. H. Huddersfield
Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kirkwood, D.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
MacLaren, Andrew
Maclean, Neil (Glasgow, Govan)
March, S.
Morris, R. H.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Mosley, Oswald
Murnin, H.
Naylor, T. E.
Pain, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Rees, Sir Beddoe
Riley, Ben

Ritson, J.
Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
Rose, Frank H.
Salter, Dr. Alfred
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Sitch, Charles H.
Smillie, Robert
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Smith, H. B. Lees (Keighley)
Snell, Harry
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Strauss, E. A.
Sullivan, Joseph
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Townend, A. E.
Varley, Frank B.
Viant, S. P.
Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
Wellock, Wilfred
Welsh, J. C.
Wiggins, William Martin
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Donbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr. Whiteley.

NOES.

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
Albery, Irving James
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.

Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Atholl, Duchess of
Atkinson, C.

Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Bainiel, Lord
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.

Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.
 Brass, Captain W.
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newby)
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cayer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Preston, S.)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Charles, Brigadier-General J.
 Chilcott, Sir Warden
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clarry, Reginald George
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Colfox, Major Wm. Phillips
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)

Grotman, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hanbury, C.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warwick, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberland, Whiteh'n)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen't)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Capt. D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meller, R. J.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Morden, Colonel Walter Grant
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (Petersfield)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)

O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Pilcher, G.
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs, Stretford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (Widsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberdeen & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Storry-Deans, R.
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Suggden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northorn)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'ge & Hyde)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Captain Viscount Curzon and Mr.
 Penny.

Motion made, and Question put, The Committee divided: Ayes, 265; "That the Clause stand part of the Noes, 127. Bill."

Division No. 224.]

AYES.

[10.32 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Alberty, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Apsley, Lord
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atholl, Duchess of
 Atkinson, C.
 Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Bainiel, Lord
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.
 Brass, Captain W.
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brookiebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
 Burlock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth. S.)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
 Chilcott, Sir Warden
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clarry, Reginald George
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Colfox, Major William Phillips
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Derfend)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drews, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Ellis, R. G.

Elveden, Viscount
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forester-Walker, Sir L.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Ganzoni, Sir John
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Grotrian, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hanbury, C.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Capt. H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hudson, R. S. (Cumberl'nd, Whiteh'n)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 Kindsley, Major G. M.
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. O.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)

Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meller, R. J.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Morden, Colonel Walter Grant
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (P'tsf'ld.)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Pilcher, G.
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Robinson, Sir T. (Lancs, Stretford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith-Carlinton, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.

Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Storry-Deans, R.
Streatfield, Captain S. R.
Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
Suter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
Suggden, Sir Wilfrid
Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
Tinne, J. A.
Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement

Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
Wallace, Captain D. E.
Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
Wells, S. R.
Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl

Wise, Sir Fredric
Withers, John James
Womersley, W. J.
Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
Wood, E. (Chest'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich, W.)
Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES—
Captain Viscount Curzon and Mr.
Penny.

NOES.

Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Bondfield, Margaret
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Briant, Frank
Broad, F. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Clowes, S.
Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
Connolly, M.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Crawford, H. E.
Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Duckworth, John
Dunnico, H.
Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
England, Colonel A.
Fenby, T. D.
Forrest, W.
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Ham'ton)
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydfil)

Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Harris, Percy A.
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hore-Belisha, Leslie
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Kirkwood, D.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.
MacLaren, Andrew
Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
March, S.
Morris, R. H.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Mosley, Oswald
Murnin, H.
Naylor, T. E.
Pain, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Ponsonby, Arthur
Potts, John S.
Rees, Sir Beddoe
Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.

Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
Rose, Frank H.
Salter, Dr. Alfred
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Sitch, Charles H.
Smillie, Robert
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
Snell, Harry
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart J. (St. Rollox)
Strauss, E. A.
Sullivan, J.
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Townend, A. E.
Varley, Frank B.
Viant, S. P.
Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
Wellock, Wilfred
Welsh, J. C.
Wiggins, William Martin
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
Whiteley.

CLAUSE 8.—(Increased duty on matches.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope):
I think it will be convenient if we take a general discussion on this Amendment as we did in the case of the last Clause.

Mr. LEES-SMITH: I beg to move, in page 4, line 28, after the words "twenty-seven," to insert the words "until the twelfth day of April, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight."

This is the Clause which imposes the extra duty upon matches, and we intend to oppose it in the same way and for much the same reasons as we have opposed the Clause dealing with tobacco.

The tax upon matches is fundamentally and in principle more objectionable and more unfair than the tax upon tobacco.
As a matter of fact I do not think that there is any article of ordinary consumption the price of which has been so much raised since the War as the price of matches. Before the War the price of matches used to be six boxes for a penny, but the price to-day is one penny per box.
Consequently the price has risen by 600 per cent., which is altogether out of proportion to the rise in the price of almost any other popular article in use.

My calculation is that this duty comes roughly to the equivalent of a duty of an extra half-penny upon a dozen boxes of matches and the question which is of special interest to us is to ask by whom is this duty eventually going to be paid? The match manufacturers have already practically told the public that it is not likely that it is going to be paid by them. Messrs. Bryant and May have announced that there is to be an increase of one half-penny per dozen in the price of their matches, an increase which is practically equivalent to the new duty which is being proposed. Who is going to pay the duty? I may say that this is an interesting example of the kind of argument that has been previously used this evening, and is always used whenever questions of Free Trade and Protection are debated. The price of the box of matches is now 1d. Although the duty has been imposed, it has remained at 1d., and I have no doubt that it will continue at 1d. But, nevertheless, this duty is going to be paid by the public, and for this reason. I was told by manufacturers of matches, even before this duty was proposed, that the cost of production of matches had been falling for some years, and that the time was just approaching when they were going to put upon the market matches at the price of two boxes for 1½d., so that we should have approached rather nearer to the prices at which matches were sold before the War. This duty means that that reduction in price will not take place, and, as a consequence, the price of matches will be stabilised at its present excessively high figure for an indefinite period.

The increase in price will fall upon the public at large, and, unfortunately, this is another example of those duties in the case of which the public at large means mainly the poorer sections of the State. I remember that not long ago Messrs. Bryant and May, when they were wanting some other favour, sent out a letter, which I think must have gone to all the Members of the House, because I received an ordinary typewritten copy of it, and in that letter, in order to support another argument of theirs, they said that their calculation was that five-sixths of the matches used in this country were used by the working class. The fact is that, although the amount spent on matches is not very large, the effect of a tax upon matches is practically the same as that of a tax upon tea. In the case of matches, as in the case of tea, the ordinary working-class household spends practically the same sum as a household of the wealthier section of the community, and the result is that, if matches are taxed and their price is increased, it takes a far larger proportion out of the pockets of the poorer section than it takes from the wealthier sections of the State. For that reason, our general opposition to this tax is based on exactly the same grounds as our general opposition to all these taxes upon the necessities of life. The weight of it on rich and comfortable homes will be practically inappreciable, but it does mean that once again the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking a few more pennies out of the pockets of the less comfortable sections in the country, when they need to buy one of these common necessities of their homes.

Major HILLS: The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) complained that when matches were not taxed at all they were much cheaper. I quite agree that they were, and if there were no tax the price would come down. The hon. Member then went on to say that the increased tax would be borne entirely by the consumer. That is not entirely so. The increased tax is 1s. per standard gross of 10,000 matches. The standard gross is not a trade description at all, because matches are not sold by the standard gross; they are sold by the trade gross, that is to say, a gross of boxes containing 50 matches per box. That works out, not at 10,000 matches but at 7,200 matches. On a trade gross the extra tax imposed by this Budget is 7d., and of that the manufacturers are passing on 6d. to the wholesalers, the retailer and to the public. I cannot say exactly in what way that would be apportioned, but it certainly will not all fall upon the public for, in the first place, the increase that the manufacturers are making is only ½d. per dozen, and the competition in selling matches is very keen, and I do not anticipate that the whole amount will be passed on. The last speaker knows that the effect of the tax will indirectly effect a saving to the public, for it standardises the tax at 50 matches per box. Before this new tax was imposed foreign matches were coming in at 30, 35, 40 or 45 matches per box, and these boxes looked just the same as boxes containing 50 matches, and were sold at the same price.

[Major Hills.]

Now take the housewife who goes to buy a dozen boxes of matches, for all prudent purchasers buy by the dozen. She might have got a dozen boxes with 50 matches in a box or a dozen with 35 matches in a box, and so she might have lost 12 times 15, which is 180 matches. Now the tax is charged on all boxes of matches that hold more than 20, as though they held 50, so that it will not pay foreign importers to put less than 50 in a box because that would mean paying a tax in excess of the value of their products. To that extent the public will be protected, and I think the House will realise it was a very serious fraud on the public that when they expected to get 50 matches all they got was 35. Further, the price the manufacturer charges of 6d. per gross is merely replacing the price at the same figure at which it stood in 1923, and from 1923 to 1925 at which time the price was reduced by 6d. a gross. I think that is the reduction which the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) has in mind. It did take place, and I quite agree that the effect of this tax is to take off that reduction, but, after all, it only replaces the position as it was two years ago. There is nothing protective to the manufacturer in this tax. I think the hon. Member will admit that the only people who are protected are the public, except that indirectly the British manufacturer is protected from unfair foreign competition, and I am quite certain the hon. Member will not object to that. Since a part of the tax will be shouldered, first by the manufacturer, next by the wholesaler, and next by the retailer, and further as the public will get the article they are paying for, and not a box containing 35 matches, I hope that the Committee will pass this Clause.

Mr. E. BROWN: The Committee will have been interested in the second speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major Hills) on this tax, and I do not think they will grudge a little further consideration of the tax. Seeing that successive Governments from 1916 till to-day have received £13,000,000 of revenue from this small tax, and that up to this Budget only 63 lines of the OFFICIAL REPORT have been occupied by discussion on this tax, there ought to be a great deal more discussion. When Mr. McKenna introduced it in 1916, he introduced it as a war-time tax. When Mr. Bonar Law altered it in 1918 he used a phrase curiously like that used by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when introducing his Budget, and perhaps the Committee will allow me to read it. The Chancellor, when he was making his great ascent up the mountain of difficulty, said:

"Proceeding upon our ascent, step by step and crag by crag, I now come to matches"—

He wanted a little light on his journey—

"It will probably be a surprise to many well-informed Members that we have been for many years raising revenue by a strictly orthodox Customs and Excise duty upon matches, the revenue of which last year amounted to no less than £3,500,000."

This is the sentence which I would like the Committee particularly to note:

"The British match industry has submitted to me a plan which combines an increase in the Match Duty with an alteration of its basis, which they assure me will be more satisfactory to them in relation to foreign competition than is the existing scheme."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 11th April, 1927; col. 90, Vol. 205.]

Then he goes on to outline the alterations contained in the White Paper and in the scheme which we are discussing to-night. I suggest that we are entitled to have from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury a little light upon the deputation that came from the industry to the Exchequer as to the composition of that deputation, as to the number of firms concerned in it, and as to what took place between the Exchequer and the deputation before this alteration was made. A very celebrated British philosopher once said:

"Two men of the same trade rarely meet together in secret without planning a conspiracy against the public."

A modern Yankee would say, "You scratch my back and I will scratch yours, and we will all rob the public." The hon. Member for Mossley (Mr. A. Hopkinson) will probably agree with him, for in a recent Debate he said that he feared the right hon. Member for Carmarthen (Sir A. Mond) not when he disagreed with Labour, but when he agreed with it, in making a combine against the public, and I am suspicious of the agreements, past and present, between the Treasury and the match industry. I want to know what the match industry is getting out of this last agreement and who are the firms concerned in getting whatever they are getting out of it. The speech delivered by the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon to-night is not quite the same as that delivered by him on the Budget Resolutions. I have that speech here, and I notice that then he was by no means so sure of the incidence of this tax as he seems to be to-night. I would like to quote some words of John Stuart Mill against this tax. John Stuart Mill once said :

“The direct tax is one which is demanded from the very persons whom it is intended or desired should pay, but the indirect tax is that which is demanded from one person in the expectation and intention that he or she shall indemnify himself or herself at the expense of another.”

I believe that to be sound doctrine, and I think the two speeches delivered in this House on this Match Tax by the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon only emphasise the soundness of that doctrine, for in his first speech he said he was quite sure who was going to pay the duty, and he mentioned the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer, and to a certain small extent, the public.

11.0 p.m. I would ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury if there are any calculations which have been made at the Treasury as to the incidence of this tax between the various people mentioned by the hon. Member for Ripon. Although we have been speaking in pounds and shillings, this is not a matter of pounds or shillings to the match industry, the Treasury or the British public. When this Duty was introduced in 1916 by Mr. McKenna, the total revenue was £1,029,000. In the following year it amounted to £1,242,000; in the third year, £2,027,000; in the fourth year, £3,336,000; in the fifth year, £3,051,000. In the sixth year there was a slight diminution, because the tax on mechanical lighters which had held good up to then was repealed. The amount in that year was £3,023,000. In the following year there was another slight diminution to £3,013,000. Since then, we have had continuous rises to £3,121,000, £3,295,000, £3,345,000, and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants an additional £500,000, £600,000 or £700,000. That means the British consumer of matches, the housewife, all who use matches, smokers and all kinds of people, the whole public who buy matches for ordinary purposes, will pay more in proportion to the matches they buy than those who buy the more expensive matches.

I suggest to the Financial Secretary that the Committee are entitled to some information as to the members of the deputation who saw the Treasury, the number of firms who are associated with each other in suggesting the second alteration—the first alteration of the duty came about on the suggestion of the manufacturers—and as to the Treasury view of the incidence of this additional duty upon the general public, as compared with the wholesaler, the retailer and the match manufacturer. This duty amounts to nearly £4,000,000, and the Committee are entitled to a good deal more information than they have yet received about the details of the Clause.

Mr. MARCH: I was rather surprised, in listening to the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major Hills), to note how he had wheeled round from what he said on the previous occasion.

Major HILLS: I said exactly the same on the Resolution as I say now. I said that sixpence would be passed on by the manufacturer, but that of that sixpence I did not think the whole would be passed on to the public.

Mr. MARCH: To-night, the hon. Member has been trying to make us believe that it is going to be shared between the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer and the consumer. That is a little different from what he said before. I have yet to learn where the patriotism runs with the wholesaler and the retailer to take their share of the extra duty which is being imposed by the Government in this respect. I was very interested to learn that no prudent housewife would purchase her matches in dozen boxes. If the hon. Member for Ripon (Major Hills) would only come down to the district I have the honour to represent, he would find some of those widows and old ladies, and the old age pensioners buying one box at a time, and they cannot afford to buy more. The result is that the passing on of the extra charge will go on to the poorest people that there is in this country.

Major HILLS: May I point out that the penny box is still a penny even if the tax is imposed.

Mr. MARCH: May I tell the hon. and gallant Member that there are some boxes at a halfpenny?

Major HILLS: Not 50 matches.

Sir FREDRIC WISE: Are they still a halfpenny?

Major HILLS: There are not 50.

Mr. MARCH: No, 20, and bad enough it is. It is very nice for hon. Members to come to the House and talk about all being so cheap and reasonable, for these people who have to use matches more than we do ourselves feel anything extra that is imposed on them. I myself ought not to complain, because I am a non-smoker. I do not waste any matches in that direction. I am also able by living in Poplar to have the electric light put on. Therefore, I do not want any matches to light up when I go home early or late; and it is quite probable that that applies to a large number of Members on the other side of the House. We are doing our best to see that all the people get light in our district. I should like to say that this is another imposition of indirect taxation upon the poorest people of the country. As the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) has said, the agricultural labourer gets very poor wages, and up to the present time he has not, in many instances, even got gas. They still use the old tallow candle. [An HON. MEMBER: "They get Tory gas."] They get plenty of Tory gas it is true, and they are told things will get better by and by. It will only be when they get beyond the moon. They will not get anything on this earth. Those who have got beyond tallow candles have paraffin oil, and this is the only light they can get in many instances. They are the people this is going to affect very largely indeed, and I hope that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will be able to explain to us what he has learned in connection with this matter for those benevolent match manufacturers who waited upon him as to what they intend to do with this extra duty which you are now imposing on them. Did you get anything from them that they were anxious to pay it all themselves, or did you get anything from them that they were going to pass it on?

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. Gentleman address me.

Mr. MARCH: I thought, if I looked at him pleasantly, I would get a decent answer. I do not expect to get an answer from you, Sir. I should like to know whether anything of the kind with regard to the sharing out of this extra tax was mentioned, and whether there was any of them patriotic enough to say that they would bear the whole burden, because they are making a decent profit, and they are belauding themselves for the profits they are making out of matches at the present time.

Sir H. CROFT: I want to intervene for a very few moments. I confess that the attitude of the Opposition and the opportunities they have missed this evening have depressed me. When the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) rose to his feet, I thought that at last we were going to have a real statement on behalf of the workers of this country. But all he could say was that this was another burden on the poor, although I think he has since confessed that a box of matches has not been increased to the individual. We have just heard that, at any rate in Poplar, no one ever buys more than one box of matches—

Mr. MARCH: I did not say that.

Sir H. CROFT: I desire to take this opportunity of making the most full and ample apology to the hon. Member. I did think that on an occasion like this we might have heard something from the Front Bench of the Opposition in regard to the Excise duties on matches which we are also considering. Had the hon. Member risen to his feet to point out that this burden is, as it must be, a burden ultimately on the consumers of this country, and had he urged that that Excise duty was not desirable under the present state of affairs, I think the whole Committee would have been relieved and would have realised that at last we had had an admission of value from the Labour party. Had he taken that attitude, I think he would have met with a great deal of sympathy from that section of the Opposition that represents one-third of the trade union vote at the conference this year, because I think that at present at least half—possibly more—of the matches we consume come from foreign countries. When it is realised that these matches are produced under the most disgraceful conditions in the countries from which they are imported, I think the Opposition have missed a real chance in not insisting that this Excise duty should be withdrawn. Had they done so they would have had the support of a great number of hon. Members.

Mr. KELLY: I was very much interested to hear the last speaker in regard to the labour conditions in this particular industry. I was hoping that in the course of it he would have at least dropped one or two figures as to the conditions that he complained of in those countries, and that he would have told us of the conditions operating in this country. It may be some surprise to him to know that among Friends of his own are those who are financing some of those companies of which he speaks as foreign companies. But I want to ask him why it is that he is so fond of stating that this is only a small imposition upon the community, when he knows full well that there are so many other impositions on them that this means an added burden to the costs that are imposed on them? But I rose for the purpose of asking the view of the deputation that waited on the Treasury. I want to know if, seeing that there is a Whitley Council in connection with the match industry in this country, and that Whitley Council is concerned with both employers and employed and with all the match factories in this country, they were consulted or if they were part of the deputation which waited on the Treasury? It seems a very curious statement that we had from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if he would impose a duty upon matches that would be to the advantage of this country and particularly to those manufacturers. There is a difference between the statement of the hon. Member for Ripon to-night and the statement he made when he last spoke on the question. He will find it somewhat difficult to prove that the manufacturers or the wholesalers are going to stand the bulk of this impost, which he assumes is not going to reach the public. But the serious thing is that if the Amendment is not accepted, it is evident that it is the intention of the Government to carry this tax a long period beyond the year we are now in. I hope the Amendment will be accepted, and I trust the Financial Secretary will let us know whether, not only the manufacturers, but the Whitley Councils concerned with the industry were consulted or were with the deputation to the Treasury.

Mr. McNEILL: We have had a Debate not merely on the Amendment on the Paper, but upon the whole question of the duty. The hon. Member who has just sat down is the only one who made any allowance or reference whatever to the Amendment. I think I may take it from the way it was treated by the hon. Member on the Front Bench that he did not expect that any particular favour would be shown to the Amendment. He was only using it as an opportunity for discussing the general subject. If that was his state of mind, he was perfectly accurate. The Government could not possibly accept the Amendment. It would restrict clearances, with the result that there would be a very serious deficit in the estimated revenue. We have known the Mover of the Amendment for many years as a protagonist of Free Trade. If we were to carry the Amendment we should be going considerably beyond Free Trade. It would be giving Protection to the foreigner, as there is no corresponding Amendment down with regard to the second Sub-section, relating to Excise.

One or two hon. Members have shown some curiosity as to where the duty would fall. The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) told us it would fall on the poor, and he used an argument that is very common in these Debates but which, I think, really involves a fallacy, when he said it would fall on those least able to bear it. Of course, that is true not only of any duty but of the price of any article. The poorer a person is, the more difficult it is for him to pay for it. It is perfectly true. It is obvious. But what I think involves a fallacy when we are discussing these taxation questions is to isolate every individual item—to take them separately. It is perfectly true that if you take each one separately and say, "There is a tax on such a commodity." It is much more difficult for the poor to pay it than for the rich. Then there is the next tax which is proposed. That also is much more difficult for the poor to pay than for the rich. Consequently, you are putting heavier burdens upon the poor than you are upon the rich."

[Mr. McNeill.]

That appears to me to involve a fallacy. The only way you can justly estimate and gauge the relative burdens of different classes is by making a review of the whole field of taxation. It is perfectly true that certain classes pay practically nothing on matches, and it does not affect them in the least, but you have to find out what that same class is paying in other ways. It is only when you do that, and sum up the actual aggregate of burdens which falls upon the rich or poor, as the case may be, that you have any right to say with justice that an undue amount of burden is being placed upon people who are moderately well to do, or the rich. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. E. Brown) and the hon. Member who last spoke asked me some questions about some deputation at the Treasury. I am not able to give them information about it. I am not certain that I should think it right to do so, even if I were in a position to do so, but I am not. I have had no notice sent to me that there was any curiosity felt about it. I do not know exactly whether it was in the form of a deputation at all.

Mr. E. BROWN: The right hon. Gentleman rather pressed me on the Financial Resolution, but, unfortunately, when I came to ask him the question at that time, it was so late that he was unable to give an answer then.

Mr. McNEILL: If the hon. Member in any way gave me actual notice that he was going to put that point to me, I apologise for not having remembered that was so. I am not at all sure that I should have given it in any case. I do not know that there were negotiations. I know that communications passed, as is always the case when a Budget is being prepared. There are always negotiations with many interests concerned or that might possibly be concerned. I do not think it is usual to give specific information as to who was present and what was said, and so forth. At all events, we are not discussing whether I shall be right or wrong in withholding the information, because I have not any to give.

Mr. KELLY: My only reason for raising this point is that it was a strong point used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, namely, that, as a result of what he had been told by those people, and the suggestion they made to him, he was coming before the Committee with this particular proposal. Surely we have a right to know the people who made that statement.

Mr. McNEILL: I do not think there is any such right. These deputations are received at the Treasury in the ordinary course, and there is no right on the part of hon. Members to ask who were there, or what actually happened. Hon. Members must be content to take the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that point, or to disregard it, if they so please. I should like to endorse what was said by the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major Hills), who speaks with much inside knowledge. He explained to the Committee quite accurately what the probabilities are with regard to the incidence of this duty, and to what he said I really have nothing to add.

* * * * *

[For continuation of Proceedings, see Official Report, Wednesday, 29th June.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 28th June, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

FINANCE BILL.

Considered in Committee.

CLAUSE 8.—(Increased duty on matches.)

Amendment proposed: In page 4, line 28, after the words "twenty-seven," to insert the words "until the twelfth day of April, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight."—[Mr. Lees-Smith.]

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

[Continuation of Official Report, from Col. 366, Tuesday, 28th June, 1927.]

Mr. A. V. ALEXANDER: One or two things have transpired during this Debate which are worthy of a little further attention from the Committee. The Financial Secretary has said that the hon. Member who moved the Amendment failed to pursue the argument in that he has not put down an Amendment to the Excise section of the Clause. The Financial Secretary, however, failed to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that there is an Amendment on the Paper to delete the whole of the Clause, which, of course, would get rid of the Excise Duty as well as the Customs Duty. It would have been a fairer comment if the Financial Secretary, in his reply, had informed the Committee that this is not the only Amendment that has been put down. The second point which the hon. Member made was quite interesting to hon. Members on this side. He said that he could not understand why we should lay so much stress on the fact that duties of this kind press harder on the poor; that we should always have regard to the general spread of taxation over the whole community and not pay so much attention to an isolated duty of this kind. The Financial Secretary knows that the case of those who oppose these duties is that in regard to the taxation to be raised for purposes of revenue the first principle to be observed is that the people who have to pay the taxation shall be able to bear it. The great mass of the workers of this country are entitled to a minimum standard of life before they pay taxation at all. It is unfair for the hon. Gentleman to take any other view of the situation. Whilst the exigencies of the country may require special measures at certain times, we ought not to be stooping to the expediency of putting a few coppers on the matches of the poor for the purpose of raising revenue when you are saving millions a year by rebates to the rich Income Tax and Super-tax payers. What we suggest is that you should take off this kind of taxation altogether and raise all the revenue required in two ways only; first, in direct taxation upon the incomes of the rich, in relation to their ability to pay—

The CHAIRMAN: This subject cannot be raised on this Amendment. It is quite proper on Second Reading or Third Reading.

Mr. ALEXANDER: It is a little wide of the Amendment. On the other hand, it is surely not wide of the argument used by the Financial Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN: I take the Committee into my confidence. If the right hon. Gentleman had said another sentence I was going to stop him.

Mr. ALEXANDER: I will not take a minute to finish the argument with your permission, Sir. If they would raise the money by direct taxation, as I have suggested, with, as occasion required, a tax upon purely luxury articles, there would be no difficulty in meeting the needs of the revenue and giving proper relief to the poor in the country. With regard to the suggestion of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bourne-mouth (Sir H. Croft), I notice he says there would be great advantage if he were to remove the Excise duty and leave on the Customs duty. He says that matches are being imported in large quantities from countries where sweated conditions prevail. It is a great pity that the hon. and gallant Member cannot persuade his Government to ratify the 48-hour week Convention. There might then be some point in his argument. I have here a box of matches imported from Finland and made by co-operators in Finland.

[Mr. Alexander.]

We buy large quantities of them. We also buy large quantities of the matches which are more familiar to the hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major Hills) from the firm of Bryant and May. But the import of these matches is as important to the British worker as the purchase of the British matches. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] I will explain why. We took thousands of gross of these matches from Finland last year and we sold to them, from co-operative factories here, employing trade union labour, thousands of bicycles and other articles such as boots and shoes, and that is just as important to the worker here as the actual manufacture of matches in this country.

Major HILLS: I do not think the hon. Member can know the wages paid in match factories in Finland. I have here the result of an inquiry made by the Belgian Christian Union into wages in match factories, and in Belgium the highest rate per hour is 6d., and it goes down as low as 2d. In Finland the highest rate is 5½d. per hour, and it goes down to 2½d. for girls.

Mr. ALEXANDER: Before the hon. and gallant Member destroys my case, he had better give me the figures for the co-operative factories. I said the matches were made by co-operators. He might also give the comparative cost of living.

Major HILLS: My figures are given by the Finnish Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER: I submit that that does not discredit my argument.

Sir H. CROFT: Buying sweated goods!

Mr. ALEXANDER: No, we are selling very good goods, made by trade union labour in Birmingham, among other places, and incidentally we are employing shipping to take the matches here and to take the goods away, and ship-builders to build the ships. Altogether the case which has been put up by the hon. and gallant Member cannot stand.

Mr. J. JONES: Those of us who live in the East End of London and who can take our memories back 30 or 40 years, never want to see again the conditions which formerly prevailed in the match factories. If this were a question of protecting the workers of Great Britain from sweating, some of us might be prepared to take up a different attitude. This is not a matter of sweating. Hon. Members who talk so glibly about foreign matches have evidently not read the "Times" during the last few weeks. They have not read that these foreign match companies are raising money in England for the purpose of developing their businesses in competition with British manufacturers. They are getting plenty of money. Patriotic Tariff Reformers will be able to make higher dividends on their capital than if they invested it in the British match industry. They are always patriots when it is a matter of getting votes. When it is a question of getting dividends they do not care a tinker's curse whether it is the Chinaman, the Belgian, the Flemish or the Finnish worker—[Interruption].

Sir H. CROFT: Would you keep them out?

Mr. JONES: We could not keep you out if we tried. You are more dangerous to us than any workmen that ever came into this country.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the hon. and gallant Member for Bournemouth (Sir H. Croft) is not a match.

Mr. JONES: No, but I am a match for him. I am a match for most of them. If it were merely a question of protecting the workers of England we should have various views expressed but this is a matter of raising revenue for the State. From whom are you going to get the revenue? The Government are always playing upon the worker. When in doubt, play upon the worker! It is a jolly fine game played slow; but it is about time we said "tip it." [Interruption.] Up to now I have not heard in this discussion any question of the general strike. It is the only time it has not been mentioned. Seeing that it is a question of matches striking is not necessary.

I suggest that the question of protecting the worker of this country has nothing to do with the question now before the Committee. It is a question of raising revenue and the Government are raising it at the expense of the people least able to pay. That is the philosophy running through all the proposals which have been made up to now. If you want to protect the British workman protect him against your own people who invest their money in foreign countries and throw the British workman out of employment. Some of them on these benches will take 10 per cent. in China rather than accept 5 per cent. in Great Britain. They do not care where their interest comes from so long as they get it. I remember the time when the match makers of the East End were amongst the most sweated and degraded workers in the country—and that was under the same firms.

As an official of a union which represents a very large number of the men and women employed in the match-making industry I wish to ask if when there were consultations between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the trade the workers' side was represented? Did we have any finger in the pie? Were we allowed to appear before the holy of holies, wiping our noses on the mat before we dared to enter? No. We were never asked—so far as I know. We were simply told what had happened—by the trade. Who are the trade? Certain individuals who happen to be at the top of the tree. They were not considering the interests of labour. They are international in their ramifications. The people in the match industry of Great Britain know that it is very largely dominated by the American combine.

The Diamond Match Company is practically an American institution in which British capital is not the dominating factor. If it is a question of protecting British workers, we are prepared to adopt means of protecting them, but our means are totally different from yours. Your method is to rob them by making them pay more for the things they want, and, although some workers may be able to get a little more wage, it is only at the expense of their fellows. That sort of game ought not to be played by people representing any section of the community, and this matter ought not to be made a question of robbing Peter to pay Paul. These proposals are simply a reproduction of the old bad policy of the Tory Party, and they have got an ex-Liberal as Chancellor of the Exchequer to come along to do their execrable, dirty work. I know most of the Ministers opposite are ex-something. On a question like this we have to save a few of the brands from the burning. Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation. So far as we on this side are concerned, we stand by the principle that we have enunciated all through, which is that taxation should be based upon the ability of the people to pay. This kind of taxation is making the poor pay all the time and allowing those who are best able to pay to escape their responsibilities. Whatever our views may be about protecting the members of trade unions, we are not prepared to allow ourselves to be led up the garden to vote for Protection under false pretences. That is what these proposals mean, and that is why we are united in our opposition to them.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 110; Noes, 234.

Division No. 225.]

AYES.

[11.45 a.m.]

Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbrow)
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, Walter
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Broad, F. A.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Charleton, H. C.
Clowes, S.
Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
Crawford, H. E.
Dalton, Hugh
Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
Day, Colonel Harry
Duckworth, John
Dunlop, H.
England, Colonel A.

Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
Fenby, T. D.
Gardner, J. P.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Graham, Rt. Hon. Wm. (Edin., Cent.)
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York., W.R., Normanton)
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydfil)
Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
Harris, Percy A.
Hayday, Arthur
Hayes, John Henry
Henderson, Right Hon. A. (Burnley)
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)

Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Lansbury, George
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lunn, William
Mackinder, W.

MacLaren, Andrew
 Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
 March, S.
 Morris, R. H.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Salter, Dr. Alfred
 Scurr, John

Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Sitch, Charles H.
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.

Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

NOES.

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Ainsworth, Major Charles
 Albery, Irving James
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atholl, Duchess of
 Atkinson, C.
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Balmlel, Lord
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Bennett, A. J.
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Blundell, F. N.
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Braithwaite, Major A. N.
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newby)
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbert R. (Prtsmth. S.)
 Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
 Colfox, Major William Phillips
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Curzon, Captain Viscount
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert

Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fielden, E. B.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Forrest, W.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Gadie, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Galbraith, J. F. W.
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
 Grotrian, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Harrington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major J. R. G.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Capt. H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)

Kidd, J. (Linthgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kinloch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 McDonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Plicher, G.
 Preston, William
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Remer, J. R.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Roper, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)

Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carington, Neville W.
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Storey-Deans, R.
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.

Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Suggden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles

Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. F. C. Thomson and Captain
 Bowyer.

Motion made, and Question put, The Committee divided: Ayes, 230;
 "That the Clause stand part of the Noes, 108.
 Bill."

Division No. 226.]

AYES.

[11.52 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Agg-Gardner, Rt. Hon. Sir James T.
 Alnsworth, Major Charles
 Albery, Irving James
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Amery, Rt. Hon. Leopold C. M. S.
 Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atholl, Duchess of
 Atkinson, C.
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Balnlel, Lord
 Barnett, Major Sir Richard
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
 Bennett, A. J.
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Blundell, F. N.
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bralthwalte, Major A. N.
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
 Buchan, John
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Campbell, E. T.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth.S.)
 Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Chapman, Sir S.
 Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
 Coffer, Major Wm. Phillips
 Cooper, A. Duff
 Cope, Major William
 Couper, J. B.
 Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
 Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Cunliffe, Sir Herbert
 Curzon, Captain Viscount
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
 Davies, Maj. Geo. F. (Somerset, Yeovil)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Dawson, Sir Philip

Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Drewe, C.
 Eden, Captain Anthony
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Fairfax, Captain J. G.
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Finburgh, S.
 Ford, Sir P. J.
 Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
 Forrest, W.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gadle, Lieut.-Col. Anthony
 Galbraith, J. F. W.
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Goff, Sir Park
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
 Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
 Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
 Grotlan, H. Brent
 Guinness, Rt. Hon. Walter E.
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
 Haslam, Henry C.
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxford, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Henn, Sir Sydney H.
 Hennessy, Major J. R. G.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hilton, Cecil
 Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hope, Sir Harry (Forfar)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)

Hume, Sir G. H.
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Inskip, Sir Thomas Walker H.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jacob, A. E.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Kintoch-Cooke, Sir Clement
 Knox, Sir Alfred
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Leigh, Sir John (Clapham)
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Long, Major Eric
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
 McLean, Major A.
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Milne, J. S. Wardlaw-
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Moreing, Captain A. H.
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Neville, Sir Reginald J.
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 O'Connor, T. J. (Bedford, Luton)
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Oman, Sir Charles William C.
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Penny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Price, Major C. W. M.
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Remer, J. R.
 Rhys, Hon. C. A. U.
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)

Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Shaw, R. G. (Yorks, W.R., Sowerby)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carington, Neville W.
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.

Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Storry-Deans, R.
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Templeton, W. P.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Thomson, Rt. Hon. Sir W. Mitchell-
 Tinne, J. A.
 Titchfield, Major the Marquess of
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.

Warrander, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Captain Margesson and Captain
 Bowyer.

NOES.

Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Ammon, Charles George
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Buta)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Clowes, S.
 Cowan, D. M. (Scottish Universities)
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dafton, Hugh
 Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Duckworth, John
 Dunnico, H.
 England, Colonel A.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Harrie, Percy A.
 Hayday, Arthur
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, Rt. Hon. A. (Burnley)

Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Hutchison, Sir Robert (Montrose)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Jones, Henry Haydn (Merioneth)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Lansbury, George
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lawson, John James
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacLaren, Andrew
 Maclean, Nell (Glasgow, Govan)
 March, S.
 Morris, R. H.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.

Salter, Dr. Alfred
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Slitch, Charles H.
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
 Snell, Harry
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wiggins, William Martin
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, C. H. (Sheffield, Attercliffe)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I beg to move, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."

It will not be denied that we have made considerable progress to-day, and I think it will be the general wish that we should now adjourn. I think that suggestion will be accepted by the Government.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I cannot deny that we have made very great progress, and, although I had hoped to divide the advantage of getting Clause 9 with that of witnessing the eclipse, I recognise the reasonableness of the suggestion that has been made. I appreciate the Parliamentary efficiency with which our Debates have been conducted, and that we have covered much ground. The issue in regard to pottery, which is raised by Clause 9, is one on which hon. and right hon. Members opposite feel very strongly, and the President of the Board of Trade is quite prepared to encounter it in the full light of day. There is the question of the Road Fund, which we have a great desire to bring forward for a good debate. There is the question of the Betting Duty, which I understand will be debated on a new Clause. It is desirable there should be a full Debate on that. Then there is the question of Income Tax. We ought to be able so to arrange our business as to get these issues clearly and well defined, and at the same time to get on with the numerous provisions of this complicated Bill in a satisfactory manner. Believing that I am expressing the feeling in all parts of the House, I shall not resist the proposal that we do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday, 30th June.

The remaining Orders were read and postponed.

It being after half-past Eleven of the Clock upon Tuesday evening, Mr. Deputy-Speaker (Mr. James Hope) adjourned the House, without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Six Minutes after Twelve o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 29th June, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Wallasey Corporation Bill [Lords] (by Order),

West Cheshire Water Board Bill [Lords] (by Order),

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

SARDINIA (MRS. DOROTHE BODLEY).

1. Colonel DAY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the sufferings of Mrs. Dorothe Bodley, a British subject, during the time she was detained by the Italian authorities at Cagliari, Sardinia; whether he has received a full Report from the British Consul at Cagliari of this incident; whether any representations have been made by the Foreign Office to the Italian authorities; and if he is in a position to make a full statement on the subject?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson): Yes, Sir. Mrs. Bodley has made to me a statement of her experiences in Sardinia, and her account is confirmed by a report which I have received from His Majesty's Ambassador at Rome who has been in communication with the British Consul at Cagliari. In the circumstances, I am instructing His Majesty's Ambassador at Rome to bring the facts of the case to the notice of the Italian Government with a view to inquiry being made into the incident.

Colonel DAY: Will the hon. Gentleman say whether the report that he has received from the Ambassador relating to this lady will be published?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I do not think so.

GEORGIA.

2. Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has now had an opportunity of examining the papers relative to the allegations of Signor Nitti, late Prime Minister of Italy, to the effect that Italy was urged by the Entente Powers to occupy the territory of the Republic of Georgia; and whether he proposes to lay Papers on the subject before the House?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I have seen in a book by Signor Nitti, kindly lent to me by the hon. Gentleman, the statement quoted by the hon. Member. As stated in my reply to him of the 20th instant, there seem to have been informal conversations on the subject, of which no record exists, between the representatives of the Italian Government at the Peace Conference and the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George). The records available are not suitable for publication and would only give a partial and possibly misleading account of what passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Are we, then, to understand from the hon. Gentleman that the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George) did definitely urge the Italian Government to invade and seize the territory of the Republic of Georgia at that time?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I do not think I can really go beyond what I have already said in the answer. It was a question whether, as the British troops were being withdrawn from that district, the Italian troops should take their place or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is it the case that Signor Nitti resisted the urgings of the then Prime Minister, declaring them to be a gross violation of all international law, and that Signor Nitti himself secured the abandonment of the enterprise?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: There is no doubt that the suggestion made did fall through at that time.

Mr. PONSONBY: Is not the absence of any record of these negotiations due to the fact that in those days foreign affairs were all conducted at 10, Downing Street, without the knowledge of the Foreign Office?

Captain CROOKSHANK: Is there also an absence of any record of the views which the leaders of the Socialist party used to hold about the independence of Georgia which they have now given up?

Mr. RILEY: Are we then to take it from what the hon. Gentleman has said that the suggestion made was that Georgia should be seized?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I understand the suggestion that was made was that the British troops that were in occupation of the Caucasus at that time should be replaced by Italian troops.

Mr. W. THORNE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, as far as we are concerned, we have always declared the right of Georgia to govern herself in her own way?

PERSIA (BRITISH PRIVILEGES).

3. Miss WILKINSON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any communication has been received from the Government of Persia proposing the termination of the capitulatory rights and privileges at present enjoyed by British and certain other foreign residents at Persia; whether he will inform the House of the terms of any such communication; and whether he will say what reply His Majesty's Government has made or proposes to make?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The answer to the first part of the hon. Lady's question is in the affirmative. The gist of the Persian announcement has already appeared in the Press, and I have nothing to add to it at the present time. With regard to the third part of the question, His Majesty's Government have not yet returned a reply to the Persian Government, and it is not customary to state in advance the substance of a note to a foreign Power.

Miss WILKINSON: What is the reason for the communication that has been received from the Persian Government?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The Persian Government, I understand, wish to terminate the capitulatory privileges enjoyed by us.

Miss WILKINSON: It is, of course, obvious that they wish to terminate them, but I want to ask the hon. Gentleman why they wish to terminate them?

Colonel WEDGWOOD: May we take it that the suggestion of the Persian Government will receive the very favourable consideration of His Majesty's Government?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The proposals of the Persian Government are receiving consideration.

8. Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what privileges, capitulations, and immunities are enjoyed by British subjects in Persia; whether these are enjoyed by nationals of other European countries; and which of these privileges is the Persian Government seeking to terminate?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The rights which are enjoyed by British subjects in Persia, and which the Persian Government desire to terminate, may be summarised as the privilege of having all cases, civil or criminal, in which they are defendants, tried by extra-territorial jurisdiction, conferred by Order in Council upon the British Consular Court. This right is derived from Article 9 of the Anglo-Persian Treaty of the 4th of March, 1857, whereby most-favoured-nation treatment is guaranteed to British subjects. French citizens and Spanish subjects also enjoy extra-territorial jurisdiction in virtue of the express provisions of their respective treaties with Persia, which are in perpetuity. Various other countries also possessed similar rights guaranteed by their several treaties, but each of these instruments contained a denunciatory clause.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: May I ask whether, in view of the good government that has been established in Persia and the order that prevails there, we are viewing this matter favourably?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I have already stated that the whole of this matter is now engaging the careful consideration of the Government.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Does not the Under-Secretary see that if we give up these capitulations in Turkey we can hardly refuse the same concession in Persia?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter of argument.

Sir HARRY BRITTAIN: Is it not the fact that one-third of the entire revenue of Persia is raised by British enterprise?

Mr. RILEY: Has there been any interchange of views on this matter between His Majesty's Government, the Italian Government and the French Government?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: We are in consultation with the French Government?

GERMANY.

OCCUPIED TERRITORY.

4. Mr. HARRIS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is now in a position to give any date for the termination of the occupation by the Allies of the occupied German territory; and whether the matter has been, or is being, discussed at Geneva?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: As regards the first part of the question, the answer is in the negative. As regards the second part, I would ask the hon. Member to put down his question when my right hon. Friend has returned. I understand my right hon. Friend is returning on Saturday.

FORTIFICATIONS, EAST PRUSSIA.

5. Mr. HARRIS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the fortifications in East Prussia have been demolished to the satisfaction of the Military Control Commission?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The demolition of the fortifications in Eastern Prussia has recently been the subject of discussion with the German Government at Geneva, and I would suggest that the hon. Member should put down his question when my right hon. Friend has returned. I would point out incidentally that the Military Commission of Control was withdrawn from Germany at the end of January last and that only a few experts remain in Berlin attached to their respective Embassies.

Mr. HARRIS: With regard to both these questions, would Monday be a convenient date, or would it be more convenient to postpone them until next Wednesday?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I think my right hon. Friend will be answering questions on Monday.

RUSSIAN ARMS AND AMMUNITION (IMPORTS).

11. Lieut.-Colonel Sir FREDERICK HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, seeing that the import by Germany from Soviet Russia of poison gas bombs, which it has now been found by the German Courts has been taking place over a considerable period of time, constitutes a breach of the Treaty of Versailles, any assurance has been given by the German Government that there shall be no repetition of this?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I am given to understand that the import into Germany, in contravention of Article 170 of the Treaty of Versailles, of arms and ammunition from Russia has now ceased and all transactions in connection with such import have been liquidated. Should any further infractions of the Treaty in this particular respect be brought to light in the future it will, of course, be possible for the question to be brought to the notice of the Council of the League of Nations under Article 213 of the Treaty of Versailles.

Sir F. HALL: Considering that the Article has been broken, does not my hon. Friend think that it is right and advisable to approach the German Government and ask for the assurances which I refer to in the last part of the question?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I understand that these transactions took place between subordinate departments of each of the Governments. They were not official transactions between Governments. The German Government have made it quite clear since that they disapproved of these transactions and they have stopped them.

Sir W. DAVISON: Has the Foreign Office any information as to the whole-sale manufacture of poison gas in Russia at the present time?

Colonel GRETTON: Can the Under-Secretary say how many bombs have been imported into Germany in infringement of the Treaty?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I must have notice of that question.

Miss LAWRENCE: Is this the gas referred to as Dyer Gas?

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: May I ask whether the bombs in question have been destroyed?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be put down.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS (UNITED STATES).

6. Mr. HANNON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any proposals have been received from the Government of the United States for the abolition or reduction of the charges for visas on passports between the United States and this country; and, if so, what action he proposes to take?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: No further proposals have been received from the United States Government since those of 1925, which are fully dealt with in Command Paper 2746 of 1926.

Mr. HANNON: Has not the time arrived to approach the United States, so that these excessive charges on visas can be done away with altogether.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: Is it not a fact that these visas act as a form of Imperial Preference by inducing our people to go to Canada instead of to the United States?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The last time we attempted to deal with this question unfortunately only a very one-sided bargain was proposed by the United States, that we should waive the whole of our visas and that they should merely reduce the fees.

Sir WILLIAM DAVISON: Stick to your guns.

CHINA (SITUATION).

7. Colonel DAY asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he will make a statement to the House on the present position in China; and whether there has been any recent alteration in China of the military or naval forces belonging to Great Britain?

9. Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any marked change in the military and political situation in China since he last described the situation to the House; and whether any negotiations of any kind are in progress with the Chinese authorities at Nanking or Hankow as to the position of our nationals and their properties and trade in the areas controlled by those Governments?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The military situation in China remains substantially as stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Central Southwark (Colonel Day) on the 13th of June last. It is understood that negotiations between the various military leaders are proceeding, which appear to have resulted in an agreement between Generals Chiang Kai-shek and Feng Yu-hsiang. General Chiang Kai-shek with his Nationalist armies is invading Shantung Province. General Feng in Honan Province is making no forward movement at present.

On the 18th of June Chang Tso-lin was installed as Commander-in-Chief for the Army and Navy, and a new Cabinet was formed in Peking under the premiership of Pan Fu.

A local revolution took place in Yunnan on the 19th of June, when the control of the Government was wrested from a moderate Nationalist leader by one of a less moderate type.

On the 23rd of June a Chinese raiding party, consisting of an officer and 50 soldiers, boarded a hulk at Chinkiang belonging to a British shipping company with the object of searching a British river steamer. A landing party from His Majesty's Ship "Verity" was sent, and found the officer and 10 soldiers still on board; these were driven off with truncheons. The officer in charge of the raiding party has since been reprimanded by the local Chinese authorities.

[Mr. Locker-Lampson.]

In addition to the battalion transferred to Tientsin, one battalion has been sent to Wei-hai-wei for the defence of the convalescent depot established there for sick soldiers from Shanghai. The only naval change is that His Majesty's Ship "Enterprise" has proceeded from the China Station to the East Indies Station and His Majesty's Ship "Emerald" will do so shortly.

No negotiations are in progress with the Chinese authorities at Nanking or Hankow, but His Majesty's Consular Officers continue to deal with them regarding specific cases involving British interests as they arise.

Colonel DAY: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether there have been any casualties since the last statement he made amongst our forces in China?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: Not that I know of.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether the situation in Shanghai is still considered sufficiently dangerous to necessitate the retention of those armed forces?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: If we did not think that the situation necessitated it, we should not retain our forces there.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: Are they being retained there because of the present danger, or merely because of the expense of bringing them back?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: During a period of civil war there must always be danger.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: Will they remain there for ever?

Mr. THURTELL: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether his Department has any information as to the present relations existing between Hankow and Nanking—between Chiang Kai-shek and the Hankow Government?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: All I can say is, that we believe that Chiang Kai-shek regards the Communist element in Hankow with very little favour.

Mr. W. THORNE: May I ask, for about the tenth time, if the hon. Gentleman can state whether anyone outside is making an effort to bring this unfortunate quarrel between the two sections in China to an end?

Mr. WALLHEAD: May I ask whether His Majesty's Government attributes the more recent developments between these various armies in Northern China to machinations from Moscow?

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. Members should put those questions down on the Paper.

CONSTANTINOPLE LOAN, 1909.

10. Sir FREDRIC WISE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the position of the bondholders of the Constantinople Loan, 1909, which has as a security the Galata bridge tolls?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: Since the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend on the 22nd of February last, I have not received any information on the subject beyond what has appeared in the Press.

ARMS (PRIVATE MANUFACTURE).

12. Mr. DALTON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give any information regarding the draft texts, prepared in view of a Convention on the supervision of the private manufacture of arms and submitted to the Council of the League of Nations, by the special Commission appointed for this purpose?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The draft texts which will come before the Conference were issued to the representatives of the Press at Geneva during the recent meeting of the Council. They will in due course be published in the League of Nations Official Journal, which can be purchased in this country.

ROYAL NAVY.

CANTEENS.

13. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received a request from the Naval Canteen Service regarding the placing of all canteens under the management of the Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in the matter?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Lieut.-Colonel Headlam): A resolution to this effect which was passed at the last Headquarters Naval Canteen Committee has been communicated to the Admiralty and is receiving consideration.

OIL DISCHARGE.

14. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is to be understood, since the Admiralty have a special barge equipped with oil-separating plant at Portsmouth, that this barge is universally used and that no vessel in that area now discharges oil into the sea within a radius of 50 miles?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The oil separating barge at Portsmouth is used on every possible occasion. The answer to the second part of the question, so far as His Majesty's Ships and Naval Auxiliaries are concerned, is in the affirmative.

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Can the hon. and gallant Member say what is done with the oil when the barge is not used? Is it discharged into the sea?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I have already referred the hon. Member to an answer in which it is stated that it is not discharged into the sea. It is taken out into the open sea in the way I told him the other day.

TUG MASTERS.

15. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty what action it is proposed to take as a result of the representations made by the Association of First-class Masters of His Majesty's Tugs to the Civil Lord of the Admiralty and representatives of the Treasury, on 11th August, 1926, regarding increased remuneration and improved conditions of status and service for members of the association?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I have nothing to add to my reply of the 9th May (OFFICIAL REPORT, column 45).

UNEMPLOYMENT.

DURHAM COUNTY.

18. Mr. SPOOR asked the Minister of Labour if he is aware of the amount of distress in the district of Bishop Auckland, county Durham; whether he is aware that numbers of collieries are closing down and that men are being removed from the unemployment register without adequate reason and being compelled to apply to the board of guardians for relief; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made with a view to having this district regarded as a necessitous area?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of LABOUR (Mr. Betterton): As stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Mines on Thursday last, in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Houghton-le-Spring (Mr. R. Richardson) regarding mining areas generally, His Majesty's Government are aware of the present conditions in the mining industry, and are giving the matter their special consideration. I am unable to agree with the allegation that men are being removed from the register without adequate reason.

Mr. SPOOR: Is the hon. Member aware that large numbers of men who are thrown out of work as a result of these conditions are men with an experience of 30 and 40 years or more in mining, and that there is not the slightest doubt of their being reinstated under present conditions. To talk of alternative employment for such men is altogether absurd, if not really a fraud.

BRISTOL.

44. Mr. W. BAKER asked the Prime Minister whether he is aware that between 5,000 and 6,000 persons in the city of Bristol are in receipt of unemployment benefit each week and that 900 persons are signing weekly without the receipt of benefit; whether he is aware that for the week ending 25th May, 2,107 men, 2,125 women and 4,647 children, a total of 8,879 men, women and children were in receipt of relief from the guardians, the total cost for the week being £2,536 18s. 10d.; and whether, having regard to the position in the city of Bristol created by the long continued period of unemployment, he will consider additional relief schemes?

Mr. BETTERTON: I am aware that the number of persons in receipt of unemployment benefit and relief from the guardians is substantially as stated in the question. Schemes of work for the relief of persons unemployed are initiated by local authorities who are, I think, generally aware that schemes which satisfy the conditions for a grant from State funds should be submitted to the Unemployment Grants Committee.

[Mr. Betterton.]

Mr. W. THORNE: Is it not the case that in consequence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer "pinching" £12,000,000 out of the Road Fund, local authorities are prevented from carrying out much useful work?

TRADE UNIONS (STATISTICS).

19. Mr. ROSE asked the Minister of Labour if he is aware that no statistics of trades unions have been issued by the Registrar-General dealing with developments later than 1924; if he can explain the delay; and will he take measures to expedite the publication of particulars in connection with the years 1925 and 1926?

Mr. BETTERTON: A statistical summary showing the operations of registered trade unions for the year 1925 was issued by the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies in January, 1927. A similar summary for 1926 will be published towards the end of this year. The summaries are published within five months or less of the receipt of the returns containing the particulars. The returns have to be examined and abstracted before the totals can be arrived at, and there is no avoidable delay in their publication. Part 4 of the Report of the Chief Registrar, containing details as to the operations of trade unions is necessarily published sometime after the summary. That for the year 1926, dealing with the figures for 1925, should be ready about the end of October next.

ROYAL AIR FORCE.

MOORING MASTS, SOUTH AFRICA.

20. Colonel DAY asked the Secretary of State for Air whether the Government of the Union of South Africa have placed with the Air Ministry a contract for material for the erection of a standard mooring mast in South Africa for the use of the new Empire airships; what is the total cost of such material; and will the whole cost of this be defrayed by the South African Government?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for AIR (Sir Philip Sassoon): As regards the first two parts of the question, the Government of the Union of South Africa have requested the Air Ministry to place on their behalf a contract for a mooring mast base in that country, but the details have not yet been settled. The actual expense that will be involved cannot therefore be definitely stated. The answer to the last part of the question is in the affirmative.

Colonel DAY: Can the Under-Secretary say whether the Air Ministry has been requested by any other Government to provide mooring masts?

Sir P. SASSOON: That does not arise out of this question, but I believe the Government of Canada have asked for mooring masts.

Sir W. DAVISON: Can my hon. Friend say whether these mooring masts are now being made with lifts? Is he aware that hon. Members who went to Pulham about a year and a-half ago found that the climb of a hundred and forty foot vertical ladder rather a bit of a strain?

AUXILIARY AIR FORCE (FLYING OFFICERS).

21. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Air the age limits for qualified pilots joining the Auxiliary Air Force

Sir P. SASSOON: The minimum age limit for appointment to a commission in the Auxiliary Air Force for flying duties is 18 years. The maximum age limits for appointment are as follows:

Pilot or Flying Officer ...	25 years.
Flight Lieutenant ...	30 "
Squadron Leader ...	35 "
Wing Commander ...	40 "

The Air Council have discretionary power to give special consideration to the application of any candidate who is over the age limit but who is otherwise suitable.

DISPLAY, HENDON.

22. Mr. RENNIE SMITH asked the Secretary of State for Air if he can furnish particulars of the forthcoming air display at Hendon?

Sir P. SASSOON: The display, as in previous years, will be fully representative of the different aspects of the work of the Royal Air Force, and will afford the public an opportunity of witnessing the progress made in both civil and military aeronautics. Particulars of the more important events have appeared in the Press and in numerous advertisements and posters.

Miss WILKINSON: Does the Under-Secretary think that displays like the bombing of villages, which I understand is part of this display, are suitable for young children to witness?

Mr. MONTAGUE: May I ask whether the Air Ministry will consider importing a few real barbarians for this display?

Colonel GRETTON: Can the Under-Secretary say whether this display will entail any cost on the Exchequer?

Sir P. SASSOON: No, certainly not.

Miss WILKINSON: May I ask, if my question is not out of order, whether I am not entitled to an answer?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's question is more appropriate to the next question on the Paper.

23. Mr. RENNIE SMITH asked the Secretary of State for Air if he can give the names of the education authorities and other bodies which have been invited to send children to witness the air display at Hendon; what has been the response; and how many children are likely to attend?

Sir P. SASSOON: As regard the first part of the question, 73 invitations to the Royal Air Force display rehearsal on 1st July have been issued to education committees in the Metropolitan area and the Home Counties. Invitations have also been issued to Boy Scouts, Girl Guides and Church Lads' Brigades. I do not think that a list of the committees and bodies to whom the invitations have been sent would serve any useful purpose. As regards the remaining parts of the question, 50 invitations have been accepted up to the present, but I cannot give an estimate of the number of children who are likely to attend.

Miss WILKINSON: Can I ask now the question that I asked previously, namely, whether the Under-Secretary considers that these displays are suitable for young children to witness?

Sir P. SASSOON: Certainly.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Is the hon. Baronet aware that all these children in their schools are taught the Sermon on the Mount? Does he not think that there is some contradiction between the doctrine of the Sermon on the Mount and this particular display at Hendon?

Sir H. BRITAIN: Is it not a great deal better for them to witness British pluck in the air than to pay a visit to Soviet Russia?

Mr. PONSONBY: Will the hon. Baronet state whether the display will include a demonstration of the effects of poison gas?

Viscountess ASTOR: The display is not only for military purposes, surely? Is it not true that aviation may become a great commercial asset to this country, and that this display is not of value only for war purposes?

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

LAND REGISTRY (MESSENGERS).

24. Mr. KELLY asked the Attorney-General whether, seeing that Award A81 of the Civil Service Arbitration Board stipulated that the rates of pay and conditions therein laid down applied to all messengers in all London offices, he will see that these terms are granted to the messengers employed at His Majesty's Land Registry as from the date of the Award A81; whether he is aware that the reorganisation scheme for messengers at His Majesty's Land Registry, which was introduced in 1923, was never discussed by the Departmental Whitley Council nor with the representatives of the society to which the men belong; and whether, in these circumstances, he will see that the request for the full application of Award A81 is granted?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir Douglas Hogg): The men employed in His Majesty's Land Registry were not members of the classes to which Award A81 applied, their conditions of service and appointment and the method of their recruitment being different from those of the messengers in London offices referred to in the hon. Member's question. Full details of the reorganisation scheme of 1923 were explained to the representatives of the society to which the men belonged, and accepted by them,

[The Attorney General.] except on one point, which is not now material. In these circumstances the request cannot be granted.

Mr. KELLY: Was the notification which was made to a particular society made within recent months?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know what the date is, but I will ascertain for the hon. Gentleman.

OFFICE OF WORKS (SIR FRANK BAINES).

25. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether he proposes to reduce the staff of his Department, in view of the fact that it was thought possible for one of his senior officials to accept an outside contract while employed on full-time work in his Department?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Captain Hacking for The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS): It has been decided to abolish the post of Director of Works on the retirement of Sir F. Baines from the service on or about the 1st September next.

26. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether the conditions under which Sir Frank Baines was employed in the Government service permitted him to enter into a contract for service with a private company without the consent of the First Commissioner?

Captain HACKING: The conditions under which architects and other professional officers in the Department are allowed to accept commissions in their professional capacity from individual persons or private firms were given in detail in my reply to the hon. Member's question on the 26th May. The whole question for the future is under consideration.

40. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the amount of the pension to be paid to Sir Frank Baines upon his retirement from the Government service on 1st September?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): I am not yet in a position to give this information, as the Treasury are still awaiting the detailed particulars necessary for the determination of the amount to be awarded under the provisions of Section 7 of the Superannuation Act, 1859.

Mr. HARDIE: Can any civil servant, while in the employ of the Government, undertake any work under any form of contract?

Mr. McNEILL: I could not answer that question in such general terms without notice.

Mr. MORRISON: In view of the fact that this civil servant has been retired compulsorily because he was unable to get out of a contract that he had made with a private company, can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he is entitled to the same rate of superannuation as he would have received if he had served his term in the ordinary way?

Mr. McNEILL: His superannuation will be on a different basis altogether, and, as I have already told the hon. Member, I cannot yet state what the amount will be.

Mr. HARDIE: Is it a fact that this civil servant, while in the employ of the Government, was taking contract work from private firms outside? Is that the case or is it not?

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Is it not also a fact that he did a good day's work for the Department?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question about the particular case should be addressed to the Office of Works. A question was put on that matter two or three days ago.

SALARIES.

37. Mr. HORE-BELISHA (for Mr. E. BROWN) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what are the percentages of civil servants earning less than £3 a week, £3 to £3 10s., £3 10s. to £4, £4 to £5, etc., up to £500 a year?

Mr. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Brown) to the answer I gave to an identical question put by him on the 23rd June.

KING'S ROLL.

38. Mr. HORE-BELISHA (for Mr. E. BROWN) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury how many Government Departments and Government industrial establishments, respectively, are on the King's Roll?

Mr. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Brown) to the answer which I gave to him on the 5th May last.

Sir W. DAVISON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether all local authorities are now on the King's Roll?

Mr. W. THORNE: Is Kensington?

Sir W. DAVISON: Yes.

CONTINENTAL MEAT (EMBARGO).

28. Mr. W. THORNE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he is aware of the fact that Sweden is clear of foot-and-mouth disease; that the Netherlands reported last month only three cases in total in place of thousands reported this time last year; that Friesland has been clear for some period now; and whether he intends raising the embargo, particularly for Dutch meat?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Guinness): I am aware that the incidence of foot-and-mouth disease has diminished in Western Europe during the past few months, but in May there were five outbreaks in Sweden and 26 in the Netherlands, four of which occurred in the Province of Friesland. I will circulate in the OFFICIAL REPORT details of the cases in Western European countries during the present year. In view of the grave risk of the disease spreading between contiguous countries with extensive land boundaries, I cannot contemplate a withdrawal of the embargo on Continental meat until I am satisfied that all the Western European countries are comparatively free from foot-and-mouth disease for a period long enough to ensure that the disease is under effective control.

Mr. THORNE: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that in consequence of this embargo on foreign meat, the Government are reducing the real wages in this country of about 18,000,000 wage-earners?

Mr. GUINNESS: I do not think it can be shown that there has been any appreciable rise in the price of meat throughout the country. It is also very important to realise that we have saved a great deal of money to the State by stamping out foot-and-mouth disease in this country.

Mr. THORNE: The Minister must be aware that in consequence of the embargo, the Government have raised the price of meat from a halfpenny to a penny per pound.

Following is the statement:

The following statement shows the number of outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in the countries mentioned during 1927:

Total—January to May, 1927.
Norway	4
Sweden	156
Denmark	1,692
Germany	7,036
Netherlands	596
Belgium	587
France	2,392
Poland	8,935

TELEPHONE SERVICE.

29. Sir H. BRITTAIN asked the Postmaster-General whether, seeing that Great Britain possesses but 31 telephones per 1,000 inhabitants as compared with Australia's 68, New Zealand's 94, and Canada's 130, he is assured that everything possible is being done to increase the telephone service in this country by every available means?

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir William Mitchell-Thomson): I am satisfied that the steps taken by the Post Office to extend and develop the telephone service of Great Britain are designed to secure the best results and that no effort is spared in the pursuance of this object.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, who is a true business man, whether any big commercial concern would be unable to make a statement as to the amount spent per annum in publicity and canvassing? That is admittedly the case with the Post Office.

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMPSON: I do not think that is so. It is impossible to deal with this matter by means of question and answer. I have already told my hon. Friend that the Contracts Branch is a separate Branch, and I am perfectly prepared to give the figures for that Branch.

Colonel DAY: Is it not a fact that many people who have signed contracts for telephones even now cannot get them fitted up speedily?

Viscountess ASTOR: Would it not be better for the Government to advertise increased telephone facilities instead of drink in Post Office publications?

FRANCE (COAL IMPORTS).

30. Sir F. WISE asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department the imports of coal into France from Britain, Germany, and the United States from 1st January to as convenient a date as possible for the years 1914 and 1927, respectively?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Sir Burton Chadwick): With my hon. Friend's permission, a table will be circulated in the OFFICIAL REPORT giving the information he asks for.

Following is the table:

Country whence Imported.	January to April.
	1914.	1927.
	Tons.	Tons.
Great Britain ...	4,141,483	3,081,205
Germany ...	1,362,481	†2,909,715
United States of America	*	451,091

*Not recorded: the total imports from the United States of America during 1914 only amounted to 29,962 tons.

†Includes deliveries from Germany on account of Reparations amounting to 2,014,759 tons.

In comparing these figures, the following differences in the scope of the French statistics should be borne in mind:

(1) Alsace Lorraine is included in the France of 1927 but not in that of 1914, and the Saar Territory is now treated for the purposes of the trade records as part of France. Thus, the French returns of imports now include imports into Alsace-Lorraine from Germany, and exclude imports from the Saar Basin.

(2) Foreign coal used in French ports for bunkering purposes on French ships in the foreign trade was excluded from the record of imports in 1914, but is now included in that record. The total amount of these bunkers in January-April, 1914, was 399,718 tons.

GIRL'S DEATH, INVERGOWNE.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is aware that a girl was found drowned at Invergowne on 12th June, her body kept in an outhouse for a week, and then buried unidentified and without being photographed; and whether he is satisfied that all proper and possible steps have been taken by the authorities?

The SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Sir John Gilmour): Inquiries about the case referred to in the question are in progress, but my information is not yet complete. Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat his question next week.

SOLICITATION LAWS.

32. Viscountess ASTOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the promised Committee of Inquiry on the Solicitation Laws has yet been appointed; and, if not, if he can now say when it will be appointed, and what will be the terms of reference?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Captain Hacking): It is proposed that the Terms of Reference of this Committee shall be to inquire into the law and practice regarding offences against the criminal law in connection with prostitution and solicitation for immoral purposes in streets and public places, and other similar offences against decency and good order, and to report what changes (if any) are in their opinion desirable. My right hon. Friend hopes to complete at an early date the selection of members to serve on this Committee.

RUSSIANS (DEPARTURE).

33. Sir F. HALL asked the Home Secretary whether the member of the Soviet Mission in London who was warned to leave this country but had not done so recently, has yet left and, if not, what is the name and record of this person; and what steps are being taken to expedite his departure?

Captain HACKING: Yes, Sir. This individual left on the 22nd instant. When my right hon. Friend made his statement on 23rd instant the previous day's reports had not come in.

FINANCE BILL.

INCOME TAX AND SUPER-TAX.

35. Sir JOHN MARRIOTT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the number of persons assessable to Income Tax and the number assessable to Super-tax for the year ending 31st March, 1927, or the latest date available?

Mr. R. McNEILL: My hon. Friend will find the latest estimates of the numbers of taxpayers in Tables 53 and 67 of the 69th Annual Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

DIRECT AND INDIRECT TAXATION (RATIO).

36. Sir J. MARRIOTT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the ratio between direct and indirect taxation for each of the years ending 31st March, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927?

Mr. McNEILL: With my hon. Friend's permission, I will circulate these figures in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following are the figures:

The ratio between the yield of direct taxation, including Excess Profits Duty and indirect taxation was:

	Direct.	Indirect.
Year to 31st March,
1919	79.5*	20.5
1920	72.0*	28.0
1921	68.16*	31.84
1922	62.71	37.29
1923	64.42	35.58
1924	63.46	36.54
1925	66.93	33.07
1926	65.99	34.01
1927	64.43	35.57
The pre-War figure was	57.5	42.5

*Includes very large payments for Excess Profits Duty.

EMPIRE MARKETING BOARD.

41. Major BRAITHWAITE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies what sums of money have been used by the Empire Marketing Board to advertise and sell the home-grown products of the British farmer?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Amery): No special allocation of the sums devoted by the Empire Marketing Board to advertising is made between the different parts of the Empire, but the policy of the Board's advertising is to encourage the public to ask first for the produce of their own country and next for the produce of the oversea parts of the Empire.

Major BRAITHWAITE: May I ask whether, in the depressing conditions of agriculture at the present time, some of this money could not usefully be allocated to helping our own farmers?

Mr. AMERY: This is money given in pursuance of a pledge, specifically in lieu of certain preferences which would have benefited the Dominions, but, by agreement with the other Governments of the Empire, the money is largely used for the help of agriculture.

Mr. HARDIE: Has it come under the view of the Government that owing to the lack of transport and other conditions obtaining in the North of Scotland, practically the whole of the produce there is being lost?

FEDERATED MALAY STATES (WOMEN AND GIRLS).

42. Viscountess ASTOR asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that the Government has approved an amendment to the Federated Malay States Women and Girls Protection Enactment, whereby a prostitute suspected of being venereally diseased may be compulsorily examined, he will explain the reason for authorising this amendment, which appears to be inconsistent with the general principles laid down in the 1925 Report of the Advisory Committee to the Colonial Office on Singapore; and whether he will call this Committee together again to consider this amendment, and others of a like character, and report upon them?

Mr. AMERY: The object of the amendment is to prevent brothel-keepers from evading the provisions of the law which prohibits their permitting a woman suffering from contagious disease to remain in the brothel. There was previously no power to order the medical examination of a prostitute. Thus the object of the law has been defeated by brothel-keepers instigating prostitutes to object to medical examination. There is no question of any general compulsory and periodical examination. The amendment has received my approval, and I do not consider it necessary to call the former Committee together again to consider it.

[Mr. Amery.]

BRITISH GUIANA.

43. Mr. AMMON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the statement containing the comments of the financial representative of the Combined Court, British Guiana, upon the Report of the Parliamentary Commissioners who visited British Guiana last winter will be presented to Parliament, so that Members may have an opportunity of considering it in connection with the Report of the Commissioners?

Mr. AMERY: I have not yet received the statement of the views of the elective section of the Combined Court, which I understand is on its way. The question of its presentation to Parliament, together with any other papers on the subject, will be considered when it has been received.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY (BRITISH DELEGATION).

45. Mr. BRIANT asked the Prime Minister if he will consider the advisability of including a woman as a fully accredited delegate in the Government's delegation to the Assembly of the League of Nations next September at Geneva?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: A woman will be included in the British Delegation to the next Assembly, which will be composed as follows:

Delegates:

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Sir Cecil Hurst, Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office.

Substitute Delegates:

The Earl of Onslow, Under-Secretary of State for War.

Sir Edward Hilton Young, M.P.

Major Walter Elliot, Under-Secretary of State for Scotland.

Dame Edith Lyttelton.

The substitute delegates receive credentials in the same form as the delegates, and, in practice, their functions differ hardly at all.

Miss WILKINSON: Is it not possible to include a woman as a fully accredited delegate, since the right hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well that a substitute delegate at Geneva has not the same status as a fully accredited delegate would have?

Viscountess ASTOR: Hear, hear!

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I think the hon. Ladies are under a misapprehension. Substitute delegates are fully accredited, and, if one of the delegates is absent, a substitute delegate takes the absent delegate's place. They have exactly the same standing.

Miss WILKINSON: Is it not the case, on the hon. Gentleman's own statement, that while the fully accredited delegates attend and take their part in the proceedings, a substitute delegate is only able to take a full share in the deliberations if a fully accredited delegate is absent? How does the hon. Gentleman reconcile his own statement with his reply?

Mr. THURTLÉ: Will the Government see that all delegates sent to represent this country at Geneva are the best delegates possible, irrespective of sex?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I think the list which I have read out shows that they are. The substitute delegates take a full part in the deliberations. They take their full share. We made a similar arrangement last year, and it was regarded with full satisfaction by all parties concerned.

Viscountess ASTOR: Is it not true that other countries, Germany for instance, send a woman as a fully-accredited delegate, and not as a substitute?

HOUSE OF LORDS.

47. Mr. BRIANT asked the Prime Minister if he will make provision for the inclusion of women in the Upper House in any proposals to be submitted to the Houses of Parliament?

46 and 48. Mr. LANSBURY asked the Prime Minister (1) whether it is intended that women shall be eligible to serve as elected Members of the House of Lords;

(2) whether, in connection with the scheme for the reform of the House of Lords, any decision has been arrived at with regard to the payment of salaries to elected members?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Winston Churchill): It is premature to answer these Questions of detail, but no doubt an opportunity will soon arise to discuss them in Debate.

Mr. CLYNES: Are we to take that answer as meaning that the Government have no statement to make in this House on the question of House of Lords reform until the Debate has been begun in this House?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I think, on the whole, that would be a fairly safe conclusion to draw.

Mr. BRIANT: Does the right hon. Gentleman regard the inclusion of women as only a detail of the scheme; and, considering that the number of women voters at the next Election promises to be larger than the number of men voters, would it not be wise and just if women were included in the Upper Chamber?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I think the answer to that question is fully conveyed in the answer which I have already given.

Sir F. HALL: Would it not solve all these difficulties if the Government were to leave alone this question of extending the franchise to women of 21?

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is it not a fact that the Government have abandoned these proposals for the present?

Mr. CHURCHILL: No, Sir. I have not heard of anything that could justify me in making a statement of that kind.

Sir COOPER RAWSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman able to say whether the author of Question 48 on the Paper is looking ahead?

TEACHERS' SALARIES, COVENTRY.

27. Mr. HORE-BELISHA (for Mr. ERNEST BROWN) asked the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that teachers serving under the Coventry Education Authority are not receiving salary increments in accordance with paragraph 3 (a) (11) of the Third Report of the Joint Standing Committee and the Board's Regulations thereon; and whether, seeing that such teachers are entitled to either one increment at the conclusion of two years' service or seven-twelfths at the commencement of the financial year after serving one year and seven months, he will take the necessary steps to secure that the Coventry Education Authority adjust the increments in accordance with the standard scales and the Board's Regulations thereon?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of EDUCATION (Duchess of Atholl): My right hon. Friend has received no representations on this matter, and as the Burnham Report provides machinery for its interpretation he sees no present ground for intervention on his part.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

NIGEL CLAUDIAN DALZIEL COLMAN, esquire, for the Borough of Lambeth (Brixton Division).

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,

Amendments to—

Yorkshire Electric Power Bill [Lords], without Amendment.

PRIVATE LEGISLATION PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1899.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS reported, That, after conferring with the Chairman of Committees of the House of Lords, for the purpose of determining in which House of Parliament the respective Bills introduced pursuant to the provisions of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1899, should be first considered, they had determined that the following Bill should originate in the House of Lords, namely:—

Dundee Corporation (Substituted Bill).

Report to lie upon the Table.

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill,

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Orders confirmed];

Report to lie upon the Table.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Maidstone Corporation (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; Report to lie upon the Table.

Bill to be read the Third time To-morrow.

Mexborough and Swinton Tramways Company (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Order confirmed]; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Southend-on-Sea Corporation (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Order confirmed]; Report to lie upon the Table.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Rotherham Corporation (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; Report to lie upon the Table.

Bill to be read the Third time To-morrow.

Bognor Gas and Electricity Bill [Lords],
Maidstone Water Bill [Lords],

Littlehampton Harbour and Arun Drainage Outfall Bill [Lords],

Reported, with Amendments; Reports to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

St. Catharine's College, Cambridge (Canonship of Norwich) Bill [Lords],

Reported, without Amendment; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Bill to be read the Third time.

CHAIRMEN'S PANEL.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Chairmen's Panel; That they had appointed Sir Samuel Roberts to act as Chairman of Standing Committee A (in respect of the Wild Birds' Protection Bill).

Report to lie upon the Table.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

STANDING COMMITTEE A.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee A: Brigadier-General Warner; and had appointed in substitution: Sir Alfred Hopkinson.

Report to lie upon the Table.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

INDIA OFFICE (TYPISTS).

Mr. TOWNEND asked the Under-Secretary of State for India what is the number of Grades 1 and 2 shorthand typists, and Grades 1 and 2 copying typists, respectively, employed by his Department; and what is the average length of service of those concerned?

Earl WINTERTON: The numbers are as follow:

Shorthand Typists, Grade I	...	1
Shorthand Typists, Grade II	...	1
Copying Typists, Grade I	...	5
Copying Typists, Grade II	...	2

The average length of service of those concerned is two years and nine months.

(Note.—Only the temporary typing staff is classified in grades, not the established staff.)

OFFICE OF WORKS (TYPISTS).

Mr. TOWNEND asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, what is the number of Grades 1 and 2 shorthand-typist and Grades 1 and 2 copying typists, respectively, employed by his Department; and what is the average length of service of those concerned?

Captain HACKING (for the FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS): The numbers of temporary shorthand typists and temporary typists employed in the Office of Works are as follow:

Grade I.—Shorthand Typists ...	15
Grade II.—Shorthand Typists ...	9
Grade I.—Typists ...	5
Grade II.—Typists ...	6
Grade III.—Typists... ..	1

Of these, eight have served for less than one year, eight from one to three years, seven from three to five years, and 13 upwards of five years. The average length of service of all members of these classes is four years three months.

EX-SERVICE MEN (PROMOTION).

Mr. E. BROWN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Board of Customs and Excise have issued an instruction asking collectors and heads of departments to recommend a certain number of departmental clerks for promotion to the officers' grade; that an age limit of 30 has been imposed, and that this rules out all Lytton and Southborough entrants; and whether he will be prepared to arrange for a scheme whereby Lytton and Southborough entrants can be allowed to deduct from their present age their years of Army service?

Mr. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given to an almost identical question by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Bromley Division (Lieut.-Colonel James) on the 23rd June.

BEEF SUGAR SUBSIDY.

Mr. THURTELL asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the total cost to the Exchequer, by way of subsidy and remission of Excise Duty, in respect of the last financial year, in connection with the manufacture of sugar from home-grown beet?

Mr. GUINNESS: I have been asked to reply. The expenditure during the financial year ended 31st March, 1927, in respect of subsidy on home-grown beet sugar and molasses was £3,225,858. Of this amount, approximately £1,004,300 was returned to the State in the form of Excise Duty. There has been no remission of Excise Duty since the passing of the British Sugar (Subsidy) Act, 1925.

SUGAR (CLEARANCES).

Sir J. POWER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the clearances for home consumption, since 1st April, of foreign refined sugar, British refined sugar, and home-grown sugar, respectively?

Mr. McNEILL: The quantities cleared during the two months April and May, 1927, were:

	Cwts.
Imported refined sugar ...	2,029,000
British refined sugar ...	2,744,000
Sugar manufactured from home-grown beet ...	295,000

POST OFFICE.

PUBLIC TELEPHONE BOXES.

Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Postmaster-General who is responsible for disinfecting and cleaning of public telephone boxes situated inside shops or upon private premises?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The call office attendant.

INSURANCE.

Major EDMONDSON asked the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the starting of national contributory pensions, he is prepared to continue accepting new business under the Post Office insurance scheme?

Sir W. MITCHELL-THOMSON: The matter is under the consideration of the Government, and I am unable at present to make any statement.

UNEMPLOYMENT (TWO MONTHS' FILE).

Sir J. POWER asked the Minister of Labour the number of uninsured persons now in the two months' file; and whether there has been any recent investigation into a proportion of the men on this file with a view to determining how many of these persons are working in uninsured occupations, how many are receiving help from the guardians, and how many have died?

Mr. BETTERTON: The two months' file consists of unemployment books, and therefore relates exclusively to persons who were insured when information was last available with regard to them. There has been no special investigation of the file, but among others the books of all persons known to be at work or to be deceased would be excluded from it under the ordinary procedure.

IODINE TREATMENT (SCHOOL CHILDREN).

Sir R. THOMAS asked the President of the Board of Education if his attention has been drawn to the improvement which has been observed in the condition of goitrous and mentally-backward children in Cumberland as a result of the iodised tablets given to them in the schools during the past 12 months; and whether he will circulate particulars of this method of iodine therapy?

Lord E. PERCY: I am aware of the observations which are being made in Cumberland and elsewhere in the iodine treatment of goitre and other conditions of school children. The matter is dealt with in the Chief Medical Officer's Reports for 1924 and 1925 and will, I understand, be the subject of further reference in his next report. Any action on my part would, I think, at the present stage be premature.

ROYAL NAVY.

A.F.O. 3277.

Mr. R. YOUNG asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Order A.F.O. 3277, 20th November, 1925, is still in force, or whether any departure has been made from the terms of the order and, if so, by whose authority was the departure made; and whether any notice was given of any proposed alterations?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The remainder does not, therefore, arise.

INVALIDS (TRANSPORT).

Sir B. FALLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the present system of transport of invalids from foreign stations affords continuity of treatment on the passage home to sick naval ratings?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The reply is in the affirmative.

HAMMOCKS.

Sir B. FALLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether a decision has been arrived at as to the introduction of waterproof covers for hammocks for men travelling?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: It has been decided not to incur the expense of introducing waterproof covers, but an Admiralty Fleet Order is about to be issued on the subject of the protection of the hammocks and bedding of men travelling.

CANDIDATES (BIRTH CERTIFICATES).

Sir B. FALLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that on entering the service candidates are required to produce their birth certificate and that this birth certificate is retained by the Admiralty; and whether he will authorise the return of all birth certificates after the necessary information has been obtained and registered?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The statement in the first part of the question is correct, but the birth certificate is always returned if the candidate asks for it.

METROPOLITAN POLICE ATHLETIC GROUNDS.

Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary whether, in view of the lack of accommodation at the recreation grounds at Imber Court, which is used by playing and non-playing officers of the Metropolitan Police Athletic Association, he will consider the appointment of a Departmental Committee for the purpose of considering and recommending ways and means of providing the special amenities needed?

Sir W. JOYNSON HICKS: I do not think this is a question for inquiry by a Departmental Committee.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[10TH ALLOTTED DAY.]

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. CHARLES EDWARDS in the Chair.]

CIVIL ESTIMATES, 1927. [Progress.]

CLASS V.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,943,593, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1928, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Ministry of Health; including Grants and other Expenses in connection with Housing, Grants to Local Authorities, etc., in connection with Public Health Services, Grants-in-Aid in respect of Benefits and Expenses of Administration under the National Health Insurance Acts, certain Expenses in connection with the 'Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, and certain Special Services."—[Note: £6,500,000 has been voted on account."]

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Mr. Chamberlain): Last year, in presenting the Estimates for the Ministry of Health to the Committee, I had to account for an increase of £40,000 over the Estimate for the preceding 12 months. This year there is a further increase of a little more than £1,105,000, but I do not imagine that on that account I shall be accused of extravagance, because the increases are really due to causes which operate automatically and are, moreover, brought about by policies which have been approved in all quarters of the House. Some £960,000 is accounted for by an increase in the number of houses upon which subsidy is paid, and there is a further increase of £171,000 in the grant-in-aid for health purposes, and there is still another £91,000 increase in the cost of administration, which is, of course, due to the additional staff required for the purposes of the Contributory Pensions Act. I do not imagine that any of those figures will be challenged, and, therefore, I do not think it is necessary for me to detain the Committee by going into any special details in connection with them, but, of course, if there are questions upon which any hon. Member desires further information, I hope to be able to supply him with what he desires in the course of the Debate. I think perhaps it would be of greater interest to the Committee if I were to pick out one or two of the salient features of the activities of my Department in order to give the Committee some idea of the field over which we range and the scope of our activities.

Coming now to the question of housing, it will be seen that the amount provided, which is £9,840,000, is nearly half of the total Estimate, amounting approximately to £19,500,000, and I think the Committee will like to know what we are getting for the expenditure of so large a sum of money. In order to give a comparison, I would mention that in the five years preceding the War the average number of houses built in this country was about 61,000. Taking the last three years—in each case the 12 months ended 31st March—the number built in 1925 was 137,000; in 1926 it rose to 173,000; and in 1927 to 217,000. That is really an astonishing, a prodigious effort on the part of this country, which I do not think can be paralleled anywhere else in the world, and although one does not wish to claim more credit than is due to the Government, at any rate I think we are entitled to say that the conditions which have been provided by the Government have acted as the most efficient stimulus to the building industry that could be conceived. The number which we thus find added to the common pool, looked at from that point of view, is so great that, as it proceeds, there cannot be any doubt that its effects will be felt right through every class of the population, and I feel confident myself that we are approaching the time when we may hope to see some much more active progress made with the improvement of the conditions in the slums than has been possible during all these years, when it was found difficult to deal with them, first, because of the scarcity of labour and materials, and also because of the fact that there was nowhere for people to go who might be displaced from the houses in which they were living.

But there is another aspect of the housing question which is not so satisfactory. I am, myself, very much concerned about the cost of these new houses, which appears to me to be far too high. I think the problem before us at the moment is to see how we are going to get that cost reduced, and there are two ways in which it may be reduced. One of them concerns the size of the house. There is very little doubt that the rents which have to be charged for the bulk of the new houses now being built are inflicting a very great strain upon the resources of those who are paying them, while they make it absolutely impossible for many others to obtain the accommodation which they desire in a new house, because it is altogether beyond their means. I myself, am not in favour of lowering the standard of housing, but it is no use to blink facts, and while it is very easy to be eloquent about the difference between the houses occupied by the rich or the poor, as a matter of fact you cannot divide the population by a sharp line into two categories of that kind. [An Hon. Member: "They are already divided."] No. they are not divided into two categories. There is every possible gradation between the rich and the poor, and each category must adapt its methods of life to its means. [Laughter.] The hon. Member opposite laughs, but I thought I was speaking what was almost a truism. What I want particularly to emphasise is that you cannot pick out of the general budget of the housekeeper one particular item, namely, the rent of the house, and consider that that is to be free of the restrictions which naturally apply to all the other expenses of the household. It applies to every item in the budget. Everything must be adapted to the question of means, or otherwise they will come to disaster. I think it is a mistake to assume that every family wants a bigger house which not only ranks higher in rent than the house which they are now occupying but which means more work in cleaning and more expense to keep warm.

[Mr. Chamberlain.]

Mr. PALIN: The modern house means less.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member says, "The modern house means less." What I am saying is that a large house means more work in cleaning than a small one.

HON. MEMBERS: Not necessarily.

Mr. PALIN: I have never seen a corporation house which will give much difficulty on that score.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Perhaps the hon. Member has not talked to so many working people as I have. Local authorities are finding that they are getting towards the end of that section of the community who can pay the rents of houses such as they are now erecting, and that being so, I think they are wise in remembering that what they have to compare is not a small new house with a large new house, but a small new house with the houses in which people are living now, or the room in a house in which people are living now, and that if they do, as many of them desire to, build houses which contain all the necessities of life but with somewhat smaller accommodation than those which the people have been in the habit of living in lately, they will probably be meeting the wishes of the greater number of their inhabitants.

But there is another method by which I think people may be helped to obtain houses which they can afford to live in. Last December I asked the House to approve a Draft Order under which the subsidies payable under the Acts of 1923 and 1924 would be reduced as from October next by an amount which was equivalent to a capital sum of £25 per house. I based that proposal upon the assumption that some part, at any rate, of the present cost of houses was actually due to the subsidy itself.

Mr. MacLAREN: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I said I thought that the figures in our possession indicated that there was a definite correlation between the prices of new houses and the amount of subsidy given. I showed that the price of houses had gone up as the subsidy had been increased, and I argued that it might well be reasoned that if the subsidy were reduced the cost of houses would be reduced also. That proposal met with the strongest disapproval from hon. Members opposite. They exhausted themselves in prophecies of disaster. The right hon. Member for Shettleston (Mr. Wheatley) said this was going to wreck the building industry. The Liberal party put up two speakers to express the view that this would mean an increase in rents, although, of course, we had some of the party in the Lobby with us, and there were others who did not vote at all—pursuing the usual plan. The hon. Member for Nelson and Colne (Mr. Greenwood), whom I am sorry not to see here, said that unless the price of houses came down by at least £25 either the rents or the rates must go up. That, I am bound to say, seemed to me a self-evident proposition, but the point of his statement was that he himself believed there was no possibility of any such reduction in the price as he suggested was necessary to prevent this rise in rents or rates. I am happy to say that events have completely justified the predictions I made when I asked the House to approve that Draft Order. The prices of non-parlour houses, which before the commencement of the withdrawal of the subsidy had ranged from £440 to £450, fell immediately to the neighbourhood of £425. Since then there has been a still further drop.

Mr. MacLAREN: For houses giving the same accommodation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, exactly the same—until the very last month, when the average size of the houses has been distinctly smaller, but, then, the price has actually gone down to something below £400. So we see that the result of reducing the subsidy has not been to wreck the industry, it has not put up rents and it has reduced the price of houses. So much for housing; but before I go to an entirely different subject I would like to say something about town planning, which is a kindred subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE: Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of housing, will he explain to the Committee just precisely why the reduction has come about as a result of the lowering of the subsidy? What is the cause of that reduction? Who has been doing the robbing?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I would refer the hon. Member to the speech I made when I submitted the Draft Order to the House, in which I did explain exactly what I thought would happen. As that has happened, perhaps the hon. Member will forgive me if I do not take up the time of the Committee in repeating what I said. I am glad to be able to record that public appreciation of the value of town planning seems to be generally increasing. Local authorities and the public generally are realising that careful prevision in the method of development of any given area is a real practical economy. It saves unnecessary and wasteful expenditure in the future, and, at the same time, preserves amenities and conveniences for the public. At the present time some 2,700,000 acres are covered by town planning and regional planning schemes of various kinds. The development of regional planning is of the greatest importance, because it is obvious that to plan a limited area without regard to what will happen in the surrounding areas must necessarily mean a good deal of wasted time, and may lead to the adoption of plans which subsequently will have to be altered. Therefore, I am very glad to know that the adoption of regional planning, which involves the co-operation of a great number of local authorities—the Committees include a total of 621 authorities—is proceeding so rapidly and smoothly, and I think further progress in this direction will be very valuable for the country as a whole.

In those schemes and otherwise local authorities are beginning to make much greater provision than they have done in the past for playing fields. I would like to pay my tribute of gratitude and admiration to the National Playing Fields Association, which is carrying on a great movement in the country under the leadership of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, who in this matter has once again shown his great devotion to the service of the country and the Empire. In this connection there are two matters of special interest to London. One is that steps have at last been taken to set up a Regional Committee for Greater London. That is a problem which has engaged the attention of local authorities and of Governments for many years past. Greater London presents problems which are unique in the constitution of its local authorities, and in the extent of its area, and, while I do not expect that progress in this direction will be very rapid, yet it is satisfactory to think that there is now going to be a body set up to examine those problems as a whole, and not merely to treat them from a sectional point of view.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the preservation of London

[Mr. Chamberlain.] squares. There has been a good deal of anxiety expressed about the future of the London squares, not unnaturally, in view of what has happened in particular cases. A little while ago the London County Council passed a resolution asking the Government to make an inquiry into the best way of preserving London squares. The Government have accepted the view of the London County Council. We propose to set up a Royal Commission to go into the whole question, and I hope before very long to be able to announce the members of the Commission and the Terms of Reference.

Miss WILKINSON: Will the Terms of Reference include the opening of certain squares for the children to play in?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am afraid I cannot say yet what the Terms of Reference will be.

Mr. CRAWFORD: Concerning the Royal Commission to be appointed to deal with London squares, will the right hon. Gentleman be more precise about the progress made with regard to the regional authority for Greater London?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I called a conference of the authorities concerned, and they are appointing representatives on the regional committee. I come now to another question. I had not intended to say anything about the administration of boards of guardians this afternoon, because the subject was fully debated on Monday night, but I must take some notice of a statement which was made on that occasion by the hon. Member for the Stratford Division of West Ham (Mr. Groves). The hon. Member for Stratford on that occasion said he had never been accused of making an extravagant statement, but I am afraid I must now make a beginning in that direction, because he made a statement which I can only characterise as extravagant. The hon. Member for Stratford stated that relief had been given during the general strike to a number of persons without conditions, and that since the new guardians had been in office people had been engaged in writing up in the books against the sums paid in relief to various individuals during the general strike the words "On loan." In other words, as I understand the statement, the hon. Member accused the administration under the new guardians of endeavouring to falsify the books so as to enable the guardians to recover the relief given to those individuals during the general strike, although that relief was given to them without their knowledge that it was to be considered as having been granted on loan. That is a very serious charge to make against a board of guardians, and if it could be substantiated and shown that such a course was taken by the authority and with the knowledge of the guardians themselves, it would be such a condemnation of them as would certainly require the most serious attention of the Minister of Health. I do not think that a statement of such gravity ought to be made without the hon. Member making himself fully acquainted with the facts beforehand. I am glad that the hon. Member made the statement in this House, because it does give me an opportunity of telling the Committee what is the information which I have received upon this subject from the chairman of the board of guardians. He says:

"During the general strike relief was given in this union, and the relief so given was, according to practice entered upon the relieving officer's record cards. It was on these cards that the words 'On loan' were written at the time, and they were signed by the applicants. It is this card which is produced in Court when proceedings are taken to recover relief so given. During the general strike this special relief was not entered in the application and report book by the relieving officer under instructions. So far as I can discover beyond the transfer to the application and report books during two or three weeks after the close of the general strike, and in no case after the 18th July last, of the words already existing on the relieving officer's record cards, no entries such as described by the hon. Member in the House of Commons have been made in the books referred to."

The real fact is that where relief was given on loan the words "on loan" were put on the relieving officers' record cards at the time, and they were signed by the applicants, so that it is quite without foundation to say that they did not know that relief was given on loan, and the entries made in the application book have merely been the transfer of the information already on the record cards and in no sense constitute any alteration of the records.

Mr. PALIN: Were those entries signed by the chairman of the relief committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I said the cards were signed by the applicants. The hon. Member is asking something about the old guardians.

Mr. PALIN: Yes, you are telling us something about the old guardians.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The charge which I am dealing with has been made against the new guardians. The hon. Member who has interrupted me is not concerned with West Ham.

Mr. PALIN: I put my question in a perfectly friendly spirit in order to get information, because I know it is usual for the chairman, or whoever presides over the relief committee, to sign the report and application book or the card, and I want to know if that was done in these particular cases.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: That is entirely irrelevant to the point with which I am dealing. The point I am dealing with is the charge made that the new guardians falsified the books, or that somebody else falsified them on their behalf, and I hope the hon. Member for Stratford will, in due course, withdraw the charge which he has made.

Mr. GROVES: I will deal with it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I now come to the question of National Health Insurance which is closely associated with the administration of the Contributory Pensions Act. The administration of the latter Act has necessitated an increase in my staff which accounts for £90,000 of the increase in the Estimates. That is very largely in connection with the claims of the people who will be able to obtain old age pensions next year after attainment of the age of 65. Already we have had some 324,000 claims which are, of course, undergoing examination at the present time. Meanwhile, I may mention that pensions and allowances have already been awarded to widows and orphans by which no less than 714,000 persons have benefited under this Act. With regard to Health Insurance proper, I would like to say something about the additional benefits which have been provided out of the surpluses disclosed upon the second valuation of approved societies. The Committee may possibly remember that nearly £24,000,000 was shown to be available for distribution under the second valuation, but, out of that £24,000,000, over £11,000,000 has already been allocated by the societies for additional cash benefits, leaving therefore some £12,000,000 available for non-cash benefits. That £12,000,000 is again increased by the State grant and interest until it has reached the astonishing sum of £18,000,000 available for distribution in treatment benefits during the five years which are covered by the surpluses under this valuation. This means that all together some £3,750,000 a year can be and is being spent on these additional treatment benefits.

The Committee would like to know that the societies have allocated to dental benefits as much as eight times the amount they were able to allocate under the first valuation, and to ophthalmic benefit as much as 12½ times the amount that they formerly allocated. In connection with dental benefit a scheme has been arranged under which, for the most part, the societies pay 100 per cent. in the case of conservative treatment of teeth and 50 per cent. of the cost of dentures, and we have set up, as recommended by the Royal Commission, a regional dental service consisting of one principal and five regional dental officers whose duty it is to advise in cases of dispute between approved societies and dentists. That has required, and will require, a large number of examinations of the persons concerned. Up to the present there have been something like 2,600 references to those regional officers. The greater part of those references has already been cleared, but a certain amount of delay has been experienced owing to the fact that nearly 40 per cent. of the insured persons concerned have failed to keep their appointments with the dentists. I can quite imagine reasons why they have not been anxious to meet their dentists, but I hope, as they get more experience, their attendance will improve, and I do feel very well satisfied that the provisions of this additional benefit, under which over 13,000,000 people, many of whom have never been under the hands of a dentist before, will now have their teeth attended to, will mean greatly improved health on the part of the insured persons, and, as a consequence, of course, a decrease in the claims upon the funds of the approved societies.

Mr. LAWSON: Does the Department provide gas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I would like to mention that the International Labour Conference, which has just concluded its labours, has been considering the organisation of compulsory sickness insurance applicable to countries partaking in the Conference, and they have, by a very large majority—I think there were about 38 countries represented in the Conference—adopted a draft Convention, which is based principally upon the same principle as our own Health Insurance scheme, and I have hopes that the majority of them, at any rate, will see their way to ratify the Convention, because it is obvious that these things have an economic application, and that the competition which naturally arises between one country and another is somewhat embittered if in one case there are contributions payable on the part of industry which are not similarly to be found in other countries.

With regard to the state of the public health, I am glad to be able to give a good report. There are two general tests which we apply, namely, the general death rate and the infantile mortality rate, and in both cases it has shown an improvement. Last year the general death rate was 11·6 per 1,000, which compared with an average of 12·2 per 1,000 in the five years preceding, and the infantile mortality rate, which had been 76 per 1,000 in the preceding five years, came down to 70. That is particularly satisfactory, not only because it means that some thousands of babies born in 1926 survived who would have perished if they had been born under the conditions of 1925, but it also means that there is a corresponding improvement in the general health and physique of the children who survive, because the same conditions which kill in the one instance also maim and injure in the generality of cases. It denotes, therefore, a general improvement in the physique of the infant population, and I think I may say also an increase in the understanding of the responsibilities and the duties of motherhood. I do not think that one can say too much in praise of the great system of maternity and child welfare centres which are now spread right throughout the country, and upon which an immense amount of devoted voluntary effort is being expended. To that, I think, we must ascribe, in large measure, the continued improvement in the infantile mortality rate with which we have so much reason to be satisfied.

In other respects the health of the nation, I think, continues to improve. There is a steady decline in the mortality which is due to tuberculosis, to scarlet fever and to typhoid fever. I wish I could say as much for cancer. I am sorry to say the deaths from cancer continue to increase, and I am not able to announce any new discovery which gives us hope of being, at an early date, able to cope with that disease. But our knowledge is increasing all the time. We are always finding out more about the conditions and circumstances in which this disease arises, and I have little doubt that the day will come—and we hope it is not far distant—when we shall be able to put it amongst those diseases of which we consider ourselves the master. There is one other complaint about which I must say a word, and that is small-pox. The records of the number of cases of small-pox in this country are becoming very alarming. I go back to 1922, when there were 973 cases. In 1923, there were 2,500; in 1924, 3,800; in 1925, 5,300; in 1926, 10,100 and this year, up to the end of May, we have had 8,700 cases.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is that for England and Wales alone?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: This is England and Wales, including London; it does not include Scotland. [An Hon. Member: "Deaths?"] No, cases—not deaths. Fortunately, the type of small-pox at present is of a very mild character, but one is always afraid that we may see a recurrence of that very virulent form of which we have had experience before, and which is one of the most deadly diseases of which we know. I have said that I have set up a committee to inquire into the question of vaccination, and I do not propose, therefore, to say anything more upon the subject now, except that it is quite clear, I think, from these figures that the extent of the disease is now assuming serious proportions, and, even though mild in character, it is inflicting an amount of pain, suffering and loss which is preventable, and ought to be prevented, and that presently we shall have to take some further steps to see if we cannot diminish it.

I know our time is limited this afternoon, and I do not want to make as long a statement as I made last year, but there are one or two other matters upon which I must touch, I think, before I sit down. I am credibly informed that there are 9,000,000,000 cells in the human brain. I am sure that everyone of them will be wanted by anybody who tries to make himself acquainted with all the intricacies of the Department of the Ministry of Health. I am not going to attempt to touch upon them all, but I wonder a little whether the Committee realises the part which this country is playing in measures which are taken internationally for the prevention of disease and the improvement of health. The League of Nations has a Health Committee upon which we have a representative and upon which there is also, I am glad to say, a representative of India. I hope in future, there may be representatives also of other parts of the Empire. It is engaged at the present time in two pieces of work which are certainly of direct interest to us as a country and to the British Empire. One of them is concerned with the establishment of an Epidemic intelligence centre at Singapore. The sanitary administration of the ports in the Far East is a particularly difficult problem, because each one of those ports is surrounded by great areas in which conditions are such that epidemic diseases are always present, and it is of the very first importance to prevent the spread of diseases like yellow fever, plague or small-pox, by communicating information from one sanitary port officer to another. By the generosity of the Rockefeller Trustees, this epidemic intelligence centre has been established at Singapore, and, thanks to that and to the introduction and development of wireless it is now possible to convey information with great rapidity and at an extremely low cost, and I think the results are invaluable to British interests generally and to British shipping in particular.

Then I will mention the work which is being done by the League of Nations Health Committee in the investigation of the prevention of malaria. Of course, we know a great deal about malaria now, thanks largely to the researches of British investigators. We know that malaria can be stamped out in particular localities, as, of course, was done in Panama, but these measures are very expensive, and what the League is doing now is an attempt to discover some new methods of prevention which may perhaps be less intensive in their scope, but which will be less expensive, and can therefore be put into operation over larger areas.

I must pass over any account of the Paris Sanitary Conference that was held last year, or of the Pacific Health Conference at Melbourne, at both of which we were represented very ably by the officers of my Department; but I would like finally to mention two projects, both of first-rate importance, which are now proceeding in London. In, I think, 1920, a Committee was set up, under the chairmanship of Lord Athlone, by the then Minister of Health, Dr. Addison, and one of its recommendations was that there should be established in London a school of hygiene and tropical medicine. That school is now being built. The Rockefeller trustees, who take the greatest and most eclectic interest in all matters of international health, have contributed a sum of 2,000,000 dollars, and the British Government has made itself responsible for the maintenance of the school when it is completed. Its object is to provide means for the study of public health in all its forms, and of tropical medicine in particular, and it is of the greatest interest to the British Empire, because there are many portions of the Empire in the tropics whose future prosperity depends largely upon our power to control tropical diseases, which at present take such a tremendous toll of our people and of the native populations. We believe that this school will form a centre to which can come those who are proposing to embark upon a career as medical officers of health or medical practitioners in the tropics, where they will be able to see clinical material actually suffering from the tropical diseases which they will find when they get to their destinations, and where, also, they will be able to study those general principles of public health which govern all administration of the kind, whether in the tropics or in temperate climes.

The other project to which I have referred is also one of the recommendations of the Athlone Committee. It was that there should be established in London a post-graduate medical school. Unfortunately, for one reason or another, this recommendation has never yet been carried out, but now, I think, we are approaching a time when we shall be able to see it accomplished. I myself, some little time ago, set up a very strong committee of physicians and surgeons, of which I took the chairmanship myself, to consider what was the best way of carrying it into effect. The committee laid it down that it was not possible to combine in one school undergraduate and post-graduate teaching, and that is a conclusion which I think is supported by all expert opinion. Therefore, they had to consider whether they should contemplate the building of a new school, or whether it would be possible to adapt some existing institution. We decided against the building of a new school, because that not only meant the building of a school, but it also meant, in order to obtain the necessary clinical material, the building of a hospital with, perhaps, 400 beds; and that would have involved, not only a very large capital expenditure, but also an annual liability for the maintenance of the hospital. The committee, therefore, devoted themselves to an examination of various existing institutions, and they have come to the conclusion that they can find what they want in the West London Hospital at Hammer-smith. That is a hospital which has had a long experience of post-graduate teaching. It has space into which it can extend, so that the necessary lecture-rooms and laboratories and additional beds can be provided, and the scheme has been accepted in principle by the authorities of the West London Hospital. At the present time the buildings are being examined by technical experts with a view to seeing how they can be adapted and extended so as to make them available for this purpose.

[Mr. Chamberlain.]

If this scheme can be brought to a conclusion, it is going to be a great thing for the medical services of this country and of the Empire, and, I think I might almost say, of the world. One of the difficulties to-day is that medical practitioners, who may have had a magnificent training before they enter into practice, go down into some remote part of the country, and find themselves unable in any way to keep themselves abreast of the most modern work. I should hope that in this school it will be possible to give short refresher courses to general insurance practitioners, so that they may come up to London and ascertain what are the latest methods of dealing with the problems with which they are faced—

Mr. MacLAREN: Would it be compulsory?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not contemplating that at present; obviously financial difficulties would arise. I hope, however, that practitioners will avail themselves of it as it becomes further known. More than that, it will be a meeting place where medical men will come from all parts of the Empire to exchange ideas, to exchange experience, to see what the latest experiments and the latest methods are, and how successful they have been. I find that in America also a project of this kind is welcomed most warmly. Many American doctors like from time to time to come over to Europe to see what is being done here, and to check what they are doing over there against European experience. They do not always understand foreign languages, and sometimes, indeed, we do not understand their language, but in a school of this kind they would find their British brethren, would welcome very heartily the opportunities that they would get in such an establishment for exchanging ideas. The completion of a scheme of this kind would mean the expenditure of large sums of money, but, when it is realised what a great conception this is, and what a vast influence it may have in raising the general standard of medical practice, not only in this country but in other countries, I feel confident that the funds which are necessary to bring it to completion will not be wanting.

Dr. VERNON DAVIES: Will this hospital be built and financed by the State, or privately?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not at present contemplating that it should be financed by the State—

Dr. DAVIES: What connection will the Ministry of Health have with it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: It is possible that a contribution might be given to such a hospital from the educational point of view, and that would bring the Ministry of Health into very close contact with it. But I do not think my hon. Friend need be anxious, if that be his fear, that it would in any way be divorced from the Ministry of Health, because, if such a course as I have suggested were adopted, for instance, for general practitioners engaged in the work of National Health Insurance, the Ministry of Health would certainly be brought into intimate connection with it. I have already taken up more time than I meant to take, and I will not detain the Committee longer. I commend to them the approval of these Estimates, and the sanctioning of the funds which are necessary to enable me to carry out the work.

Mr. CRAWFORD: I beg to move to reduce the sum by £100.

I move this reduction in the salary of the Minister of Health in order to draw attention to one or two matters connected with his Department. The right hon. Gentleman has travelled over a very wide field in the comparatively short time during which he has been Minister of Health, and I am sure that everyone will sympathise especially with the concluding portion of his speech, in which he opened up vistas of usefulness which show him to have imagination as well as ability. I am sure that, when he sets out to pursue the mosquito, he will be led almost to circumnavigate the globe, and in that process he will, of course, pass places where much has been done, where there are many monuments to British research and British ability, and where the name of Manson, Ross and others are held in reverence; and I am sure that every Member of this Committee will wish him and his successors success in the pursuit of those matters. I want briefly to refer to some other matters nearer home, where the right hon. Gentleman started. I think we shall all agree that the figures which he gave in regard to the housing problem do show progress, and are satisfactory to that extent, but I hope, and, indeed I am sure, the right hon. Gentleman does not believe that the problem is solved. Members of the House of Commons who, like myself, represent working-class constituencies, still receive, I am perfectly sure, vast numbers of letters and complaints and appeals for help from people who are living in one, two or three rooms, and, although I personally feel that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's truism, or dictum, with regard to the necessity of living within one's means, was received rather more critically than need have been the case, I am sure the right hon. Gentleman himself will realise that housing itself, and the expenditure of any given family upon housing, is not a self-contained problem. I think that what he said would have been welcomed with more acclamation if one were certain that in all aspects of Government policy efforts will be directed to keeping those things which are needed by the working-class population as cheap and as easily accessible as they possibly can be, and of the best possible quality.

From housing to town planning is, of course, a very short step. I am very glad that the right hon. Gentleman has introduced the subject of town planning and regional planning, because I want to put to him a question which, perhaps, his colleague can answer later in the day. He said that regional planning was so important because the planning of one centre or one area might be spoilt if the adjacent area were badly planned. That, of course, is true, but it is equally true that the good planning of a new area may be rendered difficult or almost impossible if existing built-over areas are badly planned. It would not be in order here to discuss matters which we have often discussed, and in which I have taken some part, in endeavouring to impress upon the Minister of Transport the need for looking ahead in matters of planning so far as they relate to roadways and transport from one place to another; but the question I want to put is this: Is there any means of consultation, and is there any consultation, on matters of town planning, between the two Departments of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Minister of Transport, whose work is obviously so closely related in this matter. There is another small point upon which I may be able to get an answer later, and here I come to the question of National Health Insurance, upon which the right hon. Gentleman also touched, and which, of course, is very closely associated with some of the things* that he mentioned in his speech. I understand that there is a draft Bill, or that there is a Bill in contemplation, dealing with approved societies and their position. I am not going to discuss any question relating to the Bill or what is in the Bill, because it would be out of order to discuss legislation. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether when the Bill is ready his Department will undertake to circulate it to the approved societies before it is introduced. That might fairly be called an administrative act and not a legislative act. There is a precedent in this matter in regard to the Factories Bill and the Road Traffic Bill, which were circulated.

[Mr. Crawford.]

I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to some of the matters relating to the Ministry of Health in its administration of the National Health Insurance Act. The right hon. Gentleman quoted some figures, and I would like to ask for a few more. He said that there was an increase in the Estimate of, I think, £1,250,000 over the preceding year.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: £1,100,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD: The right hon. Gentleman gave us items in regard to the health services and the additional staff necessary on account of pensions. If I am not misinformed, we have to add to that sum a considerable amount, because there was passed through this House last Session an Act of Parliament called the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, and in that Act it was estimated that there would be a net saving to the Ministry of £4,100,000. I am speaking from memory, but I think that the expenditure under health insurance, that is the Government contribution, unlike the payment for old age pensions and widows' pensions, is put into the Ministry of Health Vote. The estimated saving under this head was that the Government grants would be reduced by £2,800,000, and that there would be an additional saving of £1,900,000 because the expense of certain medical services would be passed on to the approved societies. That makes a total of £4,700,000. There is an item, which I cannot completely understand, of a saving amounting to £600,000, due to some financial transaction, leaving a net saving of £4,100,000. The net result is that, as compared with 1924, the Ministry saved £4,100,000 but is spending £500,000 more. Therefore, the total increase in the two years is £4,500,000. It would be interesting to have an analysis of those figures.

Now I turn to the question of national health insurance, and I would draw the attention of the Committee and of the right hon. Gentleman and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Circular which was issued by the Ministry in December, 1926. It is headed:

“ Investments, A.635, National Health Insurance.

Notice to Approved Societies.

Owing to the falling off in receipts from contributions and the unusually heavy issues of cash to Approved Societies to meet certain current expenditure on benefits and administration, together with the extra moneys required for additional benefits during the year 1926, the Department is not in a position to make any interim issue of moneys for investment by or on behalf of societies in January, 1927.”

The Committee may need to be reminded of what is implied in the last three lines of that notice. As I understand it, the position is this, that the contributions to national health insurance are kept in the National Health Insurance Fund, and any surplus over and above the cash payments required to pay for the benefits is invested. Part of these investments are made by the approved societies and part by the Minister, or under his direction, through the National Debt Commissioners. I think that is the process. In pursuance of that system, from time to time the Minister hands over sums of money which are due to the approved societies for investment by them. It is these sums of money which we are told will not be available this year. There will be no money for investment by the approved societies, and, presumably, any portion which is normally invested by the Minister will not be available for investment this year. I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to the circumstances in which this state of things arises.

The right hon. Gentleman drew a very alluring picture of the benefits that arose and the extra benefits that were distributed as a result of the second valuation. I think that valuation was made at the end of December, 1923. It may be interesting to tell the Committee what progress has been made in regard to the surplus which is available for distribution under the National Health Insurance Act. The first valuation was made at the end of 1918, and for an insurable population of just under 16,000,000 of people there was a gross surplus of £17,250,000. Of that £17,250,000, some £9,000,000 were disposed of in additional benefits and £8,000,000 were carried forward. There were certain increases in benefits. Compared with a surplus of £17,250,000 for 16,000,000 insured persons in 1918, we find that in 1923 the surplus had grown to £42,000,000 gross, in respect of just under 14,500,000 people. Therefore, there was an enormous increase, and in that year the disposable surplus was large. The right hon. Gentleman says it was £24,000,000, but I have a figure of £27,000,000, which is presumably for Great Britain. Perhaps the £24,000,000 surplus refers to England only. That is not the material point. The material point is that in these five years between the first valuation and the second valuation the total surplus grew from £17,250,000 to £42,500,000, and what is called the disposable surplus grew from £9,000,000 to £24,000,000 or £27,000,000, a very large increase. In spite of the £24,000,000 or the £27,000,000 of disposable surplus, there was a surplus carried forward which I understand was £16,000,000 but the right hon. Gentleman says was £12,000,000. Again, it may be a case of England against Great Britain. These surpluses are built up out of the balances which remain over after the benefits are paid and which are invested either by the approved societies or by the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the approved societies.

The right hon. Gentleman in his speech this afternoon has told the Committee of the incalculable benefit to the health of the nation which is derived from these health services. He mentioned dental treatment, ophthalmic treatment and other treatments. I believe that since 1923 there has been an increase in maternity benefit of 9s., sickness benefit, 4s. 6d., and disablement benefit, 2s. 3d. These are the benefits which arise when the surpluses come to be distributed. It is necessary to refer to legislation at this point in order to make clear what has happened under the right hon. Gentleman's administration. It is very largely due to the results of the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of last year that there is in the present year no surplus for investment. In other words, the balances which accumulate, the surpluses which become available at the end of every five years, as far as I can see at the moment largely as a result of the action of the Government in the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of last year, will not be available, and the suggestion which I am making to the Committee is that the circular to the approved societies, which I have quoted, is misleading because it attributes the lack of money for investment to certain causes which have operated, while one of the chief causes is the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, for which the Government were responsible. Assuming it to be true that to the extent of nearly one-half the lack of disposable balance for investment is due to that Act, then that fact ought to have been made known. The increase in the surplus available for investment during the year 1925 was just over £9,000,000, that is to say, taking the amount invested at the end of 1924—which was roughly £96,500,000—by the end of 1925 that had increased by over £9,000,000. That sum was available for investment in 1926, half by the societies and half by the Minister on behalf of the societies. For the year 1927 there is no corresponding sum for investment. That being so, and it being largely due to the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, passed by the Government, the circular issued by the right hon. Gentleman's Department to the approved societies acquainting them with the fact that there is no money for investment, should have included that fact in the statement.

I pass to another matter. It is two years ago since the right hon. Gentleman and the Parliamentary Secretary piloted through Committee and through the House of Commons the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. I daresay many hon. Members of the Committee may have more or less forgotten that Committee.

Mr. RHYS: No.

Mr. CRAWFORD: My hon. Friend says "No," and I can sympathise with him, because I was a member of that Committee and I remember the many days and hours that we spent upstairs investigating that matter. During the passage of that Act certain differences of opinion arose. It is too long ago now for me to carry in my mind the whole of the circumstances. During the progress of the Act through the House I think certain exception was taken to a proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman by Members on his own side. Certain exception was taken as to the authority which he wished to set up as the rating and valuation authority in the rural district, and I am not sure—I do not want to make a charge against the right hon. Gentleman—but there is grave reason for believing that under his administration of the Act things are now being done which were, in effect, rejected by the Committee, and that the administration of the Act by the right hon. Gentleman is in some cases in contradiction to the avowed intention of the Act. I am referring particularly to the activities of the Central Valuation Committee set up by Section 57 of the Rating and Valuation Act. Sub-section (2) says:

[Mr. Crawford.]

“The Central Valuation Committee shall take into consideration the operation of this Act and shall give to the Minister such information and make to him such representations in respect thereto as they may consider desirable for promoting uniformity.”

Sub-section (5) says:

“Any scheme to be made by the Minister under this Section shall be laid before each House of Parliament forthwith.”

So that the Section makes it perfectly clear that the function of the Central Valuation Committee is purely advisory. The right hon. Gentleman is responsible for its acts and the Central Valuation Committee is responsible to him and to no one else, and before anything it does or advises can be made effective it should be made the subject of a scheme by the right hon. Gentleman and should be laid before the House. If the Committee will bear that in mind, and will also bear in mind that the valuation authority is the borough council, the urban district council and the rural district council, and that the county authority has only certain limited powers, they will be able to follow the importance of what I am now going to quote. This Central Valuation Committee has made two series of recommendations to the right hon. Gentleman. The first contains advice to the county authorities. I propose to quote from Resolution 28B on page 24:

“The recommendation is that in administrative counties the wisest and most economic plan to achieve this end will probably be for the County Valuation Committee to appoint permanently or retain the services of a professional valuer, to be known as the county valuer.”

There is nothing against the Act in that because, as I recollect, the county authority has power to make certain representations if valuations within its area show a lack of uniformity. It has certain rights, if there are appeals, to make objection to the valuation, but it has no right whatever to insist upon its own valuation being carried out in the county or under the other authorities, and if there is any question whatever about that, I will quote a passage from one of the right hon. Gentleman's own speeches. During those interminable Committees, when I am sure the right hon. Gentleman kept the clearest head of the lot among all of us, he made this speech:

“The hon. Member for Maldon said there were no powers given to the County Valuation Committees to impose their will on the various assessment authorities. I agree, and I do not imagine he would desire that power should be given to the county council or to the committee of the county council, the County Valuation Committee, to dictate to assessment authorities how they should carry on their valuation.”

That being so, the right hon. Gentleman sets up this Central Valuation Committee. They make their recommendation, and the paragraph following the one I have quoted from this recommendation 28B reads:

“Further, that such a county valuer should not only advise the County Valuation Committee, but be at the disposal of the rating authorities and the administrative county, and that where rating authorities find it necessary themselves to employ or engage additional professional persons for the valuation of special property, the latter shall be required, as a condition of their employment, to work in close co-operation with the county valuer.”

I admit at once that the words “close co-operation” do not necessarily mean “under the control of.” But what is the right hon. Gentleman's share? What part does he take in these recommendations? Last March the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Burton (Colonel Gretton) asked the right hon. Gentleman a question relating to these recommendations. He asked:

“If the recommendations of the Central Valuation Committee constituted under Section 57 of the Act and circulated by the Ministry to local authorities have received his approbation and are instructions upon which it is intended that valuations are to proceed.”

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"The recommendation of the Central Valuation Committee, which is a committee composed almost entirely of representatives of local authorities, was circulated by me practically in the form in which I received it."

Now I want to ask, do those recommendations constitute a scheme in the words of the Act? If they do, they should have been laid before Parliament. If they do not, what is the right hon. Gentleman's reason for circulating them to all local authorities? The answer went on:

"The committee, as they themselves point out, are an advisory body, and their recommendations, which I have brought to the notice of rating and assessment authorities, are not instructions."

There can surely be only one interpretation. If you take the Section of the Act:

"Any recommendation made by this Central Valuation Committee, which are to be acted on."

Recommendations that are to be acted upon surely constitute a scheme and should be laid before Parliament. I am informed, indeed the right hon. Gentleman himself said, that these recommendations have gone out to county authorities, who, believing them to be instructions, have proceeded to act upon them as though they were instructions, and you have all over the country county authorities appointing valuation officers, sometimes at very high salaries, and in some cases they are suggesting to the Valuation Committee that they should take the county valuer, while in others, the valuation authorities are refusing to do anything of the kind, and in those cases the officers who have been appointed have nothing to do. They are sitting about asking what their work is. I am told of one place where a county authority, erring on the side of caution, indulged in an expenditure only of £2,000 a year, while in others it is as much as £10,000. The people who have been appointed are in some cases the very type of person who, after much discussion upstairs, was kept out of the administration of the Act. That is the Inland Revenue officer. The upshot of it was this.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Sir Kingsley Wood): Does the hon. Member say that Inland Revenue officers have been brought in in connection with valuation?

Mr. CRAWFORD: I had not quite finished. I do not suggest for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman or his Department have brought in Inland Revenue officers as against the spirit of the Act. I think the Act actually mentioned that they shall not be brought in. What I am suggesting is done is that by allowing these recommendations to go out, in fact with his imprimatur on them, not having gone through the process laid down in the Act of Parliament, he has conveyed the impression—that point may or may not be valid, but by allowing these recommendations to go out he has created the impression that they are instructions from the Ministry. Under those recommendations many county authorities have appointed valuation officers, some of whom are people whose only experience has been as Inland Revenue officers. They are ex-officers of the Inland Revenue. Valuing for the purpose of Inland Revenue and valuing for the purpose of a rating authority are two entirely different things, and if there is any doubt as to the difficulty that has been experienced through the appointment of these officers, let me quote a passage from an address recently given by a very distinguished authority on rating and valuation, Mr. Michael Farraday:

"Within the last week I was told by a prominent official of one of the largest towns in the Midlands that their council proposed to employ valuers and that they themselves intended to value the class of property with which this statement primarily deals."

Then follows a conversation:

"I asked him if he found 20 houses of similar accommodation, how he proposed to deal with matters. His answer was, 'I should assess them at the rent they paid.' My next query was, 'Supposing the rents vary for the reasons illustrated above, what will happen then?' His answer was, 'You cannot assess a man above his rent. That has been rating law for many years.' I then put to him this query, 'Can you assess him below his rent?' His answer was, 'No, certainly not. He must get his rent reduced if he wants his assessment reduced.'"

You have under this Act, which was going to produce uniformity of rating, assessment and valuation, people working who do not know the first principles, or rather the value of entirely different principles from those which have always been used for valuation purposes for rating.

Sir K. WOOD: Does the hon. Member suggest that that is the only case, or are there others?

Mr. CRAWFURD: There are others, and, if it be true that people have been appointed to these posts under the county authorities, whose sole ex-

5.0 p.m. perience has been as Inland Revenue officers, it follows, as a matter of course, that that type of person is operating on one system in one place and another type of person is operating on another system in another place, and you do not get uniformity of operation at all. These recommendations, if they are to be issued to valuation authorities throughout the country, should follow the process which is laid down in the Act, and should be submitted to this House as a scheme under Section 27 of the Rating and Valuation Act.

Sir K. WOOD: Does the hon. Member suggest that these are instructions issued by the Ministry of Health?

Mr. CRAWFURD: Not for a moment. I thank the hon. Member for perhaps helping to make this point clear. I do not suggest that for one moment. What I do say is that these recommendations, being issued and being taken by the local authorities as instructions, as the form suggests they are—

Sir K. WOOD indicated dissent.

Mr. CRAWFURD: They are recommendations, but, being issued by the Ministry of Health, they obviously appear to the local authorities as though they were instructions. I say that the recommendation I quoted does misrepresent the intention of the Act and that local authorities have been quite honestly misled by that particular recommendation. At any rate, I should like to have the reply of the hon. Member to the point which I have raised on that matter. The hon. Member asked me if I had other examples. I do not want to quote other cases. There are cases that have been given, but I do not want to go on those lines.

There is a second point with regard to the administration of this Act to which I want to draw attention, and it is this. The hon. Member himself will remember that those provisions of the Act which deal with the rating of machinery were hailed by hon. Members on this side of the House and hon. Members above the Gangway as being the first step in the conversion of the hon. Member to views which many of us hold, and although a certain amount of opposition developed from some hon. Members above the Gangway on the ground that the burden taken off machinery might be better distributed among poor property, there was, on the whole, general acceptance by the House of the principle of the unrating or de-rating of machinery. The Act laid down the method by which this was to be carried out. The method was that first of all a Committee was appointed, under a distinguished late Home Secretary of this House, to formulate rules which should lay down what was the type of machinery which was to be rated and what was the type of process machinery which was not to be rated. Subsequently, there were recommendations of that Committee which were accepted and adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. Subsequently to those recommendations being received, a panel of referees was set up who are now charged with giving decisions as to whether this or that piece of machinery shall or shall not be rated. I am told that the panel is composed entirely, or practically entirely, of professional men, professional surveyors and valuers, whose experience has been that they have appeared for local rating authorities.

I am not going to say one word which will suggest that professional men of that type are consciously biased because they happen from time to time to have been in the service of the local authority, but it is quite clear to anyone who has followed the history of arbitration awards under the Land Clauses Consolidation Acts that people whose experience lies in one direction or one channel must of necessity be unconsciously biased on the side of those people whom they habitually engaged to represent. Where you have people who all their lives have been the expert advisers of local authorities engaged in rating and valuation, and trying to maintain claims of local authorities for such and such a valuation, I think hon. Members will agree that those people are not the best people to be referees when this question between the local authority on the one hand and the person whose machinery is to be rated on the other has to be decided. I would like the hon.

Member to give some explanation of that, or some assurance that something which would be more satisfactory to the people who are rated should be adopted.

The only other point to which I wish to draw attention is a comparatively small one, but it is an important point and it deals with the Second Series of recommendations by the Central Valuation Committee. I am not quite sure whether it is fair to spring this without notice on the hon. Member, but I shall not in the least resent it if he does not give an answer to the point. But here again you have a series of recommendations issued to these rating and valuation authorities by the Minister without their having been first before the House. In the Second Series I come across this very odd thing, which I am sure would rejoice the heart of the hon. and gallant Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) if he were here. It deals with the rating of agricultural property. It is the Second Series, page 9. There I find this very queer thing. There are suggestions as to how rateable value should be arrived at. No. (iii) deals with an allotment of the gross value of £2 12s.; net annual value £2 9s. 5d.; rateable value £1, whereas, just below, there is given another case of farm buildings of gross value, not £2 12s., but £3, whose rateable value is given as nil. That an allotment of gross value £2 12s. should have a rateable value of £1 and farm buildings with a gross value of £3 should have a rateable value of nil, is very difficult for me to accept. But whether it be capable of explanation or not is not really the point I want to drive home. What I want to bring out is that these recommendations should not have gone out to the local authorities under the Act unless they had been embodied in a scheme to which the right hon. Gentleman should have given his approval and which should have been laid upon the Table of this House.

MR. RHYS DAVIES: I feel sure that the Committee will have been very interested in the statement which has been made by the Minister of Health this afternoon. All those who are interested at all in health problems will be very satisfied to read the figures in relation to what are termed "vital statistics," that is, the general decline in the death and the infantile mortality rates. Those who take—as I endeavour to do—some interest in this aspect of life will be equally sad to learn that we are not as yet able to say very much that is favourable in relation to the treatment of cancer. But if I may say so very respectfully I think the right hon. Gentleman omitted what is to some of us a very important feature of the public health of this country and that is mortality in confinement. The right hon. Gentleman, when he has spoken before on general health matters, has, I think, given us some details on that score. Some sections of the community are very dissatisfied at the present position in that sphere. Might I just read a quotation from a Report which was issued as far back as 11 years ago on this matter? The position, as far as I understand it, is very little better than it was then. Sir Arthur Newsholme, who was an officer in the Ministry at the time, made this very strong statement:

"Over 800 mothers die each year in England and Wales as the result of child-bearing, whose lives would be saved if the experience in the rest of England and Wales were as favourable as that of London."

I am informed that about 3,000 women die in childbirth every year in this country, and I would like to know whether London is better placed by way of convenience and technical skill in dealing with maternity cases; and, if that be so, whether the Minister would consider doing something, particularly in the provinces, in order that the womenfolk there shall have those facilities which the women of London are able to secure. I know, of course, that maternity nursing in the provinces, especially in Lancashire and Yorkshire, are very different from what they are in the south and in London, because of the large number of women who are employed in the textile industry; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to give some thought to what is regarded by the women of this country as a very serious problem indeed, and that is the large number of women who die in confinement.

SIR K. WOOD: Is the hon. Gentleman asking what is being done in London that is not done in the provinces?

MR. DAVIES: I gather from the statement that I have read that if the conditions were as favourable in the whole of England and Wales as they are in London 300 lives would be saved annually. What I want to know is what are the conditions that obtain in London which tend to reduce mortality in these cases, that do not prevail in the provinces? I just wanted to say that in passing. A great deal of the work of the Ministry of Health is now regarded as being beyond party politics; and I think it is well that it should be so. But there are matters which, of course, from their very nature, must be political, and I would refer to one at once. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with housing. I do not profess to be an expert on this problem; I will come to a matter with which I am more familiar later on. But the right hon. Gentleman made a remark, unless I mistook him, which rather led me to believe that he is considering reducing the rents of working class houses. I thought his argument was that, because the rent of the present houses which are built by subsidy is too high to meet the pockets of working people, he intends to do something by way of producing smaller houses, presumably in order to reduce the rent. I shall be very glad to learn that I am wrong in this case. May I put it in this way? His argument appeared to be that we have now reached a stage when we have in fact provided a sufficient number of houses, at rents to meet the needs of persons who can afford to pay such high rents. Consequently, he said local authorities are now beginning to consider as to how to meet the needs of persons who cannot afford to pay the rents required for the present sized houses.

[Mr. Davies.]

That, of course, is logic, but let us see where it is going to lead us. What I would like to put to the right hon. Gentleman is this. It will cause a great deal of alarm if he now proposes to reduce the cost of rent by reducing the size of the house. I should have thought that the only possible way out of this difficulty was not to reduce the size of the house, which, in all conscience, is very small indeed in most cases, but to bring down the building price of the house. The Ministry of Health ought not in 1927 to concentrate its attention upon reducing the size of houses, but rather towards reducing the cost of building them. I should have thought that that would have been the way a Minister of Health would have travelled in order to reach the goal he has in view. As I have said, I do not pretend to know as much about housing as I do about other subjects which have been dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman, but he used the strange argument that the cost of building houses had declined just in proportion—so I understood—to the reduction in the subsidy. I think that was his argument. It was as if to say, "If you reduce the subsidy further the cost of house-building will go down automatically in consequence." Surely, there must be another side to that case. The cost of house-building has not declined merely because of the reduction in the subsidy. If his argument holds good, the Government ought to take away at once all the subsidies they are paying now to various industries. The subsidy ought to come off the sugar-beet industry; we might then get beet sugar much cheaper than we can get it now.

The right hon. Gentleman is very conversant with this housing problem, and if there be anything I envy him of, it is his capacity to hurl figures at Members of the Committee without turning to any documents for them. I wish I could do the same. If I were speaking in Welsh I might do quite as well. Let me just analyse, for the moment, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. He said, "When we reduced the subsidy on the last occasion, I prophesied that the cost of house-building would go down almost proportionately"; and, unless I am mistaken, he must have in mind the carrying of his point to its logical conclusion, namely, that in order to reduce the cost of house-building further he is going to take away the subsidy altogether. That is the logic of the argument. Is that the case?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Does the hon. Gentleman think it is logical to say that because you can argue on one egg and a rasher of bacon you can argue still better on a sitting of eggs and a sucking pig as well?

Mr. DAVIES: When I was a collier I used to consider that two eggs were better than one; and, if the right hon. Gentleman was a manual worker, he would also know the difference between one and two eggs. I will leave it at that; but really, that argument is strange coming from the right hon. Gentleman. What I want to put against his point of view is this. Surely there are other factors besides the reduction of the subsidy that have entered into the reduction of the cost of house building? If not, what has the Minister been doing? It is his duty to bring about a reduction in the cost of house building in order to reduce the rent to the level that he wants. I agree with him entirely in regard to one thing. The houses we are now building and the wages that are received by the ordinary worker create a gulf between the wages received and the capacity to pay the rent for those houses. On that score, I think, he is perfectly right; but I do not think he is going to bridge the gulf by building smaller houses.

Sir K. WOOD: Has the hon. Gentleman any suggestions to make in that direction?

Mr. DAVIES: I have made one. The right hon. Gentleman has explained this afternoon that the cost of house building is still too high; but he did not tell us what he was going to do to reduce the cost. I repeat, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will create alarm—and he has created alarm in my mind already—in the minds of all people interested in housing when he suggests that in order to reduce rents you must reduce the size of the houses. If that argument holds good, he will ultimately build one-roomed houses. That would settle the problem, I suppose, according to his argument. A previous Minister of Health actually made that proposition, and he lost his seat in Parliament in consequence. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will take note of that fact. As I said, I have never claimed to have followed the housing problem to the extent that other Members of the Committee have done, and if I have any errors I feel sure the right hon. Gentleman, out of the generosity of his heart, will forgive me at once.

I now come to something in which I am intimately interested, namely, the administration of approved societies. I am sure that I shall carry the right hon. Gentleman and his Parliamentary Secretary with me when I say that it would really be a calamity if this huge business of collecting contributions from 15,000,000 people and paying away millions upon millions of money annually by way of benefits were allowed to pass without a word upon its administration in this Committee. I make no apology therefore for saying one or two things upon this issue. I think the right hon. Gentleman created a little humour when he mentioned the work of the regional dental officers; but he was surely wrong in suggesting that insured persons were afraid to go to the regional dental officer because their teeth were going to be extracted. It was nothing of the kind. He knows perfectly well that the duty of the regional dental officer is to examine the work of other dentists and not to extract teeth. I can very well imagine people not going to the dentist because they are afraid to have their teeth extracted. The point at issue might appear to be a very small one, but to approved societies the matter is very important. The right hon. Gentleman has appointed several officers as regional dental officers to check the work of the dentists. That is very necessary now that the National Health Insurance Fund has become financially responsible for dental treatment. I am convinced that a few of the dentists, even now, do not play the game with approved societies. Complaints from some quarters are so strong that some of the approved societies are already thinking of diverting some of their surplus funds for use in other directions. As far as I am concerned, I want to say, that if some of the dentists and some of the opticians, do not treat us better I shall make it my business to see whether other additional benefits cannot be established in order to divert the funds from those purposes. I must say, of course, that it is only a small section of the dental and optical profession that I complain about.

When you come to the work of the regional dental officers a very interesting point emerges. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health, who is conversant with the work of National Health Insurance from its commencement, did not foresee one thing in connection with the appointment of these gentlemen. I am sure I am not doing the right hon. Gentleman any injustice when I also say that he did not foresee the point which I am going to mention. The point is this: The work of the regional dental officers has been made very difficult, and there are already complaints of delay. I do not see how these delays are to be avoided. The regional medical officer can call a patient to him during the daytime because he is on the sick fund and not at work. But in the case of the insured person who requires dentures, he can only attend in the evening; he is at work during the day. I do not know whether it would be a good suggestion that these regional dental officers should begin their work at six o'clock on the evening and go to bed during the day. I cannot think of any other way out of the difficulty; but the problem is there, and I trust the Department will inquire into it in the near future.

[Mr. Davies.]

In spite of the fact that the administration of National Health Insurance is carried on with great satisfaction to all concerned, it would, indeed, be a wonderful institution if there were no complaints whatever to make. There is one that I wish to make. Some approved societies are not at all satisfied with the arrangement that has been made whereby a person suffering from anything connected with the eyes is sent automatically by the medical practitioner to the ophthalmic surgeon. I have made remarks concerning the medical profession on more than one occasion in this House, and I have been criticised very severely for doing so; but I do wish to say, in the presence of a member of that profession, that we are not satisfied that the ophthalmic surgeon ought to have a fee of a guinea for giving advice that ought in some cases to be given at a very much cheaper rate. I am speaking now as a trades union official, too. I think it will destroy the confidence of approved societies in the work of the medical profession if the panel doctor automatically refers an insured person suffering from any defect of the eyes to the ophthalmic surgeon, and a fee of a guinea is to be paid to him for his work. I think the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this important business ought to inquire into that complaint.

With regard to additional benefits as a whole, the Minister was quite right when he said that the dental benefit as an additional benefit is spreading among the approved societies, that eight times the sum of money was spent after the last valuation than was spent during the previous valuation period; and 12½ times the amount of money is now being spent in respect of ophthalmic benefit. It is not for me now to say anything about ophthalmic benefit in its relation to optical practitioners; but I have to make a complaint in respect of the provision of spectacles. The complaint—I do not know how far it is justified—is that some optical practitioners claim anything from 100 to 300 per cent. profit on the spectacles they sell. I cannot say whether that is true or not, but it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some attention to the charges that are being made. Not only should he inquire into the charges made by the ophthalmic surgeon, the dentist, and the optical practitioner, but he would do well if he inquired also into the charges made for surgical appliances supplied to members of approved societies, which have increased since that benefit was added to the National Health Insurance Scheme. There is a feeling, and it is a justifiable one, I think, that because this money is available in the funds of approved societies the professions which have anything at all to do with the insured population are taking undue advantage of the position in regard to their charges. It is the duty of the Minister of Health to hold the balance evenly between approved societies and these various professions. I remember full well the dispute the Minister of Health had with regard to the fees of panel doctors, and the arrangements made with the dentists and those now to be made with the optical practitioners. I think he will find that he will have to go a step further and do something in connection with the subject of surgical appliances as well.

Just a word with regard to the new projects which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned in his speech. We on this side of the House welcome any new projects with regard to research into diseases with the idea of giving higher and better education, and greater facilities to medical practitioners to improve their knowledge of the health of the community. That is very good work, and I am glad to learn that the Ministry is taking an interest in the two new institutions. What I want to know is whether the Ministry are backing up these institutions by grants? It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that these two new institutions have been formed and that the Rockefeller Foundation has given 2,000,000 dollars to one. That is no credit to the Minister at all, and, while we welcome these new projects, we should like to know how far the Ministry of Health itself is interested financially in these two institutions. The right hon. Gentleman claims, and rightly, a great deal of credit with regard to the benefits payable under the Widows' Pension Scheme, and as far as I understand the method of administration I have no complaint at all to make, except complaints against the law itself.

The Department has undoubtedly, as far as it could, cleared up most of the difficulties connected with claims; but I think the time has arrived when the Committee should be informed how far the payments that have already been made on account of widows' pensions and allowances tally with the actuarial calculations given to the House in 1924. We have been given figures as to the number of claims, and the amounts too; but I think we are entitled to know from the Minister how far the amounts that have been paid square with the actuarial calculations. I want to turn back once again to the National Health Insurance scheme. The Parliamentary Secretary gave a reply some time ago to a question which I put to him—I am sorry I have not the details with me at the moment, but no doubt he will remember the question—as to the amount of sickness benefit paid away during the mining dispute last year. The Parliamentary Secretary led men, at any rate, to believe that because of that industrial dispute the sickness claims on approved societies had grown enormously. I ventured to say then that while the claims had increased during that period, I was not so sure that the claims were not less than they would be this year.

It is now nearly the end of June, and I think the Parliamentary Secretary should get the figures showing the amounts paid during the first and second half of last year, and probably up to date; and unless the experience of other societies differs from my own, I shall be astonished to learn that the figures of last year are much higher than they are for this year per month, because the claims on the funds of the societies, in spite of all that is said as to the health of the community being better, do not appear to diminish. The reason is not that which is usually given—namely, that the insured population is malingering. The reason is that if you have an extension of the age the older people get the feebler they become, except members of the Labour party, and, consequently, the claims of the insured population are increasing as the years go by.

There is another question which I think we must put to the Parliamentary Secretary, who I understand is going to reply. He will remember that there has been a reduction of one penny in the contribution of the men and one half-penny in the contribution of the women. It is not competent for me to dwell upon the very foolish action of the Government in plundering the funds of the approved societies some time ago. I understand it is not in order; but I think we are entitled to know what the result has been on the funds of the approved societies, that is, the taking away of large sums per annum by a reduction in the State grant and a reduction in the weekly contribution of insured persons, men and women. The Ministry of Health has at its command one of the best actuaries in the land, and I feel sure the Parliamentary Secretary will be able to give us this information now, because the last valuation period ended in 1923 and the next period ends in 1928 for some societies and in 1927 for others.

Can we be informed—and of all the questions I am putting to the Department this afternoon, this is the most important—whether in view of the fact that the State grant has been reduced, and the contribution of insured persons per week has been reduced, the actuary is satisfied that the approved societies will be in as good a position at the end of the third valuation period, that is at the end of 1928, as they were at the end of the last valuation period. I know that this is a very difficult subject to broach, because the right hon. Gentleman and the Parliamentary Secretary are sincerely hoping that in spite of all they have done in the past approved societies will come out all right in the end, that money will flow in as was the case after the last valuation. It is right that we should know whether, in the opinion of their actuarial department, approved societies are likely to be as well off at the end of the present valuation period as they were at the end of the last valuation period. Let me put it in simpler form. The total amount of surplus available at the end of the last valuation period was £42,000,000. Can we take it that the right hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary and their actuary are satisfied that at the end of 1927-28 there will be another £42,000,000 available by way of surplus in the funds of the society? It will be a very interesting answer.

[Mr. Davies.]

Sir K. WOOD: The hon. Member might just as well ask me who is going to win the fight to-morrow night.

Mr. DAVIES: When the right hon. Gentleman brought in the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, and the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, he could tell us for 50 years in advance what would be the position of the societies. I have the documents here from the Actuarial Department, and they are able to tell us what is going to happen up to, I think, the year 1975. I am sure that if the hon. Member would do his duty by me and get the figures from the Actuary he would be able to tell the Committee now whether the Actuary anticipates a £30,000,000, a £40,000,000 or a £50,000,000 surplus at the end of the current valuation period. He knows full well what the result is going to be; and, because the sum is going to be less at the end of this period, he is not going to reply. If the surplus had been £50,000,000 or £60,000,000, in spite of the plundering of the funds of approved societies and the reduced contribution of insured persons, he would have been delighted to have said that the Actuary thinks that the probable sum is £50,000,000 or £60,000,000.

Another very important problem arises in connection with the administration of approved societies. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that some approved societies have a dwindling membership. Some of us are interested to know what is going to happen to these societies whose surpluses accumulate, whose investments grow from year to year but whose membership continually declines. Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to transfer some of these funds to a central pool, or to a contingency fund; what is going to happen? We are not entitled to deal with any probable legislation on this very important issue; but I think we should know from the Minister of Health what number of the recommendations of the Royal Commission have been put into operation. I have a list of some of the recommendations which need not wait for legislation, which could be put into operation without passing a Bill through Parliament. I want to know whether anything has been done with the recommendations which do not require legislation.

I feel satisfied that the Committee ought to pay more attention to the work of approved societies than has been the case hitherto. There are 15,000,000 people involved, and large numbers of them are without any democratic control of any kind. If it was opportune, I should put the other point as to whether these millions of the insured population, who have no voice at all, and no means of expressing their opinions through some of the large approved societies, could not be called together somehow in the various localities so that they might express their opinion on the administration of the funds.

Sir K. WOOD: Does the hon. Member suggest that the trade union member of an approved society shows any more interest than any other member of an approved society?

Mr. DAVIES: The hon. Member knows full well that in every trade union approved society, branch meetings are held, council meetings are held, and elections are held every year; and that there are millions of members of other approved societies who never have the chance of attending any meeting or taking part in any election. The hon. Member is merely playing with words when he puts that point. As I say, there are some things in connection with the work of the Ministry of Health which are undoubtedly above political partisanship, but with regard to the subsidy on houses, and the suggested smaller houses, I feel sure that the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman will create considerable alarm among those interested in that problem. With regard to national health insurance, the business is proceeding smoothly, and the work is being performed, as far as I know, by the medical profession as a whole very well indeed. But I should like really to see the right hon. Gentleman instituting something beyond merely paying away benefits. Something should be done to aid research work. We have surely reached a stage when a sum of money should be made available to carry on research work; and although we welcome the two institutions mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman, the day has now come when we should not be satisfied merely with clearing away slums, building new houses, and paying away benefits; but when the health of the community should be the subject of research by the highest and most skilful men in the land.

Lieut.-Colonel FREMANTLE: I should like to follow the hon. Member for West Houghton (Mr. Rhys Davies) on the subject of insurance, but I shall only deal with it very briefly, and I do not propose to respond to the suggestion he made that we should take up the question of the fees paid to ophthalmic surgeons. I am in the position of being a friend to a litigant in the Courts, and all I can say is that I trust the case entirely to the Court. I am certain such matters will be rightly arranged between the Ministry of Health on the one side and those who represent the medical profession on the other. I am very glad the hon. Member said that practically the whole of the matters that come under our purview in this Debate are outside party politics. Party questions come in occasionally, but on the whole we are free of party, and we can shake hands in wishing to forward the magnificent work of the Ministry of Health and the organisations under the Ministry throughout the country.

With regard to National Health Insurance, my hon. Friend suggested that something should be done for research. The medical profession would be the first to back up any such plea. I think I am right in saying that in the original insurance scheme there was a penny of the contribution put aside definitely for research, and that was commuted into the payment which has eventuated as the Medical Research Council, now doing magnificent work under the Privy Council. I entirely endorse any proposal for giving more help to that Council or to research generally, but it would be unfair not to mention that that research work arose out of the National Health Insurance scheme. It is true that we want to look beyond the relief that has been afforded by the insurance scheme. That scheme has provided a most magnificent means of relief in the form of various benefits to the population. But when we come to look at the larger and wiser object which was aimed at specifically in the Act, namely, the prevention of disease, it has to be admitted that the whole insurance scheme has been a dead failure, an absolute failure. It has not resulted in the prevention of disease in any way and it does not tend to the prevention of disease.

It is only in so far as we may be able in future administration to correlate the system of the insurance scheme with that of preventive agencies throughout the country that we can hope for any marked improvement. The pensions for widows and orphans and the aged are among the magnificent new contributions to health, inasmuch as poverty is one of the three essential elements in the causation of ill-health. In so far as one may attribute ill-health to preventable causes, one may say definitely that the three main elements are poverty and ignorance and carelessness. It may be poverty in those who are neither ignorant nor careless; it may be ignorance amongst those who are neither poor nor careless; and it may be pure carelessness among those who are neither poor nor ignorant; but it is quite certain that poverty, grinding poverty, is at the bottom of a large amount of ill-health at the present time. If you can do away with this poverty, for which the individuals are really not responsible, as has been largely done by the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Pensions scheme, you are going a long way towards improving indirectly the health of the community.

I wish to make a few remarks on the present position of the housing problem. From our side we have urged, and to some extent have been joined by all parties inside and outside the House, that in facing the appalling problem of housing after the War, despite the fact of people being intolerably overcrowded, despite the fact that houses that were dilapidated and out of repair and still inhabited, the main and essential thing was to get the building industry back to work, to increase the supply of houses before we could tackle, or while we were tackling, the other thing. I would like, on behalf of all who are keen on this subject, to offer my small share of congratulation to the Minister of Health for the wonderful way in which he has managed to attain that object with the help of all parties. What is more remarkable is that the building trade has not simply been got back to work on the original plan, but, as the right hon. Gentleman has said this afternoon, back to work with a production of something like three times the number of houses in a year that were produced before the War. It is a wonderful achievement and one with which we can be heartily satisfied.

[Lieut.-Colonel Fremantle.]

That fact is, perhaps, one answer to the question raised by the last speaker, as to the expensive house. When you have a large demand for any product and a small supply, prices naturally go up and you cannot prevent it. The facts here are that you have an ever-increasing demand for housing, and as long as the supply is limited, however great that supply may be, prices are bound to rise. You cannot keep them down except by compulsory and punitive measures. We know there was an idea that we should introduce compulsory and punitive measures to reduce profits. There has never been an idea that we should reduce wages by such methods in the building trade, but there was that idea of reducing profits. It faded away when we were face to face with the effort of trying to arrive at that result. It was impossible to keep profits down where you had so large a demand. The supply is still inadequate. It is true that we have built nearly 900,000 houses in England and Wales alone since the War, and that on the basis of the provision made for the population of 1911 we shall probably arrive at an equal accommodation of the population within the next couple of years; by the middle of 1930, if we build at the present rate, we shall have the population housed on much the same conditions as in 1911, with some improvement.

But what were the conditions in 1911? In England and Wales then we had 3,200,000 persons living in overcrowded conditions, more than two to a room. That condition of overcrowding continues now. According to the 1921 census there were nearly 1,000,000 people in Greater London who were living in overcrowded conditions, more than two to a room. That figure epitomises the awful stories that we constantly read in the surveys of housing that are going on. In Chelsea and Westminster recently very active and well-informed housing associations have issued reports of their surveys. I must say, knowing housing so well in London, that I am surprised that the surveys are not worse. They reveal some appalling conditions in dilapidated houses that are still allowed to be inhabited and have to be inhabited, where two or three families are living in accommodation sufficient for only one. There are cases where two or three families have only one set of conveniences or kitchens. The conditions are appalling and they have to be tackled; they are no less difficult than the task of overcoming the mere lack in the number of houses. We have to take up that question.

If you read the reports of medical officers of health throughout the country you will find that during the last 10 years they have skimmed very lightly over the question of the dilapidated house. Why? Because when they have reported houses as dilapidated and not fit for habitation, no action has been taken; the local authority did not dare to take action. So houses have continued to be let when they have been reported as insanitary, and they are still inhabited. I hope that this question of administration will be taken up with increasing energy by the Ministry of Health as the number of houses built becomes more adequate. As we get towards an adequate supply of houses, there should be increasing work in securing the reporting, the closure and the demolition of the disgraceful houses that are still allowed to be inhabited and unfortunately have had to be inhabited hitherto. That is one thing for which I should ask. I suggest also that, whereas the reports of medical officers of health have in the past been extremely voluminous or varied in their size every year, and latterly they have taken to concentrating upon a survey once in every five years, the Ministry of Health should, at least once in every five years, call for a survey by the medical officers throughout the country not only of the individual areas but also areas grouped together under the county councils—a survey of the housing conditions, showing what is being done in order to meet the differing needs of the housing problem.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Health has been criticised for speaking of his desire to stimulate especially the building of small houses. I feel sure that I am interpreting rightly the inquiries made by the last speaker, when I say that what he meant was not to diminish the size of any particular house, but that, inasmuch as the subsidy is allowed for houses of different sizes and local authorities generally have two, three or four standards of size, the Minister should concentrate more on those lower standards that are already being built for the working class. A trust with which I am connected is building, very largely owing to the generosity of a gentleman who died 25 years ago, houses for the working classes. When we are deciding on any big scheme for congested areas we have to decide what is the size of house required by the working classes. In some areas we have been told that the houses that we build are too big and that smaller houses are preferred for various reasons. In other areas we have a demand for the middle-sized house. As one surveys the whole problem one must recognise that the subsidy has been too much used for the building of houses for artisans and the better-paid worker, and that there has not been sufficient provision for those who get the pay only of casual labourers and men of that sort. I trust that the Minister will endorse that opinion in his reply. Perhaps the subsidy has gone too much to those who can pay. Anyhow, if continued on the same lines it would still be going into the pockets of those who can well afford, through building societies or other agencies, to build their houses without State help. We want the whole of the funds that are available from public sources for housing purposes to be given only to those who really are in need.

What is being done with regard to that useful little Measure, the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, which enabled grants and loans to be given for the 6.0 p.m. repair of workers' houses in the rural areas? It is limited to houses which are let at low rents and which will continue to be let at low rents to the working classes, and it should relieve the rural areas of an enormous difficulty. The local authorities have found it impossible to take action in this matter because of the wretched rents that by custom have been paid in the country for these houses—3s., 2s. and, in some cases, even 1s. per week. Of course there are other factors to be considered, but I believe that Act enables local authorities to take strong action. They can insist on houses being either repaired or closed and demolished. They have also power, if there are not enough houses, to build, with the help of the subsidies now available. I hope we shall hear to what extent the county councils are rising to their opportunities in this matter and to what extent they are leaving it to the rural district councils who may apply to be authorities under the Act.

I hope also we shall learn that the Ministry is going to take steps to see that those authorities which have been lax or slack in adopting the Act are brought up to the mark. I hope the county councils will be pressed to do more than they have been doing hitherto on this question. There are many points in regard to which they could do more, owing to recent Acts. There is, for instance, the question of the public utility societies, which are doing so much useful work for the housing of the workers. These societies are always in difficulties with their finance. They require help, and in many cases they are trying to work under small local authorities which have not the power to finance them properly. Indeed, in some cases, these local authorities have financed them, over and above their own rateable value, and it is the county council which should help in this respect. I trust, therefore, the county councils will be urged to take action in this matter. I look forward to hearing two announcements from the Minister. I do not know if it would be in order merely to mention the question of slum clearances. That will require vigorous action before long. We have been promised a further pronouncement on Section 46 of the Housing Act, regarding compensation for slum clearance, which at the present moment, stands in the way of action by local authorities.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope):
The Minister will not be in order in giving any exposition of legislation which he may be disposed to introduce. If the hon. and gallant Member asks him whether he has in contemplation dealing with this or that question, he is entitled to reply, but he cannot deal with legislation in this case.

[The Chairman.]

Lieut.-Colonel FREMANTLE: This is a subject which is concerned both with administration and legislation, and one may ask from the administrative side, to what extent slum clearance schemes are going ahead or may be expected to go ahead in the near future under existing legislation. The other point on which I hope to hear a statement by the Minister is in regard to the Rent Restrictions Act. That question will have to be faced in the near future. The Minister has said he is going to announce his policy before the end of this year. I know the difficulties in connection with the matter, but it is a question which goes to the root of the housing problem, and if it is in the power of the administration to postpone the coming into effect of certain provisions, then it is a matter of the first importance. I will not go further into that subject, but will await another opportunity of discussing it. Any idea that we have come to the end of the housing problem, or even within sight of the end, merely because we have such a fine record as the Minister has put before us to-day, would be grossly misleading, and I hope in all parts of the Committee, we shall continue to take an active part in trying to arrive at a solution of this seemingly interminable problem.

Mr. BRIANT: There is no Ministry which comes so near to the homes of the people as this Ministry. Whether it is dealing with pensions or insurance, with health or with housing, it is essentially a Ministry which ought to be called, indeed, the "Ministry for Home Affairs." It is the Ministry for the home. We were all glad to hear from the Minister his references to research in all matters connected with health. I do not grudge a farthing of that expenditure; indeed, I do not think we spend enough on research, but the fact remains that, however much we spend on research and whatever may be the discoveries of medical science, we can do but little for the health of the community as long as present housing conditions exist. Anyone who knows the subject at all is aware that bad housing produces disease, and no amount of preventive medicine, no medical knowledge, will prevent the spread of disease with great rapidity as long as bad housing continues. This applies particularly to such diseases as tubercular diseases, which are almost entirely—I will not say entirely—produced by bad conditions of housing. It is not my habit to go to books or reports in order to know the truth. There is hardly a day in my life on which I am not approached with some pathetic story of a man, who has the money to pay for more accommodation, seeking almost in tears for additional rooms and unable to find them. Yesterday, I had a case of six people who were living in two rooms. They included an anæmic boy, who, obviously, will continue to be anæmic as long as he lives in that crowded atmosphere. That lad will grow up with a weakened constitution, and, probably, will be a burden on the community at a later stage of his life. Certainly, he will not be an efficient citizen, and it is idle to talk of many of these subsidiary questions as long as we fail to grapple with the health question. I do not intend to dwell on that proposition, which is self-evident, though I might add that there is no great problem with which social workers have to deal, such as juvenile crime or drink, which cannot be traced back to health.

One must be discursive in dealing with this Vote, because the work of the Ministry is widespread and many questions arise on it. I wish to refer first to the accumulated balances of the approved societies. There are many directions in which I wish to see these accumulations used. Any medical man will support me in the statement that a very large number of women who die at childbirth or who live on with enfeebled constitutions, could be saved from death or ill-health if they had proper medical care and had certificated midwives to attend them. I want to see the time when these balances—and I hope the idea will be favoured by the approved societies and the Minister—can be utilised to make definite provision for proper nursing, and care for women in this condition. I believe the saving to the community would be enormous, and would far outweigh the expenditure of money. Turning to another matter, in my experience a large number of men and women, who have not recovered from the direct effects of illness, return to work before they are fit. Those who know the working class will bear me out when I say that it is the best of the workers who go back most promptly to work.

The good workman sees he cannot live on the money which he receives in benefit, even if his doctor retains him on the list, and he is anxious to get back to work because, during sickness, he has had to use more money than he has been receiving, which means applications for relief, and also that tragic feature of many workers' lives, an added number of pawn-tickets showing how the home is being reduced. The better the man, the more anxious is he to get back to work, and thousands of men and women go back to work before they have recovered proper health. Most of us here are fortunate enough to be able to allow ourselves a certain period for recovery, after the acute period of an illness, but many of these people have to resume their occupations before complete recovery. This means enfeebled constitutions, if it does not actually reduce their years of life. I think, in time, some way might be devised by which every worker should have the opportunity of being sent away for at least a month on a doctor's certificate, and by which funds should be provided to keep the family in the condition in which they were kept while the wage-earner was fully employed. It is only in this way that we can give them a chance of that complete recovery which, I am sure, we wish for all those whose circumstances are such as I have related.

I now propose to glance rapidly at two subjects which are quite disconnected. We have heard that there is a committee inquiring into the question of vaccination. I wish at once to make it clear that I am not an opponent of vaccination. As a layman, weighing up the evidence, I have long been convinced that, on the whole, vaccination is a preventive of smallpox, but I am bound to add that recently there have been some statements which are at least disconcerting, particularly, with regard to the possible connection—I say "possible" connection—between encephalitis and inoculation. I am not satisfied that we are getting all the facts. May I add, as one who believes in vaccination, that if anything would deter people from vaccination, it is a doubt as to what effects it may produce in their children? I understand that the Andrewes Committee made a report, which is in the hands of some French people, and has been published by them, but has never been submitted to the English public. That report ought to be made public to us as well as to other people. I think we have a right, not merely to wait for the result of the inquiry which is now being held, but to ask for some preliminary report from the committee which is sitting, giving information as to the cases of encephalitis which have occurred within a period of two months after vaccination. I do not wish to disturb the public mind. I am not frightened or startled in the least, but we have a right to know the facts as far as they are presentable to us. We should not necessarily be compelled to wait for the final report of a committee which may take a long time in pursuing its inquiries, while, in the meantime, these statements are disturbing many people and are creating anxiety on this subject.

I turn to still another subject—one in which I have taken a great interest. That is the condition of the workers in the hop districts. I was disturbed when the Minister of Health the other day, in answer to a question, said he saw no reason why the report of his own medical officer should be issued. No such report was issued by the Department, and I think the House of Commons have a right to demand to see the report of the inspector who visited the hopfields. I have visited them and I state frankly that some of the conditions are disgusting and almost beyond belief by those who have not seen them. I believe there has been an improvement, and I say at once I am not including in my statement by any means all the hop growers. Many of them conduct their farms as well as possible, considering the temporary nature of the work, but it is a fact that the hop grower has to get his living through this temporary work. There are not enough workmen in his own district to do the work.

The workers, however, have a right to demand that they should be put into conditions which are tolerable and at least decent, and I can assure the Committee, from personal knowledge, that that is not the case in many instances. There was drawn up a list of model rules in 1926, I think, and I would like to be told how many of the district councils have adopted those rules, how many put them into force last year, and how many will put them into force this year. I think we might be supplied with the actual reports of what the medical inspectors have seen. I have every reliance on their judgment and knowledge. I have seen reports of local medical officers, and some of them have made statements as to conditions still existing which I am sure no Member of this Committee would sanction for a moment on his own property. I have myself seen a family huddled together in a small hut, without a chair or table, with a straw mattress, and the only place where food could be put was on the dirty straw that was left on the floor and covered with litter by the children running in and out. There was no place for the children to play, and there was nothing but this tiny hut in which to sleep and eat. These matters concern me because from South London there is a migration into Kent every year of some 60,000 people during the four or six weeks of the hop-picking. I hope the Minister will be able to give us some more information on this subject. It is time that the Committee should demand to see the returns I have mentioned; they were issued in the past, and they should be placed in our hands to-day.

[Mr. Briant.]

I am afraid I have been somewhat discursive, but I take a keen interest in these points. To return to what I said at the beginning, I hope that whatever the Ministry may do in the way of research, it will do it thoroughly. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not spare money in this matter, for if you can save the health of a single person, the community will win that money back in a few years' time, and if you can prevent a person having an illness, it will be repaid over and over again to the general public. The rates and taxes are enormously enhanced by the heavy charge caused by people whom we have neglected when they were curable and allowed to get into an incurable position, when they have become a burden on the State. I have every confidence in the Minister, who is keen on these subjects himself, and I hope he will give some encouragement to us who feel that health is the greatest service to the community and that the opportunities of the Ministry for good are probably unequalled by those of any other Ministry in the country.

Dr. VERNON DAVIES: It was with very great pleasure and admiration that one listened to the speech of the Minister of Health—admiration for the facility with which he travelled from subject to subject, showing great knowledge of each, and giving the Committee very valuable information which had to be more or less contracted, but which justified the opinion which, I am sure, is held on all sides of the House that in the Minister of Health and his Parliamentary Secretary we have a Department which is functioning in the very best possible way. It is, however, surprising that a Department which should be concerned solely with the health of the nation has to spend so much time and opportunity on other subjects, which are perhaps only remotely connected with health. When I found that the Amendment from the Liberal Benches to reduce the Vote was moved in a speech that was practically confined to the very intricate and technical subject of rating, I wondered why in the world the Ministry of Health should be dealing with that question when there are so many vital subjects affecting the health of the community to be discussed. The Minister prophesied last year that the reduction of the housing subsidy was going to reduce the price of houses, and the Labour party then were sceptical on that subject, but I am sure that to-day they are as delighted as we are to find that the Minister was right in his prognostication, and I suggest to them that the next time he prophesies, they should accept his prophecy as a very good tip.

The references of the Minister to public health were very favourable, but one got the impression from his speech that everything was as well as it could be. I do not think that is quite the case. The right hon. Gentleman had to confine his remarks on each subject to such a small compass that it was easy to convey rather a false impression, and I would specifically refer to his remarks on cancer. The impression that he gave me was that the outlook for cancer was very much better than it had been and that he almost ventured to prophesy that within a more or less reasonable time we should have a cure for that disease. We hope that that is so, but I think it is very much too strong a statement to go forth to the public at the present time. Very good work is being and has been done, but at present I think it must be emphasised again that the only chance for a patient with cancer is early and complete operation, and not to wait for anything that the Minister may have in mind, or for any invention or discovery that may be made in future. The only chance at present is early operation, and I would like to emphasise that to correct perhaps an impression which the Minister did not mean to convey. I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question with regard to the post-graduate hospital. Most of the London hospitals and many provincial hospitals have post-graduate students. I do not quite understand how this new hospital will function. I understand that it has been provided by the Rockefeller Foundation, but how will it be kept up? Is it really going to become a State hospital for post-graduate study, not confined to medical men in this country, but open to medical men of all nations? Will a fee be charged to these medical men? That is rather an important point, because one would like to know if it is the beginning of the State control of medicine or of a State medical service, or if it is simply the State helping medical men to provide facilities at a low cost to themselves, because they have those facilities at the present time, provided that they are willing to pay for them, at most of the London and provincial hospitals.

There is one subject to which the Minister referred very slightly, and that is the question of smallpox. I have noticed in reading in OFFICIAL REPORT during the last few months that various questions have been put from various sections of the House with regard to smallpox, and I will give three or four items of information which have appeared in the OFFICIAL REPORT. We have found that during the year ended 2nd April last there have been 12,922 cases of smallpox notified in this country; that the deaths registered during the year ended 31st March from smallpox were 33; that this year there have been so far 28 deaths, 21 of unvaccinated people and seven of people vaccinated in infancy; that in the County of Durham there were 20 cases of smallpox in 1924, 1,138 cases in 1925, and 6,645 cases in 1926. We also found that they have had nine cases in Hendon, of which five were fatal. These answers show that smallpox has been definitely increasing in this country in the last few years, from 2,504 cases in 1923 to 12,922 in the year ended 2nd April, 1927, and with this steady increase of smallpox there has been a steady increase in the death-rate, because we find that in 1914 there were four deaths; in 1915, 13 deaths; in 1916, 18 deaths; then we get down to 1921, five deaths; in 1922 they went up to 27 deaths; in 1923 they went down to seven deaths; in the year ended 31st March there were 33 deaths; and this year so far there have been 28 deaths.

One also found that in 1924 there was an outbreak of smallpox in 148 separate districts in this country. That means that we are gradually but surely advancing towards an epidemic of smallpox, there being increases all over the country both in the number of cases and in the number of deaths. Fortunately, it has been of an exceedingly mild type, but that has made it much more difficult for the local authorities to deal with the earlier cases and to prevent the spread of the disease. I think the Minister of Health has a very definite responsibility in this matter, and I suggest, with great respect, that the Ministry are not adequately carrying out the powers conferred upon them in dealing with this danger. We know that the Minister of Health, by his control over boards of guardians and also over other local authorities in health matters, has a very definite power, both moral and financial. In the year 1924 there were only 47·5 per cent. of successful vaccinations, 37·1 per cent. of conscientious objectors, 5·4 per cent. died unvaccinated, and 0·2 per cent. were insusceptible; and we find that there is a balance of 10 per cent. not accounted for. This 10 per cent. probably consists of children who have escaped the meshes of the vaccination officer.

We may as well put it quite plainly, and I blame the Minister of Health for not seeing that the Vaccination Act is properly carried out. Under the Vaccination Act of 1898, a conscientious objector was given a chance of declaring that he

[Dr. Davies.] conscientiously believed that vaccination would be prejudicial to the health of his child, but it was made rather difficult, because he had to appear before two justices, or a stipendiary magistrate, or a metropolitan magistrate, and there was a certain amount of difficulty in getting an exemption certificate. The result was that the number of exemptions granted under that Act kept fairly steady, but in 1907 a new Vaccination Act was brought in, which made the conscientious objectors' Clause very much more simple, and all that they had to do was to go before a justice of the peace, a commissioner for oaths, or some officer, authorised to receive a statutory declaration, and make a declaration of conscientious objection to vaccination, and the certificate was given them. The result is that, in 1908, 63·2 per cent. of children were successfully vaccinated, but in 1914 the figure had come down to 44·6 per cent., and in 1922 it was 40·3 per cent. One point to be noted in connection with the statistics is that when small-pox occurred there was a larger number of successful vaccinations but a year or two afterwards people got less frightened and said, "This is a very slight disease; this is a very mild small-pox—some people think it is chicken-pox—and we will not bother."

I would like to say that I entirely disbelieve in these conscientious objections. In very few cases is there a real conscientious objection. I am speaking from my own personal experience. I found very often in the course of my practice that parents would not allow their children to be vaccinated because they said they had a conscientious objection. Later many of those people emigrated to America. America has more sense than we have. America will not allow people to enter that country unless they have been vaccinated, and I never met a single conscientious objector who refused to have his child vaccinated if he wanted to go to America. In a case like that I say it is not a conscientious objection. The reason parents refuse to have their children vaccinated is not because they have a conscientious objection to vaccination, but a parental feeling that they do not want the baby to suffer any pain. If a child is vaccinated the arm is sore for two or three days and the child is fretful and restless, and parents say, "Why should the child suffer pain? Go and get a certificate; the magistrate is compelled to give it." Thus we have in the country a huge number of unvaccinated people who are an absolute danger to the community.

In a way I do not regret that, because I am convinced that certain people are so bigoted, shall I say, against vaccination that the only thing that will cure them is a big epidemic of small-pox, with a high fatality rate. It is a terrible thing to expect, but, as far as I can see, it is bound to come. The Minister of Health has a duty to perform. It is the law of the land, to see that children are vaccinated unless they are granted exemption; and when he finds from his own statistics that things are not being properly carried out I say it is his bounden duty to put the law into operation and to exert pressure upon boards of guardians and local authorities. I would like to draw the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to some remarks in the report of the Chief Medical Officer of Health for 1925-26:

"It is regrettable to have to record that the spread of the disease in the north-east counties was due to some extent to the failure of two sanitary authorities and their medical officers of health to take adequate steps to control the disease within that district."

What has the Minister done about that? Has he taken any action whatever? Have those medical officers of health been spoken to, or reprimanded, or have they been dismissed?

"One ill-administered district in the Tyne-side area caused the malady to spread into eight other districts in the vicinity."

Has anything been done to that local authority?

"Delay in the removal to hospital of a considerable number of cases inevitably led to the spread of the disease from the patients left at home."

These are extracts from the report of the Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry of Health. I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to tell the Committee whether the Minister has taken any definite action upon this very serious report? If the medical officers in certain districts are neglecting their work, because that is what it comes to, the Minister of Health, seeing that he pays half the salary of these officers, ought to take steps to regulate the situation. If it is reported to the Department that a certain official has not carried out his work properly, it is the bounden duty of the Ministry to interfere, and either see that an improvement is brought about or that the man is dismissed. I am speaking against my own profession, but no medical man has a right to undertake definite responsibilities affecting the health of the community unless he discharges his duty to the best of his ability. I recognise that in certain cases medical officers have to deal with recalcitrant local authorities or boards of guardians, but a medical officer of health has a definite responsibility to the community, and the Minister of Health has a definite responsibility to Parliament to see that he performs his duties properly.

A few days ago I asked a question about Government lymph and suggested that it should be sold to all practitioners who desire to use it. My reason for doing that is that Government lymph is an exceedingly good lymph, very pure, and undoubtedly the best lymph in the country. It is a very successful lymph, because in 1924 there was a case-success of 99 per cent. with primary vaccinations, which is a very high percentage. My experience in practice was that it was impossible to get lymph from any firm which was comparable in any degree to the Government lymph. If you had vaccinated a child and the result was unsuccessful, you said the child was not susceptible to vaccination; perhaps you persuaded the mother to allow a second or third vaccination, and still the child appeared to be not susceptible, and that created a sense of false security both in the doctor and in the mother. Later I was appointed a public vaccinator, and I started to use Government lymph. I got magnificent results with all my public cases, practically speaking never having a failure. In a very short time I found my private patients coming to me and saying they would rather be vaccinated with Government lymph. I told them that if that were done, they might have to allow the child to be inspected later on by a Government Inspector. They said, "We do not mind that in the least," and before I retired from practice every one of my vaccination patients was being vaccinated with Government lymph. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nationalisation!"] It was not nationalisation. I had absolute faith in that lymph. I felt perfectly certain if I vaccinated a child with that lymph and it did not "take," that the child was not susceptible, and it was the only time I was confident.

Why should not other doctors have the same opportunity of using Government lymph? Over and over again patients were sent to me by other doctors, who said, "We cannot get Government lymph; we have not any confidence in the lymph we are getting; will you be good enough to vaccinate the patient?" It was my duty to do so, and I was only too pleased to do it, and I would suggest to the Minister, now that he is back in his place, that it would be a very useful thing to allow any medical man in the country who desires to do so to purchase Government lymph. The sense of security, both to the doctors and the patients, would be well worth it. In addition to that, the Department would probably make a very great profit. When going over Mill Hill Hospital a month or two ago, I found they made absolutely all their own vaccines and sera, and they made a profit of nearly £7,000 a year by supplying the Services. In view of the danger which overshadows this country of an epidemic of small-pox, which may be virulent in character, with a very high death rate, it is the duty of the Minister of Health to do all he can to prepare for the emergency by getting people vaccinated now, and not put the question off, as I suggest he is doing by the appointment of a Committee on Vaccination.

The Government will reply that they must await the Report of this Committee. I say that is a false position to take up. Smallpox is in the country—it is spreading throughout the country, and before that Committee reports we may have a very serious epidemic. No one knows when we are going to have it. A serious type of smallpox may break out tomorrow, and I would respectfully urge the Minister of Health to reconsider the question of allowing Government lymph to be supplied to private practitioners upon payment, because I am absolutely convinced that it is the best lymph in the country, and in practically every case where it is used it is successful. [HON. MEMBERS: "Socialism!"] That is not Socialism at all; it is simply common sense, when practical experience has proved that it is a good remedy. Vaccination is the only remedy for smallpox. It has the overwhelming support of the medical profession throughout the world. We show ourselves the weakest country in the world in allowing conscientious objections. It is not found in other countries, and the sooner the people of this country realise that under strict anti-septic precautions there is practically no danger in vaccination, but that, on the contrary, vaccination will prevent smallpox, we shall get back to the happy stage which we had reached some years ago, when smallpox was practically wiped out from this country, as it has been from so many other countries. I hope the Minister of Health will use all the powers the law has given him to see that the population of this country is efficiently vaccinated, which they are not at the present time.

[Dr. Davies.]

Dr. DRUMMOND SHIELS: I feel a great temptation to refer to many of the subjects which have been raised in this Debate. I should like to have spoken on housing, which was dealt with so well by the hon. and gallant Member for St. Albans (Lieut.-Colonel Fremantle), but as a Scotsman I do not like to interfere in the housing affairs of England. I would only say that from his remarks it is quite evident that, in England and Wales, as certainly in Scotland, there is no room for complacency about the housing situation. I was very glad indeed to hear him emphasise the point that the position is still very serious. I should like also to have spoken on vaccination, a topic which was interestingly treated by my colleague the hon. Member for Royton (Dr. Davies). He did not like the suggestion that he was emphasising the principles of Socialism, and said it was not Socialism but common sense. The two things are exactly the same.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Member can enlarge upon that topic.

Dr. SHIELS: I was going to take advantage of the opportunity to say that when it comes to matters of health, and other questions of vital importance in peace or war, we as a country, whatever Government may be in power, take things out of the hands of private enterprise in order to see that they are well done. However, I do not feel particularly unkind, and I shall not rub in that point, because I want to take advantage of the quiet and peaceful atmosphere of the Committee to bring forward another subject which has been recently engaging the attention of the Ministry. Before I leave the subject of vaccination, however, may I observe that while I think it is true to say that the medical profession as a whole still believes very strongly in the efficacy of vaccination, I also think that there is some change of opinion in regard to infant vaccination. I have come to the conclusion, seriously, that the time is ripe for another inquiry into the subject of vaccination law. In some respects there is considerable laxity, enforcement is not easy, and I think most medical men would welcome another impartial inquiry so that we may get the vaccination laws put upon a modern and proper footing.

The special subject to which I wish to draw attention is that of the rheumatic child. This matter has been an anxiety to the medical profession for many years and recently active steps have been taken to grapple with the problem. The British Medical Association set up an expert committee in 1924, and this committee has issued two reports, one this year and one last year. The Medical Research Council has also been studying this subject, and has investigated the conditions among rheumatic children in London and Glasgow, and that Council has also published an interesting report. Sir George Newman and many medical officers of health have repeatedly called attention to the ravages of this disease and to its very important social and economic effects. Broadly, the facts are that acute rheumatism or rheumatic fever in children is followed in a large number of cases by heart disease, which if it does not end fatally, may leave the child more or less incapacitated for the ordinary occupations of life. While there are no figures covering the whole country, it has been shown that in particular areas 10 to 15 per cent. of the children at 12 years of age are affected by rheumatism. Therefore, the number in this country as a whole must be very large, and the consequent suffering to individuals and the economic loss to the country from the inability of many of these children to support themselves afterwards must be very great.

It is a very tragic spectacle to see these children come to adolescence, carry on at ordinary work and then break down and have to go into hospital. From hospital they go back to work again, and the same process is repeated, and unless they are fortunate enough to get a very long rest or have a very light occupation, this ends in early death. The prevention of the disease is, of course, of the first importance. Unfortunately, the specific organism has not yet been discovered. Frequently the condition is associated with sore throat, adenoids and enlarged tonsils, and ample facilities for the treatment of these conditions are very desirable. It seems to be the case that environment has the main effect in this disease. It rarely attacks the children of the well-to-do, and its incidence is almost entirely on poor children. The very poorest children, strange to say, do not suffer nearly so much as the class immediately above, probably because in the very humblest sections of the population there is a very drastic system of survival of the fittest, and those who survive have a great capacity of resistance.

There is no definite feature of the environment which one can say is really the main cause of the disease. The question of housing, especially of the dampness of houses, school conditions, and many other things have been investigated, but there has been nothing very definite discovered in regard to the particular items of environment. There is also no convincing evidence of heredity in connection with this disease, the similarity of environment and contagion accounting for the cases which appear to suggest heredity as a factor. I trust the Minister will encourage, as I know he has already done, the Medical Research Council to go forward with research into this disease, for until we discover the specific cause we shall not be able to have effective prevention, which is what we most seek. Until we have that prevention we must make all necessary arrangements for dealing with those who actually have the disease.

Not only are medical men and those bodies I have mentioned taking a keen interest in this matter, but I am glad to notice that London is giving a very good lead to the country. I think it is to the credit of the London County Council and the Metropolitan Asylums Board that they have given this lead to the whole country by the provision of special hospital accommodation for cases of acute rheumatism. The London County Council, when deciding this matter, had 1,500 cases of children absent from school on account of these rheumatic conditions. They had conferences with the Metropolitan Asylums Board and the Ministry of Health, and the latter first sanctioned the provision of 60 beds, then 16, and I understand that 350 more are at present being arranged for at Carshalton. It is estimated that no less than 10,000 children in London are suffering from these conditions, and that implies 25 per cent. of chronic invalidity. Surely it is only humane and wise to deal with this matter as the London County Council are dealing with it. This disease can only be effectively dealt with by establishing the special rest homes which they are setting up because the interesting point about this condition is that when it arises, if sufficient rest is available and the child is not hurried back into activity prematurely, there is an excellent chance of its escaping the development of heart disease and the consequent permanent incapacity.

While this is the position in London, I would like to ask the Minister of Health or the Parliamentary Secretary what is the position in the provinces? Are the local authorities being urged to provide similar treatment? Because this problem exists in every town and every village throughout the country. We know that many local authorities have not the facilities or the accommodation except in connection with isolation hospitals which are not particularly suitable for this purpose. Many of them have no money to spend in providing new accommodation, and a large number of these cases have to be treated throughout the provinces in voluntary hospitals, either those for sick children or general hospitals. A few years ago the Ministry granted £500,000 to voluntary hospitals. While we await some satisfactory method of dealing with voluntary hospitals, I would like to know if the Minister of Health has considered, or would he be prepared to consider, the giving of a grant earmarked for these cases to enable the provincial hospitals to provide extra accommodation of this special kind.

I know it is a rather depressing thing for him to ask the Minister of Health to provide more money, but I do know that he is interested in this matter and that he has co-operated very cordially with the London authorities in providing accommodation for these cases, and I am anxious that he should extend that encouragement and assistance to other parts of the country which are equally in need of it. It cannot be too often emphasised that the percentage of cases developing heart disease can be greatly reduced. There are good authorities who declare that at present 50 per cent. of cases of acute rheumatism in children develop heart disease, and that must be greatly brought down. Another suggestion has been made that this disease should be made notifiable. It is well known that in all matters of research, statistics are most important, and these particulars are difficult to get unless the diseases are notifiable. Hospitals also should arrange with local medical practitioners for the after care of these children when they leave hospital. The children leave the hospital and are better for a time, but they are often allowed to indulge in activities which do them great harm, and which medical after care would prevent.

[Dr. Shiels.]

I should like to see this subject linked up with that of the orthopædic treatment of children. I know that in this matter also the Minister of Health has been co-operating with county and county borough authorities. The treatment of orthopædic cases is that of those who are externally disabled while the acute rheumatic children are correspondingly internally disabled. These two questions are of great importance not only from the humane point of view, but also from the economic point of view, and it is gratifying to think that here humane and economic considerations do not clash. It has been estimated by the best orthopædic authorities—we must pay in passing a tribute to Sir Robert Jones for the work he has done on this subject—that 85 per cent. of these disabled children, many of whom are put into cripples' homes and stay there all their lives or languish at home, a burden to themselves and to the community, could be rendered capable of self-support if taken in hand soon enough, and given the wonderful surgical treatment which is now available from orthopædic surgeons. I am grateful for what has already been done, but it is still very little, and I ask the Minister of Health to extend his activities and his stimulation to other parts of the country. I would like to say a word in regard to the matter of maternal mortality about which the hon.

Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Davies) spoke this afternoon. We have recently passed, both for England and Scotland, a Maternity Homes and Midwives Bill which we hope will be of some assistance in the reduction of this mortality. It is certainly a very difficult problem, and it is not altogether easy to understand why the figures remain as they do. I think we must agree however that the pre-natal condition of the mother has a great deal to do not only with maternal mortality but with infantile mortality. The largest individual causes of infantile mortality are premature birth and congenital debility. The child is born too soon, or in such a weak condition that it cannot survive the contact with its new environment, and it is obvious, in that case, that the mother's condition has probably been unsatisfactory. Greater attention to the ante-natal condition of the mother and especially to seeing that she has adequate nourishment, would almost certainly help to diminish maternal mortality. We must do something to improve the figures, as it is a great reflection on us. We have managed to reduce practically all other mortality figures so much, and it is unfortunate that on this one point we seem to have failed. We have not yet got the whole reasons, although we know many of the contributory causes.

In regard to cancer, about which the hon. Member for Royton (Dr. Davies) as well as the Minister, spoke, I should like to ask the Minister what he thinks about the question of publicity. The hon. Member pointed out, as the Minister has done before, that cancer, in the very large majority of cases, is perfectly curable if it is surgically treated at an early stage. People, however, became frightened at the idea that they have cancer, refuse to see a doctor, and in the end are taken in hand when it is too late to do anything effective. Some local authorities in this country—and in America this has been done to a very great extent—have launched a publicity campaign. They have pointed out to their citizens the early symptoms of cancer, telling them in simple language what are the first signs and emphasising the ease with which a cure can be secured if early treatment is sought. I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary when he replies, or the Minister, if the Ministry has ever considered this point, and if they have ever thought of urging local authorities to give this information. Some people say it would spread a fear of cancer, and do more harm than good, but that is not the belief of the surgeons or of the people who are most in contact with this disease, and it has not been the experience of the local authorities when it has been tried. I do think that when you have the facts that early treatment is so satisfactory and that any number of people are not coming for treatment because they do not know that, it is obviously a case for publicity and I would like the Minister to consider that.

I was very glad to hear the Minister's reference to the international aspect of medicine and to the League of Nations, and I was very glad to hear about the new hospital which—although gifted by some of our cousins across the sea—we gather is to be maintained by the State. It only shows that no Government, of whatever colour, in this country can go on without having to approximate to some extent at least to our position. It is very desirable that we should make, as we are able to make and as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out we have made, a good contribution to the international common pool of health activity at Geneva, because we have, amidst all the other rivalries of the nations and the sordid competitions of the different peoples, this nobler rivalry and competition—the rivalry to contribute the most possible to the store of the knowledge of the laws of health.

Mr. HARRIS: We have just listened to a very interesting speech raising very important matters dealing with the Ministry of Health. We have to remember that the Ministry was created out of the Local Government Board in order to accentuate the importance of health. It is quite right that medical problems should be brought before the Committee, but, after all, very much of the disease in this country—and the Minister of Health would be the first to admit it—is caused by unhealthy conditions and environment. I was very glad that the Minister took the opportunity to emphasise the importance of housing. I want, before the Parliamentary Secretary replies, to switch the mind of the Committee back for a few minutes to housing. Fortunately, I think I can say, without much fear of contradiction, that housing is becoming more and more a non-party question. We are all agreed as to its importance, and as to the evils of overcrowding, its demoralising effects, and the need for a forward policy on the part of every Government. Every Government and party have tried their hand in legislation. At the present time we are in the serious danger of being too satisfied. The danger is largely caused by the fact that at the moment there is considerable progress being made in building. The building that has been done by all agencies is better than for some years past, and, of course, that particularly applies to private enterprise. That might have the effect of lulling the country, the Government and the local authorities into inactivity, and nothing could be more disastrous than that.

It is just as well to recognise—and the Minister will confirm this—that certain local authorities in various parts of the country have more than fulfilled their duty. They have had a housing programme on a large scale, and have made preparations years in advance, bought land and established a staff on such a scale that we can say they are doing their duty. But the right hon. Gentleman would be the first to admit that, while some are more than doing their duty, others are still lagging behind. What I suggest to the Minister is that, while it is his duty and responsibility by all means to praise and to bless those local authorities who are carrying out their functions under the various Acts of 1923, 1924, his own Act and Dr. Addison's Act, which is now practically dead, and the Wheatley Act, he should stimulate and egg on all those who are failing in their duty.

I am not going to attempt to deal with areas outside London, because London itself is quite a problem on its own. Greater London, with a population of 7,250,000, does present a problem that is a serious one quite worthy of the attention of this Committee. Here you have in London an example which is typical of the rest of the country. Some of the local authorities are very active, and others are very much behind. I want frankly to pay a tribute to my [Mr. Harris.] old authority, the London County Council, and I can say that with the greatest frankness and sincerity because I belong to the Opposition side. It has been my business to criticise, and the majority is that of which the right hon. Gentleman is so distinguished an ornament. There is a Conservative majority and I want to be fair. It is largely due to the energy, activity and imagination of the present chairman, whose distinguished predecessor is sitting opposite, and who did his share and who would be the first to recognise that Colonel Levita has more than consecrated his work and has done his part on the London County Council. Even its severest critics will say that the council has done more than its share in trying to solve the housing problem, both by building houses and to some extent by sum clearances, though in the latter respect we have still much leeway to make up. But while the London County Council have done their part, the other local authorities in the county, outside the London County Council, have largely gone to sleep. I hope that when the Parliamentary Secretary replies he will tell us what he is doing to stimulate the other authorities into activity. Is he just praising and blessing the London County Council for doing their job, or is he doing anything to stimulate other agencies to do their share?

In 1922 the peak load was reached in activity. That was the time when the Addison Act was in full blast before the economy machinery had been set to work, and there you had, not merely the London County Council producing some 5,000 houses in that year, but the local authorities in London and the borough councils and county councils producing 2,000 houses, and the outer authorities 4,000 houses. In 1926—and I have the figures pretty well up to date—the London County Council reached the peak load of 4,600 houses, but the other local authorities in London, the borough councils and the corporations—and I complain particularly about the City Corporation and the city of Westminster—through apathy and inertia sank down, as compared with 2,000 in 1926, to a figure of 900, while the outer authorities, the great dormitories and those outer districts which are rapidly developing and which have still plenty of land, sank from 4,000 to 2,700. These figures are really worse than they actually look, because some few of the districts are showing great activity, while others are doing practically nothing at all. Here at our very door the wealthy city of Westminster, second in wealth to almost no part of London, has practically done nothing. There have been certain revelations, and there was a revelation in the "Spectator" this week, showing the terrible housing conditions in the city of Westminster. I know it will be argued, with some reason, that land is so valuable that you cannot afford to use land for housing purposes, but while land is valuable the assessable value is high, and the produce of a penny rate is great. I maintain, therefore, that the corporation can well afford to deal with their own slums and make proper provision for housing in their area, at any rate to some extent.

About my own district of Bethnal Green, I can speak with some freedom, as I do not support the majority on the council. They have done their share and built all they could, and though they have been faced with the same difficulty in finding land, wherever there happened to be a quarter of an acre or a piece of land, they have taken the opportunity to build houses. The City of Westminster ought to be doing something of that kind, and even the great City Corporation might be doing something to make its contribution. This problem will only be solved by every organisation and every agency pulling its weight. I know that the anxiety of some of these rich districts is that private enterprise—

Whereupon, the GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD being come with a Message, the Chairman left the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners.

The House went; and, having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to:

1. Government of India (Indian Navy) Act, 1927.
2. Pacific Cable Act, 1927.

3. Mercantile Marine Memorial Act, 1927.
4. Ministry of Health Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Act, 1927.
5. Ministry of Health Provisional Orders (Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1927.
6. Ministry of Health Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 3) Act, 1927.
7. Provisional Order (Marriages) Act, 1927.
8. Great Indian Peninsula Railway Annuities Act, 1927.
9. Reading Gas Act, 1927.
10. Farnham Gas and Electricity Act, 1927.
11. Chelsea Borough Council (Superannuation and Pensions) Act, 1927.
12. Commercial Gas Act, 1927.
13. Great Western Railway Act, 1927.
14. Southern Railway (Superannuation Fund) Act, 1927.
15. Frimley and Farnborough District Water Act, 1927.
16. Bury Corporation Act, 1927.
17. North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, Limited, Act, 1927.
18. Scottish Provident Institution Act, 1927.
19. London, Midland and Scottish Railway Act, 1927.
20. Matlocks Urban District Council Act, 1927.
21. Stoke-on-Trent Corporation (Gas) Act, 1927.
22. North Metropolitan Electric Power Supply Act, 1927.
23. War Risks Associations (Distribution of Reserve Funds) Act, 1927.
24. Barnsley Corporation (Water) Act, 1927.
25. London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1927.
26. Southern Railway Act, 1927.
27. West Bridgford Urban District Council Act, 1927.
28. Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1927.

SUPPLY.

Again considered in Committee.

[Major Sir ARCHIBALD SINCLAIR in the Chair.]

Question again proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £12,943,493 be granted for the said Service."

Mr. HARRIS: When our proceedings were interrupted, I was calling attention to the fact that many local authorities are justifying their inaction in the great London area by the revival of the building of houses by private enterprise. I am one of those who like to see every possible agency at work, but I think it would be most unfortunate for anyone to run away with the idea that the kind of houses being built by private enterprise are really doing much to solve the housing problem. At the present time almost every house built by private enterprise is built for sale, and not for letting, and, therefore, comes right outside the means of the ordinary working man; and, while before the War some 75 per cent. of these houses were occupied by people coming within the definition of the working class, now, to use the words of the Report presented to the London County Council only yesterday, considerably less than one-half, instead of the estimated required proportion of three-fourths, are houses suitable for the working classes. When we come down to the bed-rock of the work done by the London County Council and private enterprise and various agencies, it is pointed out by the county council that there is still a shortage of 52,000 houses to be met. That means that overcrowding is still rampant and that in spite of all our efforts things are not very much improved. It is pointed out by the county council that the number of families has had to be met by closer occupation of houses by more than one family.

We have to recognise facts and to continue our activities. A great promise was held out by the Government 18 months ago that the housing problem could be dealt with by alternative methods of construction. We have had experience of these alternative methods of construction, and perhaps the Minister can give us some guidance. We have made a great attempt to experiment in steel houses. We in London placed orders for almost every kind of steel house. We have been broad-minded; we have had no prejudice and have not been influenced by any desire except that of providing houses to meet the shortage. We have ordered Atholl houses and every other kind of steel house. I have to admit that these houses have not been forthcoming. I believe I am right in saying that up to a few weeks ago not a single Atholl house had been delivered. Every steel house that we have put up, in almost every case, has been a disappointment. We have experimented with every kind of wooden house—Norwegian, Swedish, English, Canadian, but they have proved to be more expensive and far less satisfactory than the ordinary house. Experiments have been made with all sorts of concrete houses, but after every kind of experiment has been tried we have been compelled to recognise in London that the best house to build is the brick house and the brick and plaster house.

[Mr. Harris.]

Unfortunately, the agencies for building the brick and the brick and plaster house have been held up through the shortage of skilled labour. It is no use trying to run away from facts; we have to face them. If we are to meet the shortage in all the agencies that are required for the building of houses, we must get the necessary skilled labour. The shortage of bricklayers is not so serious as it was, although we could do with a great many more; but when we come to plasterers the famine is rampant. Even if more brick houses could be built, the difficulty of getting the necessary skilled plasterers remains a living fact. That is a question which, sooner or later, will have to be faced by some Government or some Department. I have said on many occasions that I do not believe we shall get the necessary skilled labour until the Government have a policy which they are determined to carry out over a period of years. I have suggested 15 years. Whatever the period fixed, it must be fixed, and it must have Government backing. One we fix the period the Government will have a right to go to the trade unions concerned and demand that the necessary skilled labour shall be trained. The skilled labour is not forthcoming.

Mr. MONTAGUE: It is not the fault of the trade unions.

Mr. HARRIS: The hon. Member says that the trade unions are not making the difficulty. I do not believe they will if they can be certain that they will have permanent employment for a period of years. If we had a programme for 15 years the uncertainty would be removed. It is that uncertainty and the constant fluctuation in policy which have prevented the necessary skilled labour being provided to make up the shortage. It is admitted that a shortage exists. In many cases there have been experiments in substitutes for our present building methods. The substitutes for plastering have always been a failure, but, even if they were practicable, we must get the necessary skilled labour, and that can only be done by good will and pressure on the Government, through the Minister of Health. Many people run away from this question. If we are really in earnest to provide the necessary houses then, surely, the necessary skilled labour must be found. If we get the skilled labour it will mean not only more employment in the building industry, but employment for thousands of other men who are depending for employment upon the skilled trades. I should have liked to elaborate that point, but I have exceeded my time. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary, who is never lacking in courage, will tell us his views and whether there is any prospect in the immediate future of the shortage in one or two branches of skilled labour in house building being made good, because it is only by the shortage being met that we can hope to make up for the shortage of houses.

Sir K. WOOD: There is one preliminary observation that I desire to make before dealing with the general questions. The Committee will remember that in his opening speech my right hon. Friend dealt with a statement which had been made by the hon. Member for the Stratford Division of West Ham (Mr. Groves) regarding the attacks on the newly-appointed West Ham Board of Guardians. My right hon. Friend made a complete statement as far as the allegations were concerned which were made the other night, and I have received a message from the hon. Member, which I promised that I would convey to the Committee, that he desires, after having heard the statement of my right hon. Friend, further to investigate the facts, and that he will in that event propose to deal with the matter on a suitable opportunity, which may possibly be afforded to him next week. My right hon. Friend and myself would welcome every investigation of the facts by the hon. Member, and I quite understand his desire to do so before he makes a further statement on the matter.

My right hon. Friend may congratulate himself upon the reception of his Estimates to-day. Anyone who has listened to the Debate will agree with me when I say that, beyond a certain number of important but minor criticisms, some of a very technical kind, there have been practically no major or important criticisms concerning the administration of the Ministry of Health during the past year. I expected to see present this afternoon the right hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George), because in the country he has been taking up a very different attitude from that taken by his supporters this afternoon. I was hoping that he would have given my right hon. Friend and myself an opportunity of replying to some of the statements he has made. On the 13th June, speaking at a Liberal demonstration in the Alexandra Theatre, Stoke Newington, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"There had been an increase of unnecessary armaments and by that means a piling up of the burdens of taxation, whilst at the same time they (the Government) had diminished national expenditure on real developments."

He instanced the developments on health. One does not expect particular accuracy from the right hon. Gentleman as far as figures are concerned; but I think that anyone who has given even a cursory glance to the Estimates of my right hon. Friend's Department must see that a more unfounded statement could not possibly have been made. If hon. Members look at almost any branch of the very many matters which have to be administered by the Minister of Health, they will see that the health services of the country are being well maintained and that increased provision is being made by the State as far as the most important services are concerned. For instance, in connection with housing grants there is an additional expenditure of £965,000 a year. In regard to health insurance grants and miscellaneous grants, mainly of a public health character, and various matters of that kind, there have been increased contributions. Therefore, it is a matter of regret to me that statements should be made on a public platform when there is no foundation for them, and that this afternoon when we have a Liberal Motion, and a Liberal Member making a certain amount of criticism of a perfectly proper character, we should have no suggestions made such as those made by the right hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs; suggestions which could not possibly be made in this House.

I shall not be in a position, having regard to my anxiety to fall in with the arrangements made to deal with other subjects which the Liberal party desire to raise at a later stage, to deal with every question that has been brought forward to-day. I suppose no Department in the State has such a variety of business to deal with as the Ministry of Health as will be seen from the questions brought forward to-day. I will do my best to give a reply in the short time that is allowed to me. I will deal, first, with the criticism made in the very moderate, able and admirable speech of the hon. Member for Walthamstow West (Mr. Crawford), who moved a reduction of the Vote. He raised, first, the question of the operations of the Central Valuation Committee in relation to the Rating and Valuation Act, and made some criticisms in regard to the action of my right hon. Friend and his Department in connection with the work of that Committee. His first complaint was that the action which the Central Valuation Committee had taken and the action which had been taken subsequently by my right hon. Friend was wholly wrong, and that my right hon. Friend had misconceived the position altogether, because, in putting into operation such matters, he should have proceeded by way of a scheme, and that scheme should have been laid before the House and have received the approval and sanction of the House. He suggested that my right hon. Friend was attempting by some backdoor means to avoid the operation of Section 57 of the Rating and Valuation Act. Section 57 says:

"For the purpose of promoting uniformity in valuation there shall be constituted in accordance with a scheme to be made by the Minister after consultation with the local authorities . . . a Central Valuation Committee, consisting of members of local authorities. . . ."

as enumerated in the Section. Therefore, the only thing which has to take the form of a scheme is the constitution of the Rating and Valuation Committee. That has been done. There is no provision in this Section for making the matters about which the hon. Member complained the subject of any other scheme. To a very large extent that disposes of the major criticism made by the hon. Member, but he went further and said that this Committee is usurping its functions, and that the Minister has improperly endorsed decisions of the Committee. In the first place, this Committee—and a very valuable Committee it is—is composed of the representatives of local authorities. Of the 32 members of the Committee, 26 are members of local authorities, and 24 of them have been appointed by the representative associations. The remainder are experienced local government officials. Only one official is from the Ministry of Health, and he is the Statistical Officer. The powers of this Committee are advisory only. If the hon. Member will look at the Act he will see that neither the Committee nor the Minister can give directions to the local authorities or assessment committees who are responsible for the preparation and revision of the valuation lists.

[Sir K. Wood.]

What, in fact, has happened is that the Committee have considered a number of matters and have submitted to the Ministry representations designed to promote uniformity—I should have thought a very proper object indeed. The Minister, in his turn, felt that he was not in a position to criticise the recommendations made by this responsible body, many of which are of a technical character, so he did what it was his duty to do and brought them to the notice of the local authorities. After all we must, as I believe we can, treat local authorities as responsible people, containing many educated members undoubtedly, and no one who carefully reads the Report of the Central Valuation Committee and the document that has been circulated to local authorities, could for a moment contend that the advice given by the Committee could be anything in the nature of a direction. So that my right hon. Friend has done nothing more than circulate a number of these recommendations to local authorities.

In the letter addressed to local authorities enclosing this document my right hon. Friend said most specifically that it consisted of a series of representations made by the Central Valuation Committee under Section 57 and that they were circulated to them in the form in which they were submitted to him. I do not think anything could be much clearer or more definite. So far from belittling the work of the Central Valuation Committee, if the hon. Member went to responsible representatives of the great majority of the local authorities up and down the country, they would say their work had been most valuable and their recommendations have been very gratefully received. Local authorities are very carefully advised in all they do, and when they receive these representations they adopt them or not as they think fit. The matter rests with them, and when they take certain steps it is on their own decision and, right or wrong, that is our system of representative municipal government.

Mr. CRAWFORD: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the courteous way he has dealt with the case, but the main point I wished to bring to bear was that these recommendations contained at the bottom of page 24 are contrary to the spirit of the Act of 1925, in so far as they encourage the valuation authority to take up an attitude rather than imposing its will upon rating authorities.

Sir K. WOOD: I do not agree with that. Directly I hear anyone allege that something is contrary to the spirit of an Act of Parliament I am always very careful, because I know that means that at any rate the letter is not being disobeyed. I also know that on the question of the spirit of an Act of Parliament we all have our own differing views, and the law lays down very clearly that we have to deal with what the Act of Parliament says and what it means. I do not for a moment agree that either in the spirit or in the letter the Central Valuation Committee has, in any way, gone outside its proper functions.

The hon. Member raised the question of the panel of referees and complained of its composition. When I tell him how it was arrived at, I think he will agree that a very fair system has been adopted in order to get independent and expert officers. The panel of referees is appointed by the Lord Chief Justice from names submitted to him by the Institution of Civil Engineers and the Surveyors' Institution. There are 39 people on this panel from which those concerned with this part of the administration of the Act can make their choice. Something more is done in order to make the matter perfectly fair. If any of the parties concerned cannot agree upon one of the 39 under the rules made by the Lord Chief Justice they can go to the Lord Chief Justice and say, "Please select one of these persons from the list." I cannot, and I doubt whether the hon. Member can, think of a system that is fairer or more likely to get an independent body to deal with what, I agree, is a very difficult matter. I hope he will feel that on these two matters I have endeavoured to give him a reasonable explanation and one which has justified the procedure adopted by my right hon. Friend.

A matter of greater importance which has been raised is the question of housing, which my right hon. Friend dealt with so fully, and I think to the general satisfaction of the Committee. I have heard the speech of the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris) many times, and I often wonder whether if we had as many skilled labourers as the number of speeches he has made on the subject, we should advance faster still with our housing activities. I know it will cheer him up to know that apart from the 217,000 houses erected during the last 12 months—a world record, greater than has been achieved by any other country—arrangements have been definitely made for 160,000 new houses which were either under construction or definitely arranged for on 1st June. Therefore there is no reason why anyone should have any anxiety that the number of houses for the approaching year will be any less than the number for the last 12 months, and when the hon. Member can bring forward a practical plan for increasing that augmentation, in black and white and not in general phrases it will receive my right hon. Friend's most careful consideration. It is not speeches that build houses.

Mr. HARRIS: I was suggesting a greater supply of skilled labour, especially plasterers, of whom there is a great shortage.

Sir K. WOOD: When the hon. Member said he wanted more skilled labour, he said one of the methods to obtain it was to approach the building unions and demand it from them. I would advise him to consult the leader of his party, who will tell him that efforts have been made in that direction. I think he can be well content to leave the matter there. Everyone must appreciate the need of continuing our efforts. Not a word has been said by my right hon. Friend or myself that we are not fully alive to that side of the situation. We agree that this great progress must be maintained and, if possible, exceeded, but I do not think this is the occasion for carping criticism, if no real practical suggestions are made to assist us in our task.

My right hon. Friend made a statement with regard to the necessity of obtaining houses at lower cost and, if possible, at a lower rent, and he made two suggestions which, I think, will commend themselves to anyone who endeavours to bring a practical mind to this problem. In the first place, he said the subsidy should be reduced, and that is one of the best ways of getting cheaper houses. That, undoubtedly, has been proved to be perfectly true. My experience is that the higher the subsidy the higher has been the cost of the house. In the days of Dr. Addison, for whom there is a good deal to be said, when the largest subsidy was given you had the highest prices. They went sky high—£1,200 and £1,300 a piece. To-day we are starting on a policy of a gradual reduction of the subsidy, and that is undoubtedly one of the means which should be pursued to get cheaper houses. Subsidies are just as vicious in connection with housing as with any other industry.

A matter which has, perhaps, provoked a certain amount of criticism is the suggestion my right hon. Friend made in regard to smaller houses. In considering this matter you ought to compare the conditions in which so many people are unfortunately living to-day with the proposals my right hon. Friend is making. I think this can be said by way of criticism of the present position of the housing situation, that a great deal has been done at a great deal of cost for the middle classes, what we might call the superior artisan, and, if you like, the smaller professional people. But the great problem that undoubtedly concerns anyone who gives serious attention to housing is the fact that we are not getting houses built at such rents as would permit them to be occupied by people with very small wages. When an hon. Member opposite criticises the suggestion of smaller houses, it would be a thousand times better for these people to come out of the dreadful conditions under which they are living to-day, some in slums, and go into smaller houses with much better amenities, because the houses built by local authorities have an ample lay-out and open spaces, and it is ridiculous to condemn these people to live in bad conditions, or in slums, because we take the attitude that they must live in larger houses than they can afford. Any practical person who approaches the subject must come to the conclusion that that, at any rate, is not an improper step, and it would be of great benefit to the health of very many people to-day who are living, undoubtedly, in unsatisfactory conditions because of the high rent that has to be paid, and because there is no other practical alternative by which rents can be reduced.

[Sir K. Wood.]

One or two points have been raised in connection with National Insurance, and I should like to answer representations which have been made to me by the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Womersley) and the right hon. Member for Banff (Mr. Templeton) in relation to the question of share fishermen and the difficulty they are in in connection with the National Insurance Act. Both hon. Members have been unceasing in their applications to the Ministry, and representations have been made as to the unfortunate and unfair position in which these men are placed. I am very glad to state that, after we have 8.0 p.m. very carefully considered the case that they have put forward, we agree that something will have to be done, by which these men shall be incorporated in the National Health Insurance scheme. We propose, when we bring forward our new National Health Insurance Bill, which we will have to bring forward in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission, to do our best to deal with the situation put forward by both the hon. Members. I hope that that will give satisfaction to a very deserving body of men up and down the country. The hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Davies) criticised certain matters in connection with national health insurance, and raised very complicated questions, as did also the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Crawford). I have here a complete explanation, which I think it would be better if I handed to the hon. Gentlemen, because I have not time to reply at length to-night. But I do want to say a word in connection with the position of the approved societies, and I am glad to say that I can report a very much more satisfactory position than I was able to state when I spoke in this House, I think on the Supplementary Estimate, some months ago.

I stated then that the claims made on approved societies had exceeded those of 1925, owing to the general strike and the coal stoppage, by a sum of over £2,000,000, and I also stated that people were being referred to referees at the rate of 400,000 or 500,000 as a consequence. I also stated that one of the unfortunate reasons for the position of approved societies at that moment was the fact that there was a serious shortage of contributions on account of unemployment. It is perfectly true that, following the coal stoppage, there was an unusual and unfortunate influenza epidemic in 1927, but I hope no one will think that, because of the unfortunate experiences of that year, the great financial strength of those societies can be said in any way to be disturbed. There are a good many indications of improved conditions. The sale of stamps at the post offices during the first five months of 1926 realised £8,125,000; the sale of stamps during the first five months of 1927 realised £8,480,000, an increase of about £350,000. The contribution income in 1926 was £740,000 less than in 1925, and nearly the whole of that reduction was during the last three months of the year. The hon. Gentleman made a point about the cash issues of approved societies. These during the first five months of 1925 were £7,720,000, and during the first five months of 1927, £7,940,000. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman can see that there is, at any rate, a sign of improvement.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I asked a specific question as to whether, in view of the result of the Economy Act and the reduction of the contributions of the State, will the societies be in as good a position at the end of the present valuation period as they were at the end of the last valuation period?

Sir K. WOOD: I am not in a position to make any prophesy in regard to that.

Mr. CRAWFURD: I quite recognise that the hon. Gentleman cannot say what will be the state of affairs at the end of the valuation period, but could he state whether there is any prospect of a disposable balance for investment this year?

Sir K. WOOD: I think there is a good prospect of something being available for investment in that way, and there are signs of improvement in that connection. The only other matter with which I want to deal is the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Westthorpe that something more should be done for the trade union approved societies. He said that the trade unions took a greater interest in approved societies than any other bodies. I have in my possession a statement made by the President of the National Union of Trade Union Approved Societies, at their annual conference on 14th June. This is the statement made by the president:

"It was claimed before the Royal Commission that the apathy of insured persons indicated their contentment and satisfaction with the existing order of government in the Industrial Group, and the same apathy was lamented upon by friendly society representatives. This same negative quality is also the great barrier to our progress. It would be illogical to confess to the existence of apathy, and at the same time to claim that the democratic control of Health Insurance by insured persons was in practice of any real value. A distinction should be drawn, however, between a type of society which affords real as distinct from theoretical opportunity for control by its members, and one which does not. The existence of apathy does not alter the fundamental difference between the two types. It nevertheless remains an indisputable fact that the approved society system of administration has not secured that active interest in its control which was predicted for it."

But the matter was carried further than that in the course of the discussion, and this is the observation of the reporter:

"Some bitter references were made to the apathy of trade union leaders in general and to the Trades Union Congress in particular, who seemed to be concerned exclusively with industrial questions and to regard the insurance problem as a nuisance. It was suggested on the other hand that the trouble was the result of the apathy of the rank and file entirely, who, at the time the Insurance Act was passed, were inclined to regard it as a 'Lloyd George stunt' and were not prepared to act until they were forestalled by the outside societies.

Councillor Ernest Corbey of Salford, the general secretary, while admitting that there was nothing to be gained by attempting to apportion blame, said they had to face the facts that nine-tenths of trade union executives looked upon National Health Insurance as a damned nuisance, and did not co-operate with them as they ought to do."

Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not again repeat the statement about the great trade union interest in national health insurance. I wish I could have dealt with the very excellent speech, if I may say so, of the hon. Member for Royton (Dr. Davies), who dealt with small-pox and the necessary steps which should be taken by local authorities. I only want to make one observation on the hospital for post-graduate and medical education, because I do not want the hon. Gentleman, who, I know, has very great influence, or any other hon. Member, to be under the impression that there is any foundation for the statement that there is any idea in the mind of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Health that this should be a State institution. As a matter of fact, this institution is already acting under the auspices of a committee, of which the President of the Royal College of Surgeons, the President of the Royal College of Physicians, the representatives of the chief medical schools, and leading members of the profession like Lord Dawson of Penn are members. This institution will be in the same position as the others: there is no intention that we should start a State institution of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health, and most hon. Members, believe in the voluntary principle, and I hope we shall do nothing to undermine it. I would like, in conclusion, to apologise to various hon. Members because I have not been able to answer the questions which they have put to me. I would like, on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health, to thank the great majority of hon. Members who have spoken for the useful contributions which they have made to the Debate.

Mr. LAWSON: I have sat here all day in order to say a few words upon the subject which was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health as to the very alarming facts concerning the spread of small-pox. I am not one of those who have any love for anti-vaccination, but one thing which has always struck me about the vaccination enthusiasts is that they persistently ignore the connection between good food, and plenty of food, and good health. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health may say about the effects in areas where vaccination is being practised, they cannot get over the fact that the alarming spread of small-pox has kept pace with the growth of unemployment, reduction of wages, and reduction in the standard of life. It is in those areas where the standard of life is being reduced to the greatest extent that small-pox is growing at an alarming rate. The Minister of Health gave figures which showed that this disease was growing at an alarming rate, but he said it was a mild form of the disease compared with the usual small-pox. But I can speak with some knowledge of this subject, because of information I have had from my own district. No one must run away with the idea that this disease is not an extremely painful one, because it is. To some extent it runs in danger of marking the face like the old form of the disease, only in a milder way.

[Mr. Lawson.]

The right hon. Gentleman and the local authorities have a very great problem to deal with in this epidemic. I have watched it growing stage by stage, and, although I do not want to be an alarmist, I believe that if this disease is not dealt with more effectively than is the case at the present time, it will spread throughout the length and breadth of the country. I do not think the doctors have had to deal with anything like it before. The victims are ill for two days, and then, in most cases, they seem to be quite well. The average layman knows that it takes something like seven or eight days for small-pox to develop, or for the marks to become apparent. So that for five or six days a person may be carrying infection as he goes about his work or as he goes about the towns or villages. The right hon. Gentleman ought to get the doctors to make up their minds whether it is really small-pox and what are the symptoms of this particular disease. There is a well-known doctor in the North of England who says it is not small-pox at all, but a form of chicken-pox. There are varying opinions as to what it is. There needs to be some consensus of opinion upon this matter. Whatever steps the right hon. Gentleman may take to prevent the spread of this disease, if he really gets down to the causes of it he will investigate the conditions of the people in those parts where small-pox exists. In my own area, the prevalence of the disease has been very extensive indeed. I am not going to say there are bad conditions existing in every family where small-pox breaks out. When fevers and other diseases break loose they spread among all sections of people. Here is what the medical officer of health for Chester-le-Street told the rural district council, and it is very interesting in view of the criticisms which have been levelled at Chester-le-Street as to the extravagant payments they are supposed to have made:

"I see children at meals, and it is very pitiful in some cases to witness the straits to which people are reduced. Three or four days ago I was in a house where the cupboard was bare and the children were getting a dinner which was an absolute disgrace. There was nothing in it to build up health, bone and muscle. When I spoke to the mother and told her that the children were not getting an adequate meal, she said it was the best she had. Many houses get no milk except a tin of condensed milk, which is, perhaps, made to serve a fortnight. Milk is essential for growing children. Until the people get more money through their fingers, I am afraid these circumstances will continue."

I use this material because I know it is first-hand, and because it is particularly in mining areas where small-pox is spreading. It would be impossible to convey to this Committee the physical deterioration which is taking place in the great mine-fields of this country at the present moment. It is one of the most pathetic sights, and I think it has had no parallel in our time. While the right hon. Gentleman may be right from the point of view of preventative purposes in emphasising the question of vaccination, he certainly will not do anything really effective unless he can pay strict attention to the proper feeding of the people in those areas where unemployment runs riot. While the right hon. Gentleman may be right, when we hear the elaborate statements as to the efficacy of vaccination, we say that vaccination is not very much good if people are not able to obtain a regular breakfast.

Question, "That a sum not exceeding £12,943,493 be granted for the said Service," put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. LANSBURY rose—

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CLASS II.

DOMINIONS OFFICE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,440, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1928, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of His Majesty's Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs."—[Note: £20,000 has been voted on account.]

Mr. MACPHERSON: Important as are the questions which have just been discussed, I make no apology when I ask the Committee to consider for a moment or two a matter of world-wide importance. I refer to the Report of the Imperial Conference, and particularly to one aspect of that Report. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) has been very persistent in this House in endeavouring to get a day, or time, for the discussion of that Report. Like many of us, he felt that if a document of such colossal importance was discussed in various other Parliaments of the Empire, it was, surely, not inappropriate that we should ask for a day, or even half a day, to discuss it in the Mother of Parliaments. Perhaps, though this discussion is late, it is not inappropriate that it should take place now, when we have just witnessed the return from their wonderful journey overseas of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York. Nothing fosters the spirit of Empire so much as personal contact, and no link is more powerful in the chain of the Imperial unity than the link of the Throne, and Their Royal Highnesses represented that combination with consummate success. As hon. Members of the Committee are aware, the Report of the Imperial Conference wanders over a very wide field. There were, I think, three main and important points which were discussed.

They are, inter-Imperial relations, foreign policy, defence, economic questions, and consultation and communications. No doubt each and all of these questions will be discussed this evening, but, so far as I am concerned, I am going to devote my remarks to one question alone, a question which I regard as of primary importance, namely, the question of inter-Imperial relations. For the first time this Report asserts not only the doctrine, but the fact of equality of status among the constituent members and Parliaments of the Empire. If anyone reads the Report itself and the discussions in the various Parliaments of the Empire on the Report, they will find that they make wonderful reading. The general impression which I got, and which I think anybody would get, is that the magnificent conception of the British Empire, or, if you like, the British Commonwealth of Nations, is too big a thing to be left to the dangers and chances and caprices of ordinary party politics and that some step must be taken, as soon as it can be taken, to secure continuity and, above all, unity of purpose in a partnership so beneficent and so powerful for the good of the world. I notice in the Report that this question was discussed by the Conference. Very wisely, they said that nothing would be gained by laying down a hard-and-fast constitution for the British Empire, and in their Report they give various reasons for that view. May I just read a sentence or two from the Report, which puts in far better words than I can, on the spur of the moment, their reasons for this point of view. They say:

"Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; while, considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organisation which now exists or has ever yet been tried. There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the Dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

[Mr. Macpherson.]

To lay down a hard-and-fast constitution, would, in my judgment, be alien to the genius and traditions of the British people. I quote one other sentence from the Report:

"A foreigner endeavouring to understand the true character of the British Empire by the aid of this formula alone would be tempted to think that it was devised rather to make mutual interference impossible than to make mutual co-operation easy."

In the art of government we have a code and method peculiarly our own. In my view, and in the view of the party I represent, there can be no forcing of any such growth, no undue precipitance. The only safe way is to trust to what the right hon. Member for Seaham (Mr. Webb) called in another connection, the inevitability of gradualness, and the inherent genius of our own people to find a way. The Imperial Conference itself, never so far-reaching in its importance and possibilities as it proved to be on this last occasion, is an example of this. It represents the evolution of past attempts at consultation, the steady silent growth from a Colonial Conference, as far back as 1887, exactly 50 years ago this year, and I am convinced of this, that if it attempted to be a super council or a supreme council sitting in judgment on the various constituent Parliaments of the Empire it would signally fail. It was my good fortune, in common with many of my colleagues, to be a member of the Empire Parliamentary Association which went to the great Dominion of Australia last year, and I am right in saying that all of us, whatever political party we belong to, found pride surging in our bosoms as we travelled round the world and realised that we could travel round the world always landing on British soil, except for an hour or two at Honolulu.

At Canberra, which has now become historic, we had a discussion on this very important topic, a discussion which was initiated with characteristic efficiency and ability by the hon. Member for the Aston Division of Birmingham (Sir E. Cecil). We had, and it was a great joy to us, the advantage of many brilliant speeches, but there were two speeches which impressed themselves on my mind very vividly. One was the speech from the acting Prime Minister of Australia, Dr. Earl Page, and the other was a speech from our old friend Mr. William Hughes. The gist of their speeches was that the problem before the British Empire was the application of the principles of democratic government to the circumstances of world Empire, and to continue to reconcile the irreconcilable—namely, the autonomy of the parts with the unity of the whole. It was clearly pointed out, not by one speaker but by every speaker, and every single Dominion under the British Crown was represented, that unity of policy is vital to the existence of the British Empire, and that unity of policy is and must continue to be the ideal of the Empire. The question which at once suggests itself is: how is that unity, that continuous policy, to be attained? Before any action is taken the mind of each Dominion should be known and well known to the deciding authority. My own view is that, although an annual Imperial Conference is the ideal, it is quite clear to anybody who knows the far-flung lines of the British Empire that until space and time are obliterated this is quite impossible.

There is another consideration which militates against the holding of an annual conference. Hon. Members know very well how important it is to have the Prime Minister near at hand, and it has always been felt by the Prime Ministers of all the Dominions that it is perfectly impossible for them to be absent from their various Dominions except for a brief space of time. If for the moment an annual conference is impossible, what is to be done? Not only do I think that an annual conference is the ideal, but I go a step further, and I am supported by the united party for whom I am speaking. I have pointed out the almost insuperable obstacles against holding the conference annually, but it is important that when they are held there should be upon them representatives not only of Governments but of the Oppositions in the various Dominions of the Empire. In 1924, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Mr. Thomas), when he was at the Colonial Office, approached the various Parliaments of the Dominions to consider whether it was not practicable, particularly for a conference upon the constitution of the British Empire, to have representatives not only of Governments but of Oppositions as well. I could not do better than read what was then regarded as the reply to any such suggestion. It will be remembered that the Labour Government demitted office during the course of the negotiations. But in any case, if they had been in office, I doubt very much whether, in view of the answers then given by the Prime Ministers of the more important Dominions, they could possibly have negotiated any further. I will read one or two sentences from Command Paper 2301, "Consultation on matters of foreign policy and general and Imperial interest," which was then issued. The reasons given by the Dominion Premiers at that time for opposing the proposal to have the Opposition as well as the Government as members of the Imperial Conference, were these:

"It would tend to hamper that frank exchange of views and the unrestricted intercommunication of confidential information on such matters as foreign policy and defence. Furthermore, it might easily lead to serious consequences on the return of the delegations to their respective countries. The Leader of the Government and of the Opposition would, respectively, feel compelled to relate his version of the Conference and his reasons for agreement or disagreement with the conclusions arrived at. Further, an atmosphere of political controversy would inevitably obtrude into the Conference itself, and present free and unfettered discussions between men who at the time are actually shouldering responsibilities of Government in their respective countries would disappear."

That was the view then. May I say, with the greatest respect, that I do not think those objections, carefully thought out as they are, should for ever remain valid and insuperable. Let me take one outstanding case. I do not think anybody then commanded greater respect in this country or the Empire than did the Committee of Imperial Defence. It was in the heyday of its usefulness and fame, and, as the Secretary of State knows very well, it did enormously useful work, and indeed, had it not been for it we should have been far more unprepared than we were at the outbreak of the War. The problems which the Committee of Imperial Defence had to solve were almost the same as the problems that the Imperial Conference has to solve, relating to matters of defence and of foreign policy. But though a Liberal Government was in power at that time and had a very large majority behind it, I think Lord Asquith was very wise in inviting the then Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Balfour, to participate in the deliberations and the discussions of the Imperial Defence Committee. I am convinced that none of the arguments which were advanced by the Prime Ministers of the Dominions in opposition to the proposal which I have made plain to the Committee, was ever used in this House or outside it, when all parties, Government and Opposition, were united in the Committee of Imperial Defence to consider the best way of maintaining the defence of the nation and the Empire. The fact remains, and one cannot gainsay it, that at the present moment some of the Dominions are averse from having the Opposition as well as themselves as delegates to the Imperial Conference. So long as those objections obtain, some machinery has to be devised for improved methods of consultation. I agree with the report that when you are considering methods of that kind for improved consultation in the interval between the Conferences, you cannot rely upon the usual dogmas, but you have rather to look for some flexible machinery. I notice that in the White Paper I have read, one step was suggested by the Prime Minister of Australia during the course of the negotiations with the Labour Government. He thought that one step which should be taken—it has been taken, for all I know, because I happened to be away last year during the Conference—and I think it is a reasonable step, was the creation of a permanent Secretariat. Mr. Bruce said:

"At the present time the Secretariat for the Imperial Conference is provided by the British Government together with representatives of the Dominions concerned, but immediately the Conference is over the Secretariat is broken up and no effective machinery exists for keeping the Dominions continuously informed as to the developments or alterations necessitated by changed circumstances. In the opinion of my Government a great improvement would be effected by the establishment of a permanent Imperial Secretariat."

Not only is that one step which might well be considered, but in the course of the debate at Canberra there were various other proposals brought forward. One was that there should be an improvement in the status of the High Commissioners, that they in reality should be as it were, Ambassadors to this country, and that if the High Commissioners were not changed there might very well be appointed from all the Dominions a Minister of Cabinet rank who would be resident for some time in London, irrespective of the Government in power, and that he should be in touch at all times with the Home Government. I do not know whether, in the discussion to which we listened in Canberra, that found very great favour or not, but the fact remains that the Australian Government has attempted to meet that suggestion in a practical way. It has, I believe, appointed a liaison officer, Captain Casey—I am not sure whether I am right in this—to act between the Australian Government and the Home Government on matters of foreign policy. I understand that this very valuable officer is doing most effective work; and that the Australian Government is now, as never before, acquainted with the various Foreign Office problems with which this country is confronted.

[Mr. Macpherson.]

If none of these proposals is right, may I make a suggestion which I think is worth consideration. I see that the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir F. Nelson) is present. I went to Australia on this delegation, and the thought that suggested itself to many of us then, though not in exactly the same way, was that, as there is a Preparatory Commission in Geneva before, let us say, a Disarmament Conference, so there should be some sort of Parliamentary Conference or Convention composed of members of all parties from all the Dominions meeting once a year. Everyone knows that the essence of the work of a Preparatory Conference is to prepare the programme which will be discussed in the Plenary Session. What has been the experience of the Members of this House within the last three or four years? We have had an Empire Parliamentary Delegation not only to South Africa, but to Australia. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton), who may have an opportunity of speaking in this Debate, was one of the Members who went to the Union of South Africa. Members of all parties went to Australia and, I believe, next year there may be an opportunity of going to Canada.

The desire of all the delegates whom I met from all the other Dominions was, that an attempt should be made to have a conference in London of men of all parties from all Parliaments in the Empire. What did we do in Australia? I can only speak from my own personal experience. I found that these conferences were of great educational value. They embodied well-informed opinion and made each Parliament acquainted with the view not only of every other Parliament, but of every other party in every other Parliament throughout the Dominions. What were our experiences there? There was not a single State which we did not visit and there was not a single Parliament with whose members we did not discuss local and Imperial problems. It was not a question merely of the representatives of this Government visiting the Australian States; it was a question of delegates from every Parliament in the Empire going there. I do not know what were the experiences of my colleagues, but my own experience is clear in my mind. I found the journey a most profitable one. We went there, not as carping critics but as students and inquirers. We learned a great deal from the Australian States individually and collectively. We learned a great deal from the Ministers of the Federal Parliament and, as the delegation was composed I think I may say, of representative men from all parties in the State, the Australian people were good enough to say that they learned a great deal from us.

What stood out above all else was the fact that by personal influence and contact we came to realise the magnitude of their problems and their way of looking at things. We hope that, in return, by contact with us they realised the difficulties of the mother country in the executive control of this great Empire. I would impress upon the Secretary of State to consider whether in view of the fact that it is almost physically impossible to have a yearly plenary conference of the Empire we should not have, on the lines I am suggesting, a Parliamentary conference or convention, composed of men of all parties from all the Parliaments of all the Dominions meeting in some parts of the Empire once every year. I know a great many hon. Members are anxious to speak and I conclude by saying that these are the views of the party to which I belong. I believe, with some confidence, that they are the views of the House of Commons as a whole. We appreciate the unflinching interest which the Secretary of State has shown throughout his political life and which he continues to show in Imperial problems and any assistance which we can give to maintain our Empire in its proud position as the greatest instrument for peace and liberty in this world we shall gladly give.

Sir JOHN MARRIOTT: I think it would be singularly ungracious if I were not to express at the outset my great appreciation of the courtesy of the Liberal party in providing us with this opportunity of debating a matter of first rate importance. I do not wish to waste any of the short and precious time at my disposal in complaints or regrets as to the defects of our system of procedure, which permits such an anomaly as this. I would, in one sentence, renew the protest which I made in the Debate on the Motion for Adjournment before Whitsuntide, against the vagaries of a system under which the vast majority of the Members of this House find it impossible, except by the grace and courtesy of their political opponents to raise questions of such importance as that which is raised to-night. I have a notice on the Order Paper to this effect:

"That it is desirable that this House should have an opportunity of considering the declarations and recommendations contained in the Report of the Imperial Conference of 1926."

I notice that in the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada three or four months ago the Leader of the Conservative Opposition moved a Resolution to the effect that it was not desirable that that House should be deemed tacitly to have acquiesced in the declarations and recommendations contained in the Report of the Imperial Conference of 1926. Had an opportunity offered I should have been very glad to have moved in the House of Commons here in identical terms, for it seems to me that if it is regarded as intolerable that a Dominion Parliament should be deemed tacitly to have acquiesced in these recommendations and declarations, much more is it intolerable that the acquiescence of this Imperial Parliament—if we may be provisionally permitted to retain the use of that proud but, perhaps, archaic title—should be tacitly assumed. As far as I know, down to the present moment the only reference to this settlement which has been made by a Minister of the Crown in the House of Commons was an almost casual reference by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary when he said, speaking in the Debate on the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act:

"The Dominions of the Crown, the great self-governing Dominions, are, certainly since this last Imperial Conference, co-equal with the United Kingdom. They do not belong to this Parliament; they are not in any sense subject to the jurisdiction of this Parliament." — [OFFICIAL REPORT, 15th March, 1927; col. 1894, Vol. 203.]

Now the point I want the Committee to observe is that my right hon. Friend spoke of something having taken place since the last Imperial Conference. I want to know whether we are to understand that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Ministers, there has been a change in constitutional relations since November, 1926? I want my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to tell us, quite frankly, has there been a change, and, if so, should not the Imperial Parliament at least have been informed of the change, if not asked formally to sanction it? If there has been a change, what precisely is the nature of the change? Has it affected or will it affect the prerogatives of the Crown? Has it affected or will it affect the rights or duties of this Parliament? We were told in many quarters, more or less responsible, last November when this Report first appeared that there had been no change in inter-Imperial relations. It was said that the old facts had been restated in a new way, that there had been a definition of status which was vague, and so on, but there had been no change. I want to know whether that is the view of His Majesty's Government. It is certainly not the view of His Majesty's advisers in another part of his Empire:

"They had received from the last Imperial Conference"—

I am quoting—

"the acknowledgment by Great Britain of their sovereign national status, with full abandonment by the British Government of any claim to control or superior authority, with the acknowledgment of all rights or privileges, both local and foreign, as equal, free peoples."

Those are the words of His Majesty's Prime Minister in the Union Parliament of South Africa. I want to know from His Majesty's Government to-night: Is it the case that the Dominions have received from the last Imperial Conference the acknowledgment of their sovereign national status; was there by the British Government a full abandonment; if so, what did the British Government abandon; and by whom were they authorised to abandon it? The Leader of the Conservative party in the Dominion Parliament of Canada would seem, to some extent, up to a point, to have agreed with the Prime Minister of South Africa. Speaking in the Canadian House, he said:

[Sir J. Marriott.]

"Recommendations were made by the Conference involving what one must pronounce to be grave constitutional changes in Canada."

If such changes only affected Canada in a domestic sense, then I should not, perhaps, be entitled to ask what those changes were, but I think I am entitled to ask whether those changes had any reflex action upon the relations between Canada and the Imperial Government, and, if they had, I submit that this House is at least entitled to have official information as to what those changes were.

I want to put to my right hon. Friend one or two rather more specific and particular questions which arise directly out of this Report on Inter-Imperial Relations, but before putting those questions, which I will put as briefly as I can, I want to refer to one or two rather curious sentences in the Preamble of the Report, which begins—and to this I take no exception:

"The Committee are of opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a Constitution for the British Empire."

I agree, but they go on:

"There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the Dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined"—and the Report proceeds to define them, but it goes on:

"The principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function. Here we require something more than immutable dogmas."

When I read of immutable dogmas and readiness of definition, there sometimes crosses my mind a doubt whether we were altogether wise in letting loose a metaphysician upon the constitution of the British Empire. I am 9.0 p.m. afraid that a metaphysician in politics may be as dangerous as was an Athanasius in theology, and I can only hope that there will be no attempt to reduce to the articles of a creed the incomprehensible and conflicting dogmas which are, as I submit, accommodated by the subtlety of the metaphysician within the apparently innocent and prosaic pages of this Report. In any case, I hope I shall not be eternally damned if I find it difficult to subscribe to them in their completeness.

Now for the specific questions. The first relates to a matter which we have already debated in this House to some extent, though not since the proclamation of His Majesty; I mean the change in His Majesty's title. I confess that it strikes me rather oddly to read:

"George V., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas King," and so on, if, as I understand Ireland has claimed very specifically the status of a Dominion, because by this declaration it is obviously excluded from the category of a Dominion. However, that is a point which I will allow to pass. The next question dealt with in the Report is the position of the Governors-General, on which the Report says:

"In our opinion, it is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations that the Governor-General of a Dominion is the representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any department of that Government."

What I want to know is this: Have His Majesty's Government indicated to the Dominions their acceptance of any change in the constitutional position or status of the Governors-General, and more particularly in their relation to the British Government? If they have indicated any such change, I should very much like to know precisely what it is. If the Governor-General is to be no longer the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any Department of that Government, then two questions seem to me inevitably to arise, which it is very important to set at rest. The first is, On whose advice is the Governor-General to be appointed by the Crown? and the second is, Through what channel is the Governor-General to communicate with the Crown, and are these communications with the Crown brought to the knowledge of His Majesty's constitutional advisers in this country, or are they not? I express a respectful hope that we may have clear answers to these specific questions.

The next question dealt with is the operation of Dominion legislation. The attention of the Conference was called to a number of points which are, no doubt, familiar to hon. Members, and which I will not read in full, but I would draw the attention of the Committee to the conclusion at which the Conference arrived. They came to the conclusion: "that the issues involved"— that is to say, in the operation of Dominion legislation—

"were so complex that there would be grave danger in attempting any immediate pronouncement other than a statement of certain principles which, in our opinion, underlie the whole question of the operation of Dominion legislation."

If I may respectfully say so, I think they arrived at a very wise conclusion. What I want to know is: Has this Committee to which this conclusion points actually been set up? If it has, might the House of Commons know what is the personnel of that committee? Then there was the question of merchant shipping legislation, in regard to which the Conference finally came to the conclusion, following a precedent which had been found useful on previous occasions, that the general question of merchant shipping legislation had best be committed to a special sub-conference. Has that sub-conference met? Obviously this question of merchant shipping legislation raises a matter of great practical as well as of great theoretical significance, because, as all the Members of this Committee are very well aware, there exists a long series of Acts relating to merchant shipping, Acts which have been passed by this Parliament as the Sovereign Parliament of the Empire and the only body which is competent to pass legislation binding upon all parts of the Empire. So far as I am aware, no one has up to the present, at any rate up to the publication of this Report, ever questioned the sovereign authority of the King in Parliament as a legislature competent to legislate for the Empire as a whole and to enact laws which possess equal validity in all parts of it. It is perfectly true that the actual sphere of its legislative activity has been very strictly and severely limited. In practice it has been confined to securing objects which are common to the Empire as a whole but are outside the competence of any given Colonial Legislature. I want to know whether that function—and here we are, I suppose, in the region of dogmas which are immutable—has ceased? Would it or would it not still be competent to this Parliament to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts?

There are many other points in this Report to which, if time permitted, I should have been only too glad to call attention. The Report of the Conference as a whole and the discussions which have taken place on it in the Dominion Parliaments have filled me with a certain measure of anxiety and disquietude. It seems to me there is in some quarters a disposition very loyally to accept, or, rather to accentuate, the position of the Crown as the head of the Executive Government of the Empire, but to repudiate the authority of the King in Parliament. That seems to me to be a differentiation of rather sinister augury, with rather unhappy associations. I will not recall those associations more particularly, because they are sinister, and I do not want to tread to-night on ground so delicate; but I will venture to say that no constitutional jurist can be satisfied with the attempt to differentiate between the two aspects and the two functions of sovereignty, which, if not inseparable, cannot without manifest danger be divorced one from the other. I have already hinted that this Report fills me with some disquietude, not only because of, and perhaps less by reason of, what it actually contains, but by reason of the scant attention which has been given to it in this country, and particularly in this House of Commons, scant attention given to a document which, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Macpherson) said, is a document admittedly of profound and far-reaching constitutional significance.

[Sir J. Marriott.]

I had great hopes, 10 years ago, that under the stress of the Great War we were, as an Empire, taking large and rapid strides in the direction of a more organic unity of the Empire. I recall very well the prediction of a distinguished military historian in Germany to the effect that the first shot fired in the great European war would mean the dissolution of Great Britain's loosely-compacted Empire. The words were the words of General Bernhardt. We all recall how completely that prediction was falsified by events. We all recall how, as month succeeded month, the union was drawn closer and closer; and I shall never forget the day when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George), then at the head of His Majesty's Government—I am very sorry he is not in his place to-night—announced to the great satisfaction of the House that it had that day been determined that the Imperial War Cabinet should form an integral and permanent part of our Imperial Constitution. I think it was on the 17th May, 1917. There were many of us who that day were prepared to sing Nunc Dimittis. Then came the Peace Conference in Paris. That was followed, as we all know, and as some of us regret, by a definite lowering of the Imperial temperature, which in the Report we are discussing to-night seems to me to have fallen very near to zero; and the worst of it is that hardly anybody seems to care.

A South African statesman is reported as having said that the British Empire now exists as a name only. I hope he was misreported, but if he was correctly reported then I hope and believe that events will prove his assertion to be inaccurate. In this matter, as the Committee is very well aware, there has been, for years past, a continual ebb and flow of opinion, there has been action and reaction. For the moment I think we are in the trough of the waves. I hope and believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—and there is no man in whom the Empire has greater confidence—will succeed in righting the craft, and I hope he will forgive me for having broken to-night a silence which I, at any rate, do not regard as good.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. Member who has just sat down gave us a considerable wealth of historical facts and he quoted some learned conundrums on constitutional law to the Secretary of State for the Dominions, but I do not propose to follow on his lines. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Macpherson) raised the issue of whether or not it was possible to have an annual Parliamentary Congress of the Empire, and, as I understood him, he spoke on behalf of the Liberal party and declared that he accepted the point of view so repeatedly urged by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. J. H. Thomas) that in these Parliamentary Conferences the Opposition should be represented. I know the arguments which are used against this annual conference. There are arguments of space and time and lack of money, and I do not propose, and indeed I am not at all competent, to discuss them. But surely there might be agreement on this, that every triennial Imperial Conference should be preceded by a Parliamentary Conference representative of all parts of the Empire, and this I take it could quite easily be organised by the Empire Parliamentary Association. These triennial Parliamentary Conferences might quite easily and quite speedily develop into something in the nature of a Standing Committee of an Imperial Parliament, and we might in our British way develop almost unconsciously into that dream, which many of us hold, of an Imperial Parliament representing all parts of the Empire dealing with Imperial questions only, and leaving every other constituent part of the British Empire with a free measure of Home Rule to look after its own affairs.

Certainly, there are questions which somehow have got to be discussed in common and which cannot be dictated from Whitehall. There are, for instance, questions such as migration, trade, tariffs, defence, foreign relations, and so forth; and no one who studies events in Australia and follows Australian party politics can fail to observe the necessity for closer touch being established between this country and Australia—that is only one illustration—before the tariff barriers and tariff walls are broken to such an extent as to make that economic and organised unity we so desire, a reality. When one sees, for instance, the tariff being raised, say, by the motor group in this country, and when one understands the feelings aroused, say, in Leicester by a tariff on hosiery in Australia, it seems all the more urgent that steps should be taken, not to interfere with the economic independence of this country or Australia, but to have a joint discussion on all these matters.

In this Parliamentary Convention, which I trust the Secretary of State will see his way to encourage by bringing the suggestion before the Empire Parliamentary Association prior to the next Imperial Conference, I hope there will be representatives of all parts of the Empire, and not of the self-governing Dominions only. I should like to see tribal representatives, representatives of every section and every part of the British Empire, in that Parliamentary Convention. Certainly, there is no reason that I can understand why Ceylon and the West Indies and India should not be represented, and if representatives of those parts, as well as from Nigeria, the Gold Coast, Kenya, and so on, were selected on a tribal basis, it would bring them into touch with the other representatives of the Empire. That would do much more, in my belief, to strengthen the economic and organic unity of the Empire than anything else we have done. I want to say a word about some things in the Report of the last Imperial Conference. It is rather surprising to me that an important issue and an important document such as this should only be possible of discussion, as the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) put it, by the courtesy of one section of the Opposition.

Mr. MACPHERSON: He said by the courtesy of the Liberal party.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Liberal party is a section of the Opposition, but, if the right hon. Gentleman prefers me to say, "by the courtesy of the Liberal party," I will say it. There are matters referred to in this Report which I do not think have been discussed here at all. There is, for instance, the work of the Empire Marketing Board, which has not been discussed in this House, and yet no more important development has taken place than the establishment of this Board. They are doing very valuable work on research, but I am not so sure that they are doing such valuable work with regard to markets and the organisation of markets which they might very well do. Mr. Bruce, the Australian Prime Minister, said at the last Imperial Conference—I am quoting from page 73 of the Report of that Conference:

"Practically every great country in the world to-day has taken some step towards organisation on a basis of co-operative marketing, and it is very possible that on this whole question we might have to take an Imperial point of view."

Later on, after referring to rubber and cotton, he said:

"Co-operative marketing is a factor which we shall have increasingly to consider in the future. . . . I am certain that in the end, it will be enormously to the benefit of the consumer if we can get all marketing done on a basis where the producers are not subject to the machinations of the speculator."

That is the considered opinion, not of a Socialist, but of the anti-Labour Premier of Australia. There has got to be co-operative marketing to get rid of, as he calls it, the machinations of the speculator before the profits of trade can accrue to the producer there and the consumer here, and to the producer here and the consumer there. Some attempt has been made, I know, at the organisation of our markets. In New Zealand, according to the statement of the Prime Minister of New Zealand, co-operative organisations under the ægis of the State, have succeeded in securing very considerable reductions in freights and in storage rates. In that connection, I might quote a statement made by Mr. Bruce in dealing with the case of Australia. He said:

"Take the case of meat. A man will breed cattle, carry them for five years, perhaps, transport them conceivably hundreds of miles to a meat works, bear all the cost of treatment at the meat works, bear the freight, bring the meat to Britain with the insurance and other incidental charges, and probably will get for his whole share about one-half to one-third of what is received by those who handle the meat after it has actually reached the hands of the distributor in this country."

Something has got to be done about that. It is not only in regard to meat, but every other commodity which comes from the Dominions. I wonder if the right hon. Gentleman now feels himself in a position to tell the Committee and the country what befell the Australian apple crop two years ago. The entire Tasmanian apple crop was marketed in this country. There were the transport, the refrigerator, and freight costs, and all the rest of it. It was brought to London, the harbour dues were paid, and it was sold in this country. What did the Tasmanian grower get? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell the Committee that the Australian grower got nothing for his crop, but had, instead, to send a cheque for something like £30,000 to pay the cost of marketing his goods. With instances like that which occur in regard to fruit and other marketing, and with the evidence we have through the Department of Overseas Trade, there is the fact that the present Government, in letting out their meat contracts, have never considered another aspect of the matter. I asked the Secretary of State for War whether in the meat contract—which was not given to Australia last year but to South America—there was any stipulation about fair wages and fair conditions or hours of labour. He said, "No, it does not apply outside this country." Australia applies it; South America does not apply it, and the right hon. Gentleman purchases in South America the meat supply for this country. The competition is not on a fair basis. If Australia is working a 44-hours week and paying decent wages, and no attempt whatever is made to insist that Australia's competitors shall pay equally fair wages and observe decent conditions, then I submit that the spirit of the Resolution passed in this House regarding fair wages and fair conditions of labour is being ignored by His Majesty's Government and that Australia is not having a fair chance to compete.

[Mr. Johnston.]

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has the latest figures or not, but it seems to me that, apart from the self-governing Dominions altogether, the extraordinary development in British trade and exports to what are called, or used to be called, our Colonies, is worthy of careful study. The figures which I have extracted from the Report of the last Imperial Conference work out something like this. Our exports to these Colonies in 1905 were £18,000,000. In 1913 they had grown to £47,000,000, and in 1925 to £60,000,000. Over those years they have grown by 300 per cent. Allowance must, of course, be made for the change in prices, but nevertheless the volume of the increased exports to these Colonies deserves the very careful consideration of this Committee.

There is another side to the matter. As I understand it, every family in Australia purchases to-day somewhere about £60 worth of British goods per annum—probably more than £60. What is every family in Greece or in South America purchasing? I cannot get the figures. I have asked questions in this House until I am tired. I have written letters to the Department of Overseas Trade, but, while I acknowledge the courtesy of the present Secretary to the Department, I cannot get the figures, because he does not have them. After months have elapsed, perhaps you get a letter from some British Consul in South America saying that the value of the peso and of money has changed and that it does not buy so much meat as it used to do, and so on, but all that is meaningless. Surely, some Department of State ought to be able to inform us exactly what is the purchasing power per family of every other country in the world. Let us have the facts before us. We have fiscal discussions up and down the country, but we have not the facts, and, as far as I know, no Government Department has them.

Lastly, I should like to say that it is not only in regard to food commodities that effective organisation under the auspices of the Empire Marketing Board could take place. There are raw materials in regard to which effective organisation could be established. Raw materials probably might be the first thing that the Empire Marketing Board, if it knew its business, could tackle. I take the question of the raw material, which forms the staple industry of the city I represent in this House—jute. It is all grown in the British Empire and in one Province—Bengal. Yet last year, owing to speculators and market riggers—and forestallers and regraters, as they used to say in the old Acts of the Scottish Parliament—who have never handled the stuff at all and who are useless parasites on the business, the price for the same quality of first-class raw jute, grown in the same Province and from the same harvest, fluctuated between £29 and £61 per ton. I submit that there is no industry which can be conducted satisfactorily on a fluctuating basis of that kind. It cannot be done. Decent wages cannot be paid to workers. It would be, surely, very easy for the manufacturers concerned to organise co-operative buying departments and wipe out the speculator. If they will not do it thoroughly, then the British Government must step in and undertake to be the sole importer or organise the imports of such commodities.

Someone may well ask why they do not seize the opportunity of stabilising the price of the raw material. The answer is quite simple: many of them are far more interested in making money as speculators, as middlemen, than they are as owners and managers of factories. If they will not do it, I submit that it is the business of the Empire Marketing Board, in the interest of the British people and of the Indian ryot, in the interest of inter-Imperial commerce, to step in and see that these and similar grievances are remedied. In the Report of one of the Sub-Committees of the Imperial Economic Conference, the Sub-Committee on Industrial Standardisation, some information is given which I have never seen referred to in Debates in this House. That Sub-Committee reported that in Great Britain as a result of even voluntary organisation and standardisation, the number of iron and steel sections was reduced from some hundreds to 113, and that a saving of 5s. per ton. in cost of manufacture has been effected as a consequence. The Report goes on to say:

"It has recently been estimated that the value of the stocks of ironmongery in wholesalers' and retailers' hands in Great Britain amounts to some 25 million pounds sterling, and that comparatively moderate measures of simplification, by reducing the number of types, would probably result in the release of one-fifth of the working capital thus locked up."

We are also told that in South Africa the number of types of engines required for the railways has been reduced by standardisation from 68 to 11, all going in the direction of making British industry more efficient. That organisation we have been urging, with no success whatever, upon the coal-mining industry in this country. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman to-day will give us some indication that he sees beyond the mere party squabbles of the moment, and that he is prepared to use all his opportunities, all his powers of persuasion through the Empire Marketing Board, to put our Imperial relationships on a new and better footing, to better British trade, not by the acceptance of tariffs and so on, which arouse controversy, but, using the powers he has now, to increase the purchasing power of the inhabitants of this Empire, because only by so doing can we increase British exports, reduce unemployment, and make for British happiness and prosperity.

Mr. O'NEILL: The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Johnston) associated himself with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) to the effect that it was curious that it was so difficult to obtain time to discuss these important Imperial questions on a Supply day in the House of Commons. I quite agree, so far as regards the complaint on this side of the House, but, surely, the remedy of the hon. Member opposite is to get his own leaders to ask for a Supply day upon which these important Imperial matters could be properly and profitably discussed. The hon. Member began his speech in an eminently high, and, if I may say so, most statesmanlike way; and, although what he said in the latter portion of his speech was extraordinarily interesting about the Empire Marketing Board, I nevertheless felt that it would have been better to have kept the discussion upon the larger and higher plane upon which it was opened by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Macpherson). It is possible to discuss these comparatively minor matters on other days, but I feel that it would be well to say a word or two with regard to the larger issue which has been raised.

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross and Cromarty envisaged some very interesting possibilities when he referred to conferences which might take place—conferences composed of members from all the Parliaments of the Empire, assembled together here in London, from all parties in those Parliaments, to discuss matters of common Imperial concern. It is something very like an All-Imperial Parliament. The excellent work of the Empire Parliamentary Association has, in fact, enabled conferences of that character to take place in certain

[Mr. O'Neill.]

Dominions, and, as the hon. Member for Dundee suggested, very rightly, in my view, those conferences arranged by the Empire Parliamentary Association will, it is to be hoped, be continued and expanded. I cannot, however, see that that has really much to do with the Imperial Conference as we have understood it hitherto, that is to say, a Conference of representatives of Governments who are sent to the Conference with definite powers to take decisions and carry things out.

Any extension which may be found possible of the idea of Dominion Governments having representatives in this country at the Foreign Office, such as I understand the Australian Government have, is all to the good. I remember, not long ago, being at a meeting where I heard the Australian representative to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred give a very interesting account of what he, in association with his Government, was carrying out. I hope that that kind of thing will be extended and developed, but, of course, it must take time. In the meantime we are progressing. For example, there has been the Conference of representatives from the Crown Colonies which was held in London quite recently under the auspices of the Secretary of State—I think the first conference of its kind which has ever taken place in the history of the Empire. I have no doubt that that Conference, the Report of which was recently issued, will be found to have accomplished some very useful results.

With regard to what my hon. Friend the Member for York said about the Report on Inter-Imperial relations from the Imperial Conference, my hon. Friend asked the Secretary of State a number of very appropriate and very categorical questions. They were questions which emanated from one whose experience and knowledge of constitutional and Imperial matters are very high indeed, but, at the same time, I have a sort of feeling that it would be better if those questions were not asked. In fact, I doubt whether it would be possible for the Secretary of State to answer them categorically, and, even if he could, I doubt whether it would be wise.

This report on Imperial relations is, as it was described at the time it was issued, a great State document of very vast importance; but it is nothing in the nature of a written Imperial constitution. If it was, I think the Empire would not be so closely held together as it is under the present system. What it really did was to put upon paper a great many things which were, in fact, the case before. It elaborated them, and although there may be in it points which we may individually think had perhaps better be left alone, I feel that, on the whole, thanks no doubt to the great ability of the great statesman who presided over that Conference, the report of the committee will go down in the history of the Empire as being constructive rather than destructive, and that it will result not in the worsening but in the improving, if it were possible, and the bettering of the relations between the different Dominions of the Crown.

I had not intended to say anything when I came into the House, and the few observations which I have made constitute what I feel to be the genesis of this matter with regard to the Committee on Imperial Relations. I am sorry that a matter of such great importance should be debated in a House so small. That is a sentiment which is very often used in this House. Of course, we all know that there cannot be a large House for every matter; but I am sorry, particularly in view of the very statesman-like speech of the hon. Member for Dundee, that he and two other hon. Members beside him are the sole representatives of his party in this Debate. However, I feel sure that a useful purpose has been served by the raising of these great Imperial matters, and it is right and proper that they should be raised in this Imperial Parliament.

Sir ROBERT HAMILTON: I must confess that I regret very much that the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) declared that he was filled with disquietude and anxiety because of the report of the Conference on Imperial Relations. On the contrary, I am filled with hope and confidence for the future by reason of the findings of the Conference. The Conference dealt with facts in a most practical manner. The hon. Member for York says that he is filled with disquietude. I think it is because he has been trying laboriously to pull up the tree by its roots. I prefer to watch the Imperial tree growing. We must all realise that the whole framework of the Empire has gone through marvellous stages in the last 40 years. It is little more than a generation ago since the first Imperial Conference met. That Conference was groping for a way and asking anxiously how the Empire could be held together, and now we have had this remarkable Conference of 1926, which will stand out as a landmark in the history of all Imperial Conferences by reason of that remarkable declaration which was made: a declaration which I like to call a declaration of the independence and inter-dependence of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. We all remember in the history of years ago a very different declaration of independence. If in those days we had proceeded on the lines on which we are now proceeding, history would have taken a very different aspect.

Other Members wish to speak, and as there are so many aspects of a variety of questions raised by the proceedings of the Conference which may be dealt with, I will endeavour to confine myself to one particular aspect, and it is that which was raised by the right hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Macpherson). We have in this report a view of the whole of the Empire and of the independence and interdependence of the different parts of the Empire quite different from anything we have envisaged before; not because it did not exist but because we had not seen it. It is rather like a picture thrown upon the screen which has set up in relief the bones or the framework of the Empire, and shows the manner in which it is held together. It has done a great deal to clarify vision, and that is a great asset when we are trying to take long views for the future. When the Conference first met, the Prime Minister said in his opening address:

“The problem before us is how to reconcile the principle of self-government in external as well as domestic affairs with the necessity for a policy in foreign affairs and general Imperial concerns which will commend itself to a number of different Governments and Parliaments.”

A solution of that problem is, I think, to be found in the declaration to which I have referred; a declaration on which the whole work of the Conference hinges. The hon. Member for York referred to the alteration in the position of Governors-General of the Dominions. That alteration will, I think, be of very great importance in the future for avoiding possibilities of friction. The principle which has been laid down, that the Governor-General should not in any way represent the Imperial Parliament but should stand in the position of the King, while the Government at home and the Government in the Dominion should communicate with one another direct, is a principle which if it is kept in future is a perfectly sound and safe one. We all realise that there are difficulties in machinery in keeping the official contact. The Conference fully realised that, but these are difficulties which can be got over so long as we keep the main principle in view.

In the great variety of questions which came before the Conference, to mention only a few, such as foreign policy, Treaty making, Dominion representation abroad, air routes, statistics on wool, Imperial shipping, research, especially agricultural research, and the marketing of Imperial produce, one outstanding idea covers the manner in which all these matters were dealt with, and that is the great importance of the exchange of information, and personal contact. To keep close contact between the different parts of the Empire, not only by the machinery for correspondence but by personal contact, is very much stressed. That being so from the official point of view, it is equally if not more important that contact should be kept up by what I may call the non-official contact.

Reference has been made to the very valuable work that has been done by the Parliamentary Delegations which have gone from one part of the Empire to another, composed of men of every party, meeting unofficially with men of every party in the Dominions and exchanging views. Someone has suggested that that class of work should be done by preparatory commissions for the Imperial Commissions which sit from time to time. That, I think, is rather a useful suggestion. I was very much struck a little time ago by hearing a Member of the Parliament of the Union of South Africa at a lunch given in the House of Commons here saying that the enormous success of the visit of the Prince of Wales to South Africa was due in a very large degree to the work that had been done by the Parliamentary Delegation a short time before. The interchange of views between men of every party in that part of the Empire had tended to create an atmosphere which was entirely favourable to the Prince's visit, and after that we had General Hertzog coming to the Imperial Conference and being entirely satisfied with its work. That that declaration has been received with approbation from Dominions having such different angles of view as Canada, South Africa and Australia, shows on what firm ground it is based. We do not find that it met with approval in one portion of the Empire and disapproval in another, but we find it has met with universal approval. Keeping that well in the forefront of the picture, we have to build machinery which shall be useful in carrying out the ideas that we have of an Empire. I dislike the word "Empire." The phrase "Commonwealth of Nations" is long, but when we say "Empire" we mean the British Commonwealth of Nations, all autonomous, not one of them subject to the other, but all marching in one direction and inspired by like ideals, and in order that they may march best and get the greatest advantage from their progress, it is obvious that they must have full and up-to-date information each of what the other is doing. That is a question of keeping up personal contact.

[Sir R. Hamilton.]

I have touched lightly on unofficial contact. Now I should like to come to the official contact in the Imperial Conference itself. We all know the great difficulty of calling these vast Imperial Conferences at short periods. It is generally admitted that it is outside practical politics. The three year period is as short as is compatible with practical politics, but we have to remember also that Governments come and go, and though I quite admit that the people who represent any portion of the Empire at a Conference must in the main be the Government of that portion of the Empire, Governments change, and you may have at an Imperial Conference, we will say, Australia represented by one colour of Government, and Great Britain by another, and six months later both those Governments go out and the colour is changed both in Australia and here. Surely, if that is a very likely possibility, would it not be desirable that the Opposition should be represented at the Conference as well as the Government?

10.0 p.m.

His Majesty's Opposition has a well defined place in our institutions. Why should it not have an equally well defined place in the Imperial Conference? I do not see that any harm could result from it and I see that a great deal of good might result, and as the right hon. Gentleman said, it is a matter that should be taken into consideration with a view to future Conferences. All of us in the House—it does not matter on which benches we sit—are equally proud and take an equal interest in the Empire of which we are members, and I am sure it would strengthen future Conferences if members of other parties were represented. I believe at Geneva people who are not actual delegates are called observers. Let them in some shape or form take a part in Imperial Conferences, and it would strengthen rather than weaken them in future.

Captain PETER MACDONALD: I want to deal with that aspect of the Imperial Economic problem that was dealt with briefly by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Johnston). I refer to the work of the Empire Marketing Board, which was set up for the purpose of promoting British Imperial trade—the sale of Imperial products in the Oversea Dominions and the sale of Oversea Dominion products in this country. I do not want to appear critical of the Board. In fact I feel every sympathy with them in the difficult task they have undertaken. £1,000,000 has, I understand, been voted for the purpose of an advertising campaign. That campaign has been going on for some months, and I should like to congratulate the Board on the conception of some of the posters I see throughout the country. You see large posters representing the vast potential wealth of the Empire, others pointing out the trade routes of the Empire, and others pointing to the fact that the Oversea Dominions have purchased so many million pounds worth of British goods last year. All these posters, no doubt, have their value, but I am actuated in this matter by some experimental inquiries I have made in my constituency. I have asked several men and women of the type generally referred to as the man in the street if they would not prefer to buy British manufactured goods or goods from the Overseas Dominions which were just as good, if not better than the foreign article and which were sold as cheap, if not cheaper than the foreign article. They said they would, but with the uncanny commonsense the man in the street usually possesses, they put their finger on the crux of the whole matter when they asked, "What are these goods, and how are we to find out where they are for sale?"

There is where I think the present method of advertising adopted by the Empire Marketing Board is at fault. It is too general in its application, and I think these posters are too much what we might call the rhetoric of advertising. If we could come down from the general to the particular and point out to these people the particular goods that are available that are produced by our own people overseas or at home and where they are obtainable, I feel quite confident that would be one means of increasing our Imperial and British trade and bringing home to the man in the street its potentialities. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade made a speech recently in which he said that the best means of fostering British trade was to bring buyer and seller together. There, I think, he hit the nail on the head. If we could find means of bringing buyers and sellers of British goods together and stimulating by propaganda the sale of these goods, I feel confident that the British housewife would always respond to that appeal. About 30 London boroughs are carrying out an Empire shopping week some time next month, and I think it is an excellent idea. I am also pleased to know that Brighton carried out a similar shopping week a short time ago.

My point is, why do the Board not concentrate to a greater extent upon such shopping weeks and introduce them in every part of the country? By doing so I am confident they would increase the volume of British trade and help to carry out the functions for which the Board was created. I was very much struck by figures which appeared in the "Times" in a statement on Canada. No one who has the interests of the Empire at heart can help being impressed by those figures. It was stated that nearly 79 per cent. of all the commodities imported into Canada are of foreign origin and that foreign countries take more than 56 per cent. of Canadian exports. The goods imported by the United States into Canada were nearly 67 per cent. of all the goods imported into that country. Naturally, you may ask why Canada, which receives a preference from this country, should be so inundated with American goods. It is not entirely due to the geographical position of that country, but to the fact that they are the pioneers, I consider, of advertising their articles. Anyone who knows Canada knows that American goods are always being boosted in that country and are being brought home to housewives throughout the Dominion. That, I consider, is a field for this Board, and it is a field which should be developed to a greater extent. If that were done, I feel quite confident that this country has nothing to fear for its industrial future nor has it any reason to be envious of the United States of America. We have within the borders of our Empire far greater resources than the United States of America. It only requires concentration and development, and bringing home to the British consumer of the necessity of purchasing articles of British manufacture and to advertise that trade, to develop the Empire to a greater extent.

Mr. RAMSDEN: I should like to say that I cannot quite follow the last speaker when he said that all the money was being spent by the Empire Marketing Board on advertising. I am glad to think that a good proportion of this money is to be spent in other directions which will be just as useful. Particularly in that work of research which is to be carried out on a much larger scale throughout the Empire. With regard to the advertising campaign, I think we must have a little patience before we can hope to see real results. This campaign has only really been started, and I think it has already done a considerable amount of good. I am afraid it would be impossible to carry out the suggestion that individual articles should be advertised to the public. I do not think it is the function of any authority such as the Empire Marketing Board to deal with particular proprietary articles and to make them known. I agree with the majority of hon. Members that the Imperial Conference was undoubtedly the greatest conference of its kind that has ever taken place. I feel confident that as a result of what has taken place there, the Empire will be bound together with even stronger links.

[Mr. Ramsden.]

The Conference directed public attention very strongly to inter-Empire trade. I am very glad that there is a growing realisation of the advantage to us of this inter-Empire trade. I am glad that this realisation is becoming stronger every day, because I feel that if it is thoroughly understood we shall be going a very long way towards solving some of our important problems, particularly unemployment. I am glad that the Empire Marketing Board is helping very materially in that direction. There are, however, certain obstacles in the way which I believe are hindering that Board in furthering their proposals. I do not intend to give the Committee figures as to the trade that takes place between Great Britain and Australia and the other Dominions because I feel that everyone here knows as well as I do what they really represent. Although this inter-Empire trade is growing year by year it is not yet all that we would desire. Although the Board is really doing excellent work to help to increase it, they are meeting with certain obstacles, and this happens to be the case incidentally in the West Riding of Yorkshire. As one who has preached Empire trade in season and out of season, has tried to advocate the use of British goods on every possible occasion, very often I have been met by criticisms as to the high tariffs which are levied against British goods by some of the Dominion Governments.

I do not think that anyone wishes to deny for a single moment the right of the Dominions to govern themselves and to propose any tariff, however high it may be, if they wish to do so. As one who preaches that the Dominions themselves can only absorb more British-manufactured goods in proportion to the prosperity which they attain, I find that it is sometimes rather difficult to be told, as I firmly believe is the case, that exactly the same thing applies to us, namely, that unless the Dominions are willing to take our manufactured goods and to take them in large quantities so that we may give more employment to our people, we, in turn, cannot purchase as much as we should like from the different parts of the British Empire. I sincerely hope that our statesmen across the seas will recognise that this inter-

Empire trade is really mutual in the most real sense of the word, and that if they wish us to increase, and to increase materially, the purchases of all Empire products, they will have to help us to attain that prosperity which they themselves wish to enjoy.

I am perfectly convinced that if by a stroke of fortune we could find employment for practically all the workers in this country at a good rate of wages, there would be nothing better that we could do to help the different parts of the Empire, because our prosperity would immediately be reflected in very much greater purchases of everything they produce. I do hope they will seriously consider whether the somewhat excessive increases of tariffs, such as we have seen imposed during the last few years, and which have had the effect in certain industries of practically prohibiting the import of the classes of British manufactured goods concerned, have not been harmful. It is not very pleasing for a manufacturer who has built up a business in the Dominions after, probably, a great deal of effort and a great deal of labour, to find that, by a stroke of the pen, the Customs duties have been increased, and that he and the people employed in his factory are going to suffer very materially from these increases. These are not the people who are going to back up enthusiastically the "Buy British Goods" campaign. I do hope they will very seriously consider whether such little pinpricks that we have received from time to time are really worth while, and whether they get any advantage out of them. After all, there is scope in the Empire for development on very different lines from those in this country, and if they fully develop on those different lines and they help us to do so on ours as well, I think we shall obtain greater prosperity for all parts of the Empire.

The SECRETARY of STATE for DOMINION AFFAIRS (Mr. Amery): I think those who have been present in the Committee during the last two hours will realise that my difficulty to-night is to know how to reply in the time at my disposal to the very wide range of subjects which has been raised in the Debate. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Johnston), in the latter part of his speech, made some very interesting suggestions—suggestions with a very large part, though not with all, of which I find myself in agreement—in connection with what the Empire Marketing Board might be able to do in order to secure greater stability of prices and the better organisation of our trade with the Dominions. The two hon. Members who have just spoken have also raised various economic questions, some connected with the work of the Empire Marketing Board and some of quite a general character affecting inter-Imperial trade. I know those hon. Members will forgive me when I say that if I attempt to answer the points they have raised it will be impossible for me to do justice to the very important constitutional issues, which we may not have another opportunity of debating, which have been brought before the House by the right hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Macpherson) and the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott).

The constitutional issues raised by these two hon. Members, and by other hon. Members, fall into two main parts. They have dealt either with the machinery of our inter-Imperial consultations, the ways and means by which that machinery might be improved, or they have dealt, as did the hon. Member for York, with the actual issues raised in the Report of the last Imperial Conference. May I deal with the former for a moment. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross and Cromarty that, if it were possible to hold the Imperial Conference annually, the unity of the Empire, which depends so vitally on personal contact and responsible personal contact, would be immensely strengthened. The hon. Member for York reminded the Committee that there was a time, during the later stages of the War, when it seemed to all of us—I mean the representatives of the Dominions as well as the representatives of the Government of this country—that it might be possible to hold these Imperial meetings annually. Experience has shown us that it is impossible to get a conference of Governments, which to be effective must be a conference of the heads of Governments, in ordinary times much oftener than once in three years, although in times of emergency, under our flexible machinery, they could be called together oftener and could be sitting almost continuously, as they were during 1918 and 1919. But in ordinary times we shall have to be content, at any rate until the airship has greatly reduced the length of transit from the different portions of the Empire, with a meeting every two or three years; and the question is, how in the intervals between these meetings personal contact can be strengthened and improved.

There is, of course, one method of contact which has long been provided for, and that is the meeting of subsidiary conferences on special subjects. These began as far back as 1907, and they have increased in frequency and also in real usefulness in recent years. At this moment a very important conference is taking place in regard to education, and we have had a number of conferences of a similar character. It is also the case, more perhaps now than at any time in the past, that in connection with inter-Imperial business Ministers of the Crown from different parts of the Empire do visit each other. I had the privilege of presiding at a gathering this afternoon at which two Ministers of the Canadian Government were present, and in a few weeks' time another Minister of the Canadian Government will be here, while an important Minister of the Government of Australia is in this country at this moment. It is no secret, of course, that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister hopes to renew the personal contact established at the time of the Imperial Conference with the Government of Canada—to renew it on the spot in Canada during the next two months.

Of, course, if it is right and proper, as I think it is, that all travelling in this business should not be done only by Dominion Ministers but also by Ministers of the British Government, then naturally there is no member of the Government who ought to make more effort to visit the Dominions themselves than the Minister who holds the portfolio of Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. I hope to take advantage of the next few months in order to renew the contact with the various Dominions established at the late Imperial Conference, and to deal with one or other of the many current problems that are always being discussed between our Government and the Governments of the Dominions—discussed often at such length and so inconclusively on paper, and so instantly and speedily settled across the table. Beyond that, the machinery of consultation is being quietly and steadily improved. One of the outcomes of the late Conference was the conclusion that it was not enough to rely, in the intervals of conference as between the Governments of the Empire, upon purely written or telegraphic communication, that if it was found necessary in international relations to deal with each other, from Government to Government, through personal intermediaries, then certainly as between the Governments of the Empire it was desirable that the method of direct written or telegraphic communication should be supplemented by personal intermediaries.

[Mr. Amery.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ross and Cromarty referred to the lead given by Australia in the establishment of a liaison officer in this country, and the desirability of the High Commissioners being empowered to deal with the British Government not only on economic matters and the kind of subjects with which they have dealt in the past but also with matters of high inter-Imperial importance. That was accepted as a desirable thing at the Imperial Conference and steady progress is taking place in that direction. The machinery on this side is gradually improving. Naturally each Government must be the judge of the extent to which, and the occasion on which, it would ask its High Commissioner to raise questions of inter-Imperial importance with the British Government, but as far as the British Government is concerned, whether in foreign policy or in defence or in any other matter affecting the general policy of the Empire or the relations between ourselves and any Dominion, we are only too ready to consult with the representative of the Dominion here in the fullest and freest manner and to withhold no kind of information from him.

The Imperial Conference suggested that it might also be desirable to have some similar liaison or representation of the views of the British Government at the other end. In foreign relations you always have an alternative channel of communication. For one reason or another, sometimes personal, sometimes the character of the communication, it is sometimes easier to convey a matter by way of mouth at this end, sometimes easier to telegraph or write to your agent at the other end in order that the conversation may take place there. That is a matter which we are exploring, a matter in which we have to deal with different conditions in every Dominion, but in which, no doubt, we shall gradually establish as effective a system of contact as the conditions in each Dominion and of the work we have to do will warrant. The right hon. Gentleman suggested, in addition, that it might also be a useful thing to establish something in the nature of a permanent secretariat of the Imperial Conference. To some extent, of course, such a secretariat already exists in the Dominions Office, and if any general wish were expressed to create such a secretariat there would be no difficulty in giving effect to it.

As a matter of fact, however, our discussions recently have not run exactly on those lines. Instead of creating something in the nature of a general secretariat for Imperial purposes, the Governments of the Empire have been more concerned with setting up a variety of special advisory bodies, each dealing with one or other of the various subjects that come up at Imperial Conferences. Apart from the purely technical bureaux such as those dealing with mineral resources, micrology, entomology, and such like scientific subjects, we have seen in recent years the establishment of a body like the Imperial Shipping Committee, set up under the authority of all the Governments of the Empire, and equally advisory to all of them, and the Imperial Economic Committee, set up in a similar constitutional position and, of course, closely connected with the Imperial Economic Committee, and provided with funds to enable it to give direct effect to many suggestions of the Committee, is the Empire Marketing Board. We are, therefore, steadily improving the machinery of regular consultation, and of course, the method of direct communication and consultation is improving all the time. There is no comparison between the kind of information which was sent to the Dominions on foreign affairs and Imperial defence questions, even three or four years ago, and the immense volume of information now sent by mail and almost daily by telegrams, in order to keep them in day by day touch with the progress of all the affairs that can possibly concern them or affect the welfare of the Empire as a whole.

So much for the machinery of consultation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross and Cromarty also raised another matter in which his views were supported by the hon. Member for Dundee and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton), namely, the question of whether continuity and unity of policy, regardless of changes in this House, might not be assisted if the Imperial Conference included members of the Opposition as well as of the Government of the day. I admit that, at first sight, is an attractive as well as an interesting suggestion. After the experience of 1924, when the party which now sits on the benches opposite, found itself obliged, as a Government, for one reason or another to go back on some of the decisions arrived at by the Imperial Conferences of previous years, it did so with genuine concern, and it put forward to the Dominions the suggestion of associating the Opposition with the Government in Imperial Conferences as a possible way of meeting that difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman knows that suggestion did not commend itself to the Dominion Governments. No Government expressed approval of it, and several Governments expressed strong disapproval. Mr. Bruce took the view that such a change would tend to hamper the frank exchange of views and might easily lead to serious consequences on the return of the delegation, when each of the representatives of a Dominion might feel compelled to relate his own version of what happened at the Conference with the result that the Conference might possibly stimulate party differences rather than compose them. The Prime Minister of Canada also suggested, from his point of view, that such a change would alter the essential character of the Imperial Conference. As he says:

“The Conference is a Conference of Governments, and in no sense an Imperial Council, determining the policy of the Empire as a whole. Each Government must accept responsibility for its actions, and the Opposition must be free to criticise, with Parliament and, if occasion arises, the people, to decide the issues.”

I believe that that is a valid objection. The essence of the Imperial Conference system is undoubtedly that its discussions are those of responsible Governments and of Governments which, while they meet with all the frankness, with all the intimacy, and with all the sense of collegiate feeling that you get in a Cabinet, yet remember all the time that each Government has its own individual and undisputed responsibility, a responsibility for which it has to answer in its own Parliament, where alone final decisions can be reached, and where alone action can be initiated or confirmed. On the other hand, the position of an Opposition is necessarily and rightly one of freedom to criticise, and I believe that the position of a Leader of Opposition invited to an Imperial Conference, where he would be obviously obliged to conform during the discussions to the views of the Leader of the Government or else run the risk of really taking part in a conflict with other Governments against his own Government, would be one of genuine embarrassment.

I quite agree with my right hon. Friend opposite that there are great and important issues when these objections do not weigh in the scales against the advantage of getting general consent. On the eve of the gravely critical situation preceding the War, as he has reminded the Committee, the Government of the day on several occasions invited Lord Balfour to join with them in the discussions of the Committee of Imperial Defence. From that point of view, one might say that something very similar took place during the discussions of the Imperial Conference and the Cabinet in 1917 and 1918, when the British representatives included not only a Liberal Prime Minister, but Mr. Bonar Law and the then right hon. Member for Barnard Castle (Mr. A. Henderson), and that Mr. Borden, Sir Joseph Cook, Mr. Massey and Sir Joseph Ward came together, each to represent the united or practically united view of their countrymen. I think that in cases of great emergency it is always possible to do so, and it is also possible to do that when you are dealing with what I might call some of the subsidiary and special organisations dependent on and connected with the Conference. The Committee of Imperial Defence has been quoted as one, and I might point out that on the Overseas Settlement Committee and on the Empire Marketing Board we have endeavoured to enlist the valuable help of members of other parties.

[Mr. Amery.]

I think the solution of the difficulty must lie, in Imperial affairs as in foreign affairs, in the cultivation in all parties of a sense of Imperial responsibility and a desire not to overthrow any decision arrived at, unless it really forces a vital issue of political importance at home, and conversely, also, the Government ought not unnecessarily to raise in the Conference an issue which will provoke and is bound to provoke party controversy. On questions of foreign policy there are often helpful informal discussions between the Government and the leaders of the Opposition. Those can take place on Imperial issues too; and over and above this, as more than one hon. Member has reminded us, there is yet another method, informal, no doubt, but most valuable, by which Members of Parliament and members of the Government, and of the Opposition, can get into touch in a form of Imperial conference which is none the less fruitful because it depends not upon Governments but directly upon Parliament, or upon those Members of Parliament who have organised themselves into branches of the Imperial Parliamentary Association. Those meetings cannot be too frequent or too fully attended. The more frequently they meet, the greater their value, both in preparing the opinion of the Government and of Parliament for the issues which will be discussed at the next Imperial Parliament, and in helping the Government and Parliament to give weight and effect to the conclusions arrived at in preceding Conferences. I entirely agree with what the right hon. Gentleman and others have said in that connection.

If I may, I will turn now to those questions of machinery and the issues arising from the conclusions of the Conference which, while they have given, in the main, general satisfaction to almost every section throughout the country, have also undoubtedly raised a certain disquietude in the minds of some observers, including as close constitutional students as my hon. Friend the Member for York. My hon. Friend put in several ways what was substantially the same general question. He asked,

Has there been, as the outcome of this Conference, a change in constitutional relations, and what authority has Parliament given for such a change? The answer I would give is that undoubtedly there has been a great change, one of the profoundest and most remarkable changes in the relationship of communities and human beings that ever have taken place; but it is a change which has taken place, step by step, over the 80 years or more which have passed since Lord Durham's memorable Report on self-government was presented to this House. It was a step which has sometimes been assisted by legislation in this House, but far more often the advance has taken place without legislation and without direct constitutional discussion. The advance has taken place with the gradual growth of the Dominions.

Every Imperial Parliament in the last 40 years has marked an advance, and the most remarkable advance of all was registered in the years following the War. The Imperial Conferences have embodied the new position, which is recognised internationally as well as inter-Imperially, at the Peace Conference and in the League of Nations since then. In respect to that great change, the last Conference has not introduced any substantial new departure. What it has done is to clarify, and, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland suggested, to make visible what was inherent and there already, what to some of us had seemed obvious many years before and what to others, looking at the question from some different angle, perhaps, and not realising nearly so well as some of us the process that was going on, might have seemed a greater transformation than it actually was. What the Conference did was to lay down two main principles, not new to us, but acceptable to us— the principle of absolute equality between the self-governing Dominions of the Empire and the principle of unity under a common Crown. My right hon. Friend has already read out the brief definition in which those two principles were embodied. There is really nothing new in it. Equality of status has been emphasised in speeches in Parliament and by the action of the British Government for a generation, but certainly that equality and the unity that comes from it had never before been so authoritatively and so clearly laid down as it was in the Imperial Conference of 1926 by the authority of all the Governments represented at that Conference.

In that sense undoubtedly, the Imperial Conference of last year marked a great turning point in the development of the British Empire. It acknowledged the coming of age of the Dominions, the completion of a process of history which I believe will be regarded by future generations as the most remarkable event of the last 50 years. That process was hardly noticed, because it was taking place unobtrusively, and the development of the great Commonwealth of co-equal nations did not attract very much attention. The coming into existence of other nations had attracted the attention of the world, because it had taken place by violence and strife, whereas the full growth of the nations forming the British Commonwealth has taken place with peaceful development and in full agreement with all the nations of the Commonwealth. That equality of status, as my hon. Friend has reminded us, is laid down in the conclusions of the Imperial Conference, but it does not necessarily involve equality of stature. Some of the Dominions are greater in territory and potential resources than Great Britain itself. Others may have far greater accumulated wealth and experience and organisation for dealing with international politics, and again the Government of this country has immense experience, immense apparatus for dealing with the external questions affecting the Commonwealth as a whole. The Dominions regard this machinery, not as an emblem of their subordination to a central authority, but as machinery which is more convenient for them to use, which serves them more efficiently, and which takes care that their interests are fully regarded in every way. The principle of equality is not in the least infringed, because one Government rather than another deals with questions affecting all. What is meant by equality of status is that as far as the question of rights is concerned, every Government of the Empire is, if it so wish, entitled to exercise every function of national and international right. From the declaration of these rights, it does not follow that every individual interest of any particular Government or the common interests of the Empire would be served by always pressing the point of rights to its logical conclusion.

My hon. Friend raised certain particular questions which I should like to answer briefly. He raised, first of all, the question of the change in the title of His Majesty, and, in doing so, I think he was under a misapprehension as to the use of the term in the Royal title. "Dominions across the Sea" has, of course, no reference to Dominions in a constitutional sense. It refers to all the territories that are part of the British Empire, and as the words "across the seas" have always been understood to mean broad oceans, and certainly not to include either the Irish Channel or the border that separates the Irish Free State from Northern Ireland, it is obvious that it would be inappropriate to describe Ireland as a part of the Dominions beyond the Seas, nor would it have been compatible or consonant with our desire, which was to modify the Royal title the least possible, consistent with such rectification as recent changes in Ireland justify.

As regards the position of the Governor-General, my hon. Friend opposite asked whether His Majesty's Government had notified to the Dominions their acceptance of any change in the status of the Governor-General. No, the change in the status of the Governor-General from an agent and instrument of the British Government to the representative of the Crown in a Dominion, and nothing else, was a change which, like the whole of the changes in our constitutional evolution, has taken place gradually over a long period of years, and was in substance the consummation of many years before the present Conference took place. All that the late Conference did was to suggest that the purely historic survival by which communications from the British Government to its partner Governments went via the Governor-General's office—as it had done in the old days when the Governor-General still was, as the Governor of a Crown Colony is, the agent and instrument of the British Government—should be eliminated and the position brought up-to-date with present-day facts. Personally, as a Member of the party on these benches, I like historical survivals, and would have had no objection to maintaining all these reminders of the older days out of which the Empire has evolved, but, undoubtedly, some of those survivals have given rise to misunderstandings in the past. An hon. Member opposite suggests there are survivals which have sometimes caused unexpected and acute pain, and it may be that on the part of one or another such a survival being maintained might lead to political difficulty. In so far as that was felt by some of the Governments concerned, we were perfectly willing to adjust the situation to the facts of the present day.

[Mr. Amery.]

Exactly the same applies with regard to such survivals as the general powers of disallowance in Dominion legislation, where, in regard to particular Measures, from the point of view of the Empire, it is highly desirable that unity should be maintained in practice. We wish to find out, by special committees and by special sub-conferences, how that unity can best be maintained, consistently, as far as possible, with the present general constitutional position in the Empire. My hon. Friend asked whether that Committee and that Conference had yet met. No, Sir. The matters, as he himself pointed out, are very complicated, and involve many issues of detail, and we are at this moment still collecting all the necessary material for transmission to the Dominion Governments before we can really begin to deal with these matters. My hon. Friend asked whether or not it was competent for this Parliament to amend the Merchant Shipping Act. Undoubtedly, as a matter of law, this Parliament could amend the Merchant Shipping Act for the whole Empire in any way that it wished, but, as a matter of constitutional practice, it has not done so, and would not have done so for many long years. What we must endeavour to do is to find how an agreement, an essential unity, in matters of shipping can be preserved in consonance with the wishes of each Government in the Empire.

On these points I need not dwell further. All I would say in conclusion is that, while possibly irritating survivals have disappeared, the essential unity of the Empire has never been more strongly emphasised than it was at the late Conference, or felt to have been strengthened as it was by men of very different views who assembled at that Conference. That measure of unity is embodied in the symbol of a common Crown, a Crown common to the whole Empire, one and indivisible, constituting us all one common body of British subjects, embracing Governments unfettered and free in their action, all morally bound by the fact that they are Governments of the same Crown, responsible to the Legislatures in which the same Crown is a constituent element, responsible to an electorate composed of subjects of the Crown, and, as such, loyal to the Crown and to each other. We have, I believe, laid the foundation, by clearing away misunderstanding, for the work of practical and constructive development. An immense amount undoubtedly remains to be done. Unless we do carry out the great work of Empire construction and development in the coming years, this last Conference may well have been the beginning of the end. If there be no wish for unity, there is nothing to-day to preserve it. But I believe that the wish for unity exists, and that we have laid true foundations on which that unity can be built: and it is for this House and for those other partner Parliaments in the Empire to see that we build up a fair super-structure on the sound foundation we have laid in the Conference.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be Reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

PROTECTION OF ANIMALS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Read the Third time, and passed.

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved. "That this House do now adjourn."—[Commander Eyres Monsell.]

Adjourned accordingly at One Minute after Eleven o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 30th June, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Aberdare Urban District Council Bill
[Lords],

Read the Third time, and passed, with Amendments.

Maidstone Corporation (Trolley Vehicles)
Provisional Order Bill,

Rotherham Corporation (Trolley Vehicles)
Provisional Order Bill,

Read the Third time, and passed.

Mexborough and Swinton Tramways Company (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders
(No. 2) Bill,

Southend-on-Sea Corporation (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

As amended, considered; to be read the Third time To-morrow.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

1. Mr. ROBINSON asked the Minister of Pensions why the claim of a widow for pension on the death of her husband, who was a pensioner, was presumed to be barred under the seven years' limit in respect of claims for War disabilities, as set up under the War Pensions Act of 1921, seeing that the claim in respect of the disability had already been accepted; and if he will restore to widows, whose husbands die more than seven years after discharge, their rights under Articles 11 and 12 of the Royal Warrant of 1919?

The MINISTER of PENSIONS (Major Tryon): The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. No seven years' limit for widows' claims was set up by the War Pensions Act, 1921, but was contained in the Royal Warrants of 1917 and 1919. I am not prepared to adopt the suggestion in the second part of the question that War widows should be reverted to the conditions of the Warrant of 1919 as this would deprive them of the advantages conferred on them by the Royal Warrant of 14th January, 1924, for which I was responsible and which gave extended benefits to widows of this class over the seven years' limit, going far beyond any rights previously enjoyed by them.

BURGLARIES, LONDON.

2. Lord APSLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department the number of burglaries that have been committed in the London district this month and the value of property lost thereby?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir William Joynson-Hicks): Seventeen burglaries were reported to the Metropolitan Police during the period 1st-25th June, 18 arrests being made. No arrest was made in three of the cases. The value of property reported stolen was £653, of which £546 was recovered. In 10 cases there was no loss.

Mr. MONTAGUE: Does that number include the burglary in Moorgate Street?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: I have not heard of one there, but, if the hon. Member would like me to make inquiries, I will do so.

Colonel DAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say in which districts burglaries are most prevalent?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: I cannot say.

TRANSPORT.

MOTOR OMNIBUSES (SPEED, BARNES).

3. Mr. LOOKER asked the Home Secretary whether the attention of the police has been drawn to the excessive speed at which motor omnibuses pass down Ranelagh Gardens, Barnes, and to the damage to the houses on that route caused thereby; and will he take steps to see that the legal speed limit is observed?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that he has received complaints, though not recently, of damage done to houses in Ranelagh Gardens, and of excessive speed in that thoroughfare. The police are constantly on the alert to deal with excessive speed and convictions are from time to time obtained.

Sir HARRY BRITTAIN: Is it not true to say that if every driver drove as carefully as the drivers of the London omnibuses there would be a great diminution of accidents?

ROADS ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

53. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Minister of Transport whether any changes have taken place in the membership of the Roads Advisory Committee during the past 12 months?

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Colonel Ashley): The answer is in the negative.

54. Mr. R. MORRISON asked the Minister of Transport how many meetings of the Roads Advisory Committee have been held during the past 12 months, and the number of members present at each meeting?

Colonel ASHLEY: Two meetings have been held during the past 12 months, i.e., on 29th November, 1926, and 31st March, 1927. At the first of these meetings six members were present, and at the second eight.

Mr. MORRISON: May I take it from that answer that as a rule this Committee meets twice a year?

Colonel ASHLEY: Oh, no, the hon. Member must not assume that; he must only assume that during the last 12 months they met twice.

LONDON UNDERGROUND RAILWAYS (VENTILATION).

55. Mr. TREVELYAN (for Mr. BUXTON) asked the Minister of Transport if he is aware of the complaints of the prevalence of vitiated air in the tube railways of London; and if he will state what steps he is taking for the purpose of insuring adequate ventilation?

Colonel ASHLEY: I have not received any recent complaint in regard to this matter, but if the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to let me know what particular section of the underground railways he has in mind I will communicate with the company.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Is it not one of the proudest boasts of the tube railways that the traveller has the privilege of breathing rich ozone?

Colonel ASHLEY: Yes. I have seen it stated that the ozone in the tube railways is equal to a day at Southend.

ESSEX CONSTABULARY.

4. Mr. LOOKER asked the Home Secretary if he is aware that the Essex Police Force is under the requisite strength in view of the great increase of population which has taken place; that an additional volume of work is thrown on the police stationed in the area through which the new Southend road passes owing to the necessity of constables being on point duty at level crossings during the week-end; that an increase in the force was recommended by the Standing Joint Committee but refused by his Department; and will he take steps to see that the force is brought up to the requisite strength?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: I am aware that in the Essex Constabulary, as in other forces, a number of vacancies are being maintained in the interests of economy, but it is not the case that I recently refused the Standing Joint Committee's request to increase the strength of the force. In fact I allowed them to add 10 men, and in so doing I took into consideration among other things the additional duties arising from the traffic on the new Southend road.

DEATH OF NURSE DANIELS (COMMISSION ROGATOIRE).

5. Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary why, in returning the last Commission Rogatoire to the examining magistrate at Boulogne, who is inquiring into the murder of Nurse May Daniels, an expressed wish accompanied it from the British authorities that it should not be published; and was there any special reason for this request?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: The only request for non-publication related to the present whereabouts of a witness, which had been disclosed in confidence to the authorities here by that witness's representatives in order that the Commission Rogatoire might be executed as requested by the French authorities.

Colonel DAY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that on account of this request certain rumours are getting about that the British Government have something to hide, and will he try to dispose of these rumours, especially so far as the French public are concerned?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: I am quite sure that if everybody knew the British Government as well as the hon. Member they would know that they have nothing to hide.

CONVICTS.

6. Lieut - Commander KENWORTHY asked the Home Secretary how many persons are undergoing penal servitude at the present time, and the corresponding figure at an approximately similar date in 1917 and 1907, respectively?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: 1,473 persons are now undergoing penal servitude in this country. On 26th June, 1917, the number was 1,392 and on 26th March, 1907, it was 3,038.

ALIENS (HOTEL EMPLOYEES).

7. Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS asked the Home Secretary how many aliens have been allowed to enter this country during each of the last three years for the purpose of working as hotel employés?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: Aliens are only allowed to enter this country for employment if in possession of permits granted by the Minister of Labour. The number admitted with such permits is shown in the published returns of which I am sending my hon. Friend a copy. Questions as to the issue of such permits are for the Minister, but I understand from him that in the three and a-half years ending the 30th June, 1927, 620 permits in respect of hotel employés were granted and 167 refused, and that of the permits granted 286 were on condition that a British subject, normally employed in the hotel and restaurant industry, secured a position abroad by way of exchange.

Mr. WILLIAMS: In the latter case, is the employment permanent in the case of the Briton who goes abroad in exchange for the foreigner who comes here, or is it a temporary job?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: A rough balance is struck between the employment there and the employment here.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us where all the foreign waiters which one sees in restaurants come from, having regard to the fact that only 600 appear to have been admitted?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: A great many of them are British subjects, born here of British parents. They are not under my care at all. I do not know where the others come from. I know that full returns of the number are kept, but I have not the same experience as my hon. Friend of restaurants.

Mr. R. MORRISON: Where permission is given to aliens to come here to act as waiters, is that permission valid only while they are acting as waiters, or does it become invalid if they leave the hotel and take other employment?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: A very strict record and watch is kept of all men who come here under the permission of the Ministry of Labour, and, if they cease to fill the occupations for which they came here they have to return. This is to help the labour market.

EDUCATION.

HIGHER AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION (EXPENDITURE).

8. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education whether, of the total estimated expenditure by the Board of Education and the local education authorities upon higher education, it is possible to separate the amounts spent on secondary education and technical education, respectively; and what was the total expenditure on secondary and technical education, respectively, during each of the five years ending 31st March, 1927?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Lord Eustace Percy): I will circulate the reply in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Mr. HARRIS: Am I to understand that the figures asked for will be furnished separately?

Lord E. PERCY: No. Sir. There are some figures I can furnish separately, and some that I cannot.

Following is the reply:

The expenditure of local authorities under the various headings of higher education is given on page 13 of the Memorandum on the Board's Estimates, 1927 [Cmd. 2385], a copy of which I am sending the hon. Member. The Board's grants are not divided under headings but form one consolidated grant for higher education. In so far as the Board's expenditure consists of grants to local authorities it is included in the expenditure of local authorities. The Board also make grants to non-local education authority bodies in respect of institutions for secondary and technical education. The figures for the last five years have been:

Year ending, 31st March.			Non-L.E.A. Secondary Schools.	Non-L.E.A. Technical, &c., Schools.
			£	£
1923	1,278,880	103,366
1924	1,154,812	113,473
1925	1,141,132	110,098
1926	1,140,352	107,570
1927	1,193,024	116,423

LOCAL AUTHORITIES' SCHEMES.

9. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education how many local education authorities have submitted schemes of educational work as contemplated by the Education Act, 1918; have the Board adopted any general policy of approving or disapproving of such schemes; what was the date when the Board received the scheme drawn up by the London County Council; have the Board addressed any communication to the London County Council on that scheme; and what has been the nature of such communication or communications?

Lord E. PERCY: Ninety-nine local authorities submitted schemes. The details of these schemes were discussed with the authorities, but in view of the financial position existing at the time my predecessors in office did not feel justified in giving their statutory approval to the schemes which would make it obligatory upon the authorities to give effect to them. The scheme prepared by the London County Council was received by the Board on the 27th July, 1920, and it was subsequently intimated to the council that in the then existing circumstances the Board would have to defer the question of giving statutory approval to the scheme. The hon. Member is, I think, aware of the position in regard to the programmes submitted by local authorities under Circular 1358.

MENTALLY DEFECTIVE CHILDREN.

10. Mr. HARRIS asked the President of the Board of Education if there is any standard of certification for mental deficiency governing the admission of children to schools for mental defectives; if so, what is the standard; have any instructions been issued to local education authorities by the Board on this subject; if so, what is the nature of such instructions; has there been during recent years any variation in the standards used by the school medical officers of the local education authorities or advice by the Board's medical officer; and have the Board issued any memoranda, or are there any reports available, which would inform local education authorities as to the Board's views and policy with regard to mentally defective children?

Lord E. PERCY: As regards the first two parts of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to Section 55 (1) of the Education Act, 1921, and, as regards the last part, to the Annual Reports of the Board's chief medical officer, particularly to Section VII of the Report for 1925. I am sending the hon. Member a copy of Circular 1359 of the 23rd April, 1925, together with the form of report referred to therein, which relates to the question of uniformity of examination. The Board have not made any alterations in the advice given by them to local authorities, nor are they aware that there has been any variation in the standards adopted by the authorities' medical officers.

PLAYGROUNDS (NORTH RIDING).

13. Mr. SHEPHERD asked the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the Report of the county medical officer for the Yorks (North Riding) education authority, which states that at a large number of schools the playgrounds are in a bad state of repair, and in some cases are so small that the work is restricted and the children deprived of proper games and activity; and whether, in view of these facts, he will take such steps as are within his power as shall ensure that every elementary school shall have a playground fit for children to play in?

Lord E. PERCY: I have seen the report in question. I believe that the North Riding authority is fully alive to the importance of doing all they can to provide adequate playground accommodation.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are many schools where the Board of Education syllabus on physical training cannot be carried out because of the inadequacy of the playgrounds?

Lord E. PERCY: That also is in the report to which the hon. Member has referred. I was in the North Riding the other day, and I visited a good many of these small schools. If the hon. Member is acquainted with the condition of the small rural schools in the North Riding, he will appreciate the difficulty which the local authorities must be under. I am quite sure that they are doing all they can.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

12. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the President of the Board of Education whether he proposes to arrange for the free distribution to all public libraries of a copy of the recent Report of the Committee dealing with that subject?

Lord E. PERCY: Public free libraries are authorised to obtain copies of Government publications from His Majesty's Stationery Office at one-half the published price, and I am afraid that I cannot undertake to make the further concession suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend.

Mr. RILEY: Are the public libraries aware that they can obtain the report at half the published price?

Lord E. PERCY: If they did not know it before, I think they will know it now.

PUBLIC HEALTH.

DITCHES AND STAGNANT POOLS.

14. Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Health whether, in view of the inconvenience and annoyance suffered by the public through certain ditches in the country becoming silted up and overgrown, causing a breeding place for mosquitos and other insects, he will give instructions to all local authorities that owners of land containing such stagnant pools be compelled under the Public Health Act to have these places cleaned out and sprayed with an adequate insecticide?

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Mr. Chamberlain): I have no authority to give such instructions. Under Section 91 of the Public Health Act, 1875, any pool, ditch, etc., in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health is to be deemed a nuisance liable to be dealt with under the Act. The question whether any particular pool is a nuisance is one of fact to be determined by the Court in any proceedings instituted under the Section.

Colonel DAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman see his way to draw the attention of local authorities to this particular section, as a good many of them are not aware of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think that there is any necessity for that.

SKIMMED CONDENSED MILK.

19. Mr. HURD asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that the imports of skimmed condensed milk in the first five months of the year were the approximate equivalent of 25½ million gallons of liquid milk; and what measures he proposes to take for the more effective protection of the child population from this unsuitable form of food?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to the hon. and gallant Member for Chelmsford (Lieut.-Colonel Howard-Bury) on the 23rd instant.

Mr. HURD: When does the right hon. Gentleman think he will be in a position to inform the House as to the measures he proposes to take to meet this need?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I think it will not be very long.

MILK AND DAIRIES ORDER (EASTBOURNE).

21. Mr. KELLY asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that the Eastbourne Local Authority initiated legal proceedings against a local firm of dairy-men with respect to insanitary conditions in their dairies contrary to the provisions of the Milk and Dairies Order, and that subsequently the proceedings were withdrawn although the infringement of the Order was not denied; and whether he will take steps to see that the Order is strictly enforced?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am aware of the facts stated in the question, but I understand that the summonses were withdrawn in consideration of the defendant paying the costs incurred and taking satisfactory steps (including a change of staff) to ensure that the Order would be complied with in future. While I have no jurisdiction to interfere with the action of the authority taken in a particular case, I may say that the course which was followed in this instance is one which is frequently adopted with advantage by local authorities, especially in the administration of new legal provisions.

MOSQUITOES.

27. Mr. ROBINSON asked the Minister of Health if his attention has been called to the recent death of a man from a mosquito bite; and what action has been taken by his Department to diminish the number of mosquitoes in this country?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. As regards the second part, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave on this subject on the 1st March to the hon. Member for Central Southwark (Colonel Day).

HOUSING.

REQUIREMENTS.

15. Sir JOHN POWER asked the Minister of Health what is the present estimated annual requirement of new houses to meet the growth of population and the number required to replace closed and demolished houses; and if he has any figures as to the addition to the housing accommodation during the year ended 31st March last due to the conversion of existing houses into flats?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: It is difficult to frame a reliable estimate of the annual need for new houses, but the present annual requirement in order to meet the growth of population has commonly been estimated at about 70,000 houses. Statistics are not available of the number of houses at present being closed or demolished, or with regard to the information desired by the hon. Member in the last part of his question.

Mr. ERNEST BROWN: May I ask upon what standard these estimates are based?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: What standard?

Mr. BROWN: Yes, the number of persons per house, space, and so on.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I think they are based on the figures in the census, and upon an assumed average of the number of persons per family.

Mr. MONTAGUE: May I ask whether the National Housing Town Planning Committee does not place the requirements at a much higher figure?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member is probably confusing two estimates. The estimate to which he refers includes the number of houses required to replace those which are demolished.

Colonel DAY: Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that houses are being demolished in sufficient numbers for the purposes of the various slum clearance schemes.

SLUM CLEARANCE, GLASGOW.

59. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if his attention has been drawn to the Eighth Annual Report of the Scottish Board of Health, and, in particular, to Chapter 2, paragraph 16, as to the insanitary conditions in Glasgow slums; and if any action has been taken on this Report or, if not, if the Board of Health contemplate immediate action to deal with these conditions?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I am aware of the terms of the paragraph in question. As indicated therein, it is a quotation from the Report of the Commissioner appointed by the Scottish Board of Health to inquire into an improvement scheme submitted by the Corporation of Glasgow under Part II of the Housing (Scotland) Act, 1925. Details of the corporation's proposals for dealing with the areas to which the Commissioner's Report refers will be found in paragraph 15 of the Report. The improvement scheme has now been confirmed by the Board, and the local authority are in course of carrying out its provisions, which include the demolition and clearing away of the insanitary properties and the provision of new dwellings to re-house the dispossessed tenants.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Is there any reason to doubt the truth of the terrible statement made by the Commissioner?

Sir J. GILMOUR: No, Sir, there is no reason to doubt that the conditions are accurately described.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to approach the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, so that something shall be done?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I have explained that the Corporation of Glasgow are already dealing with this particular area, and I am taking every step to try and expedite housing in Scotland.

RURAL AREAS (SANITATION).

16. Sir J. POWER asked the Minister of Health what steps are being taken to ensure suitable town-planning, including the provision of adequate sanitation, in rural areas adjoining large towns in which extensive building is taking place?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Town planning schemes are in course of preparation for the whole or parts of 127 rural districts, either by the rural district councils themselves or by neighbouring urban authorities, and I am encouraging other local authorities to take similar action, where needed, by promoting joint town planning committees of neighbouring authorities to consider the town planning needs of their areas. Provision for sanitation is usually made under the general law, apart from town planning schemes.

Mr. E. BROWN: Does the Minister propose to extend the Housing and Town Planning Acts? Am I right in believing that the Housing and Town Planning Acts only apply to towns with populations of over 20,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes. I am not proposing to take any further steps.

Mr. MONTAGUE: Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that the principles of town planning contradict the idea of reducing the size of houses advocated in his speech of yesterday?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir. I do not agree.

Sir JOSEPH NALL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the necessities of town planning may require an adequate number of dwellings of the size necessary for the people concerned?

WIDOWS' PENSIONS (EDINBURGH AND LEITH).

17. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Health the number of widows in receipt of pensions under the Act of 1925 in the port of Leith and the city of Edinburgh, respectively, and the average weekly amount paid to them?

The SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Sir John Gilmour): I have been asked to reply. I regret that the information is not available as the claims are not arranged on a territorial basis.

AGRICULTURE.

RATING AND VALUATION ACT, 1925 (FARM BUILDINGS).

18. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Health if he can furnish an estimate of the probable reduction in total assessment for farmers which will result from the extension of the Agriculture Rates Act to farm buildings under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not in a position to add to the reply which was given to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Broad) on the 26th April, 1926. I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of that reply.

EMPIRE MARKETING (BRITISH BARLEY).

43. Lieut. - Colonel HENEAGE asked the Minister of Agriculture how far he has been able to make use of the grant allotted from the Empire Marketing Board for the marketing of British cereals to consider the special features of barley marketing in the interests of British producers?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Guinness): No grant has been expressly made to my Department in regard to the marketing of British cereals, but the work now being undertaken by the Ministry, with the aid of the general grant of £40,000 a year, includes an investigation into the marketing of cereal crops. A report, embodying the general results of this investigation, will, I hope, be issued in the autumn. Due attention will be given in the report to the marketing of home-grown barley.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: May I ask whether attention has been called to the difficulties of barley growers?

Mr. GUINNESS: I have drawn the attention of those who are compiling this information to my hon. and gallant Friend's question, and I am sure that this aspect of the matter is not being neglected.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when he expects to get a report?

Mr. GUINNESS: I am afraid I cannot give any approximate date without notice.

Mr. WALLHEAD: Without decrying in any way the attempt to establish Empire marketing on a sound basis, will the right hon. Gentleman say whether it would not be as well to pay as much attention to British agriculture as to agriculture in the Dominions?

Mr. GUINNESS: British agriculture is now getting a grant from the Empire Marketing Board, which is being devoted to an examination of, and a report upon, the conditions of marketing. We believe it is very necessary, if the farmer is to get the profits which now escape, that he should have the opportunity of organising marketing on an economic basis.

Mr. MONTAGUE: Does the right hon. Gentleman not think that British fruit can be sold as cheap as Empire fruit is at railway stations?

ENGLISH SUGAR-BEET CORPORATION (JUTE BAGS).

44. Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Minister of Agriculture whether, seeing that the terms on which financial assistance is given to the English Sugar-beet Corporation, Limited, require that a percentage of the corporation's contracts shall be placed in this country, he can say in which country the corporation has placed its contract for one million jute sugar bags for the year 1927?

Mr. GUINNESS: There is no statutory provision which compels beet-sugar factory companies to obtain their requirements in this country, other than that laid down in the British (Subsidy) Act, 1925, which requires that not less than 75 per cent. of the plant and machinery installed in the factories shall be manufactured in Great Britain. I have, therefore, no power to intervene in the placing of contracts for jute bags. I am, however, informed that the English Beet-sugar Corporation has purchased 1,918,000 sugar and pulp bags for the coming manufacturing campaign on behalf of itself and the other factories in the Anglo-Dutch group. Of this number, I understand, that 1,218,000 bags were purchased from British firms and the balance from Dutch firms.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Arising out of the last sentence of the answer, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether those purchases from British firms relate to bags produced in this country or whether British firms are purchasing, or may purchase, these bags abroad?

Mr. GUINNESS: I understand they are bags of British production. As a matter of fact, they are from $\frac{3}{4}$ d. to 1d. dearer than the foreign bags, but, naturally, I am doing everything in my power to encourage these companies, where possible, to obtain all their requirements in this country.

SMALL HOLDINGS.

47. Mr. RILEY asked the Minister of Agriculture how many applications have been made to the Ministry from county councils for sanction to carry out schemes for small holdings under the Small Holdings Act of 1926, the total acreage of the schemes, and the estimated cost?

Mr. GUINNESS: Eight proposals for the acquisition of land and its equipment and adaptation for small holdings have been submitted to the Ministry under Section 2 of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1926. The area involved is 774 acres and the estimated capital expenditure for purchase and equipment is £36,967.

In addition, 12 cases have been submitted under Sub-section (5) of Section 2, relating to the further equipment of land already acquired, the estimated cost of such further equipment being £7,563.

Mr. RILEY: Have these applications all been passed?

Mr. GUINNESS: I am not certain how many of the applications have actually been passed, but I take it they are undergoing the ordinary process of examination and that they will all be passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

BENEFIT.

25. Mr. SHEPHERD asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that on 23rd June an unemployed man, in possession of a travelling card and a current national health card with 22 stamps, left Middlesbrough to travel by road to Catterick, where he had an assurance of work, but on arrival at Darlington he had to seek shelter for the night in the casual ward; that in the morning he was told he would be detained until the next day in accordance with the Regulations; that ultimately the man was allowed out from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m. to get his unemployment card stamped at the Exchange but was not allowed to sign for unemployment benefit on the ground that he was an inmate of the workhouse; and whether he will amend the Regulations so that the detention of a man in these circumstances shall not be required?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My attention has not previously been called to this case, but I will make inquiries.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Is it within the discretion of the board of guardians to allow a man who is genuinely seeking employment to go, without performing any task?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot answer that question without notice.

FINANCE BILL.

BETTING DUTY.

28. Colonel DAY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his Department has any record of the amount of money paid to the Inland Revenue authorities for betting taxation on illegal betting; and, if so, the amount so received?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Commander Eyres Monsell): The information is not available.

Colonel DAY: Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the fact that last week a man who was fined £100 for illegal betting, said he had disclosed his books to the Treasury and that the Treasury had written asking for a further 4½d. due on illegal betting.

Commander EYRES MONSELL: Yes, Sir.

INCOME TAX AND SUPER-TAX.

30. Sir HUGH LUCAS-TOOTH asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the Board of Inland Revenue have declined to consider the payment of certain reclaims in respect of Income Tax, Schedule D, after their duly appointed officer, the inspector of taxes, had undertaken that the reclaimants should not be debarred from relief in respect of their original payments; and whether he will inquire into any cases of which particulars are furnished?

Commander EYRES MONSELL: I will certainly make inquiry into any case of the kind which my hon. Friend brings to my notice.

35. Mr. RILEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amounts paid in Super-tax for the years 1923-24, 1924-25, and 1925-26, and the number of persons paying Super-tax in each of the three years, respectively?

[Mr. Riley.]

The CHANCELLOR of the EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): The hon. Member will find the latest information on this subject in paragraphs 57, 61 and 62, Tables 64, 67 and 68, of the 69th Annual Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (Command Paper 2783).

MOTOR TAXATION.

31. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has instituted an inquiry regarding the possibility of substituting a tax on petrol for the present motor taxes; and, if so, what is the result of the inquiry?

Mr. CHURCHILL: The position remains generally as I indicated in the Budget Statement last year.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: Did not the right hon. Gentleman promise in last year's Budget that he would favourably consider holding an inquiry and is he aware that each year sees more countries adopting the petrol tax, and that they have overcome in those countries the difficulties that permanent officials raise in order to prevent a change over from horse-power to petrol?

Mr. CHURCHILL: The difficulties that have prevented us from adopting it have not been difficulties raised by the permanent officials, who have shown extraordinary skill in avoiding those difficulties. The reasons we were governed by were those of general policy. The matter is still under consideration.

Captain CROOKSHANK: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider sending out a Select or other Committee to go into the matter?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I really do not think a Committee could give any more information than we have at our disposal.

Sir J. NALL: Has not the incidence of the horse-power tax materially contributed to the great improvement of the engine power of British cars?

Captain A. EVANS: Has the right hon. Gentleman consulted petrol companies with regard to the possible collection of a petrol tax, and, if so, what are their views?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I do not think the difficulties are insuperable, but the matter must be most carefully considered.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: Has not the horse-power tax cramped the design of cars and allowed the Americans to gain the Australian and Canadian markets?

DOUBLE TAXATION (UNITED STATES).

34. Captain A. EVANS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if His Majesty's Government have entered into negotiations with the United States Treasury Department with a view to the abolition of double Income Tax; what form the negotiations took; and what is the present position?

Mr. CHURCHILL: An agreement has been reached, and is in force, with the United States for relief from double Income Tax on the profits from the business of shipping; but there have been no negotiations with that Government with a view to a general agreement for the avoidance of double taxation. In this connection I would invite my hon. and gallant Friend's attention to the reply which I gave on this subject to the hon. Member for Maryhill on 23rd June; I am sending him a copy of that reply.

PERSIA (BRITISH DEBT).

36. Mr. RILEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there is any outstanding loan or debt owing to this country by the Government of Persia, either for money advanced or work done for or material supplied to the Government of Persia; and, if so, what is the amount of such loan or debt?

Mr. CHURCHILL: In April, 1925, His Majesty's Government agreed to reduce their claim in respect of various loans made to the Persian Government from over £4,500,000 to £2,000,000 and to accept repayment by means of 25 annuities of £180,000 each to begin in 1926-27. The Persian Government accepted this offer in March, 1926, and promised to submit it for ratification by the Persian Legislature. This has not yet been done, and accordingly representations were made to the Persian Government on 10th May last, urging that the agreement should be submitted for ratification without further delay.

Mr. RILEY: Does that arrangement provide for interest as well as the reduction of the capital sum?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir. The annuities of £180,000 represent seven per cent. interest and two per cent. sinking fund.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: How many years are the payments to run?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Twenty-five.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Persian Budget balances better than his, and that the state of the country is, proportionately, more prosperous than the state of this country under his Government?

Mr. CHURCHILL: If any opportunity occurs of discussing the matter with the representatives of the Persian Government, I shall not fail to bring to their notice the points mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

INLAND REVENUE AND CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DEPARTMENTS.

37. Lord APSLEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the number of civil servants engaged in the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise Departments, respectively, on 1st April in each of the last three years.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): With my Noble Friend's permission, I will circulate the answer in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the answer:

Excluding collectors of taxes and clerks to Commissioners, whose employment on Inland Revenue duties is, in the majority of cases, part-time only, the staff employed by the Inland Revenue numbered at the

1st April, 1925	15,904
1st April, 1926	16,288
1st April, 1927	16,477

The total staff employed in the Customs and Excise Department was as follows:

1st April, 1925	11,228
1st April, 1926	11,564
1st April, 1927	11,795

40. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what are the reasons which have necessitated an increase in the number of officials and other persons employed in His Majesty's Customs of over 500 since 1924; and whether he anticipates any further increase in the near future?

Mr. McNEILL: The increase in the number of persons employed in the Customs and Excise Department since 1924 is attributable to the additional revenue and non-revenue work since imposed upon the Department by legislation. As regards the last part of the question, some further increase will be necessary, but it is anticipated that on the basis of existing volume of work the position will soon be stabilised.

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Government have repeatedly stated that no increases will be required in connection with the new duties and, in that case, how does he account for this state of affairs?

Mr. McNEILL: I have no doubt, where that statement applies, it will prove to be correct.

Mr. E. BROWN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that one hundred of these officials are housed in His Majesty's Mint, there is such an increase owing to the Safeguarding Duties?

SALARIES.

38. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he will inaugurate a uniform method throughout the service of the payment of the salaries of all officers established as the result of the Lytton and Southborough examinations; whether he can see his way to abolishing the present practice of paying such salaries at the monthly rate of eight per cent. to the nearest £1 below; and whether he will consider the desirability of substituting payment at the rate of one-twelfth of the annual salary each month?

Mr. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to an identical question put by him on the 26th May last.

TEMPORARY STAFF (TYPISTS).

73. Mr. KELLY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the number of temporary staff employed in the headquarters offices and outposts of his Department, respectively, in each of the following grades: Grade 1 shorthand-typists, Grade 2 shorthand-typists, Grade 1 copying-typists, and Grade 2 copying-typists; and the average length of service of the shorthand-typists and copying-typists concerned?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The figures so far as concerned the Admiralty are as follow:

		Average Service:
		No.	Years.	Months.
Shorthand-typists:
Grade I. ...	23	6	5
Grade II. ...	2	4	4
Typists:
Grade I. ...	55	7	0
Grade II. ...	1	2	0

There are also two Grade III. typists, average service two years. The supply of similar information in regard to the outpost staff would necessitate considerable enquiry, and therefore, unless the hon. Member thinks this information of such urgent public importance as to justify the expenditure of considerable time and labour, I trust that he will not press for it.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Were the machines they use made in Britain or America?

Mr. KELLY: May I consult with the hon. and gallant Gentleman?

60. Mr. KELLY asked the President of the Board of Trade what is the number of temporary staff employed as Grade 1 shorthand-typists, Grade 2 shorthand-typists, Grade 1 copying-typists, and Grade 2 copying-typists, respectively, in each of the following departments of the Board of Trade: Establishment Department; Census of Production Office; Solicitor's Department; Industrial Property Department, including Patent Office; Manchester Trade Marks Office; Companies Department; Department of Overseas Trade; and Mines Department?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Sir Burton Chadwick): The answer has been prepared in tabular form. Perhaps the hon. Member will, accordingly, allow me to circulate it in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the answer:

The following statement gives the information desired by the hon. Member:

TEMPORARY Shorthand-typists and Copying-typists serving in certain Departments of the Board of Trade.

	Temporary Short-hand-typists.		Temporary Copy-ing-typists.		Remarks.
	Grade I.	Grade II.	Grade I.	Grade II.
Establishment Department ...	13	3	26	1	This staff is part of a "pool" serving all Departments of the Board.
Census of Production Office ...	1	—	5	—
Solicitor's Department ...	(Included under Establishment Department.)
Industrial Property Department (Including Patent Office).	—	—	6	—
Manchester Trade Marks Office ...	—	—	—	—
Companies Department ...	(Included under Establishment Department.)
Department of Overseas Trade ...	27	1	24	—
Mines Department ...	4	—	3	2
	45	4	64	3

ECONOMIES.

32. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, if any, economies have been made in the administration of the Civil Service since the Budget statement, whether by reduction of recruiting or otherwise?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Nottingham Central (Mr. Bennett) on 22nd June.

CLERICAL CLASS (MESSRS. F. L. MYNETT AND A. E. ELLIS).

41. Mr. BRIANT asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether the attention of the Civil Service Commission has been drawn to the fact that two officers employed in the Post Office Savings Bank, Messrs. F. L. Mynett and A. E. Ellis, who were refused establishment in the clerical class on medical grounds in 1919, have continued to render effective service ever since, and that they have now been selected for permanent posts in the P-class; and whether, in view of these facts, he will direct that the original refusal of establishment on medical grounds shall be re-opened?

Mr. McNEILL: Mr. F. L. Mynett and Mr. A. E. Ellis were rejected on medical grounds in November, 1921, and April, 1923, respectively, and their cases were again considered in February, 1927, by the Civil Service Commissioners, who saw no grounds for re-opening them for further medical examination. The Commissioners cannot regard these officers as eligible for appointment to pensionable posts, and am not prepared to interfere with their independent discretion in the matter.

FIGHTING SERVICES.

FOOD CONTRACTS.

39. Mr. HURD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what is the proportion and value of British contracts for meat for the Army, Navy and Air Force which are given to foreigners in spite of the Government's general policy of preference for British goods?

Mr. McNEILL: The total meat purchases for the Army, Navy and Air Force for the last three years, including tinned meat, amounted to approximately £3,000,000. Purchases of foreign meat (mainly tinned) amounted to £106,000, or less than 4 per cent. These figures do not include home stations at which requirements are less than 100 lbs. a day, or certain foreign stations where contracts are made locally.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: From which foreign country does the bulk of this foreign meat come?

Mr. McNEILL: I could not say without notice, but I think the Argentine.

51. Mr. HURD asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps are being taken by the Empire Marketing Board to induce the authorities concerned to carry out the Board's precept of Buy British Goods in respect of meat purchases for the Army, Navy and Air Force; and whether the Board will consider making a grant or taking other means to ensure a ration of at least two days of British home-grown meat in each week?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Ormsby-Gore): The Empire Marketing Board has been in frequent consultation with the Departments concerned, and as my hon. Friend is aware from the answer given to him on 20th June by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the general contract policy of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain to give substantial preference to Empire over foreign goods is applied to meat purchases for the fighting forces. I do not think the proposal suggested in the last part of the question is likely to commend itself to the Empire Marketing Board.

Mr. HURD: How many meat contracts are now given to British home producers as a result of the hon. Gentleman's representations?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I should like to have notice of that question.

63. Sir H. LUCAS-TOOTH asked the Secretary of State for War whether all the potatoes, other vegetables, and fruit served to the troops are grown in this country; and, if not, whether he can estimate what proportion of them is home-grown?

The SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Sir Laming Worthington-Evans): Of potatoes and other vegetables served to the troops, by far the greater quantity, with the exception of onions, which are mainly imported from Spain and Egypt, is grown in this country. In addition, every endeavour is made to encourage local production by the obtaining of supplies direct from farmers or local markets in the vicinity of military stations. As regards vegetables generally, small quantities of new potatoes are obtained from Spain, St. Malo and Jersey, and of tomatoes, for cooking purposes, from Spain and Teneriffe at periods of the year when home-grown supplies are not available. With regard to fruits, the supply, in the main, is limited to apples, oranges and bananas. Of apples, a large proportion of those supplies is grown in Canada, Australia and New Zealand, while a certain quantity is imported from America, English apples being supplied when available. As regards bananas and oranges, the former are mainly supplied from Jamaica, a small proportion being obtained from the Canary Islands, while the bulk of the supply of oranges is obtained from Spain, with a small proportion from South Africa.

[Sir L. Worthington-Evans.]

69. Sir H. LUCAS-TOOTH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether all the potatoes, other vegetables, and fruit served to the men in His Majesty's ships and dockyards are grown in this country; and, if not, whether he can estimate what proportion of them is home-grown?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Lieut.-Colonel Headlam): Although the great majority of such supplies are British grown, it is not possible to estimate what proportion of the vegetables and fruit consumed in His Majesty's ships and naval establishments is home-grown.

Mr. HURD: Are steps taken to encourage those in authority in these several centres to buy British home goods where even they can?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: Yes, whenever it is possible British home-grown goods are obtained.

Sir H. BRITTAIN: Why should what is possible for the War Office, which has given a most picturesque answer, be impossible for the Admiralty?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I have no doubt I could give as picturesque an answer as that given by my right hon. Friend, but one picturesque answer is good enough for one day.

COST-OF-LIVING (INDEX FIGURE).

64. Captain A. EVANS asked the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware how the present index cost-of-living figure affects the Services; and if he will consider the alteration of this figure as far as it affects the Army?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: The rates of pay, half-pay and retired pay for officers sanctioned in 1919 were settled in relation to the cost-of-living index figures published by the Ministry of Labour. The periodical review to which these rates are subject is, therefore, necessarily based on those figures, as explained on pages 228 and 282 of the current Army Estimates.

Captain EVANS: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the last review of the cost-of-living index figure took place, and whether the Minister of Labour consulted his Department as far as it affected the Services?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: No, Sir; I do not think a review has taken place, because the contract was based on the figures then in existence.

Captain EVANS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Minister of Labour stated in this House only a few days ago that he did review this figure, and consulted the Trades Union Congress with reference to the alteration of the figure; and was the War Office considered in this matter?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: I am afraid it is not material, because the contract was based upon certain figures, and the successors of those figures still govern the contract.

Colonel APPLIN: Could my right hon. Friend explain to the House the relationship between the cost-of-living of a working man and that of an officer?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: I am afraid not at Question Time.

71. Captain ARTHUR EVANS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware how the present index cost-of-living figure affects the Services; and if he will consider the alteration of this figure so far as it affects the Navy?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part, I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the reply given by the Minister of Labour on 22nd June to the Noble Member for Shrewsbury (OFFICIAL REPORT, column 1856-7).

Captain EVANS: Have the Admiralty had any opportunity in the last six months of making representations to the Minister of Labour on this matter as far as it affects the pay of the naval forces?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The Admiralty are perfectly well aware of the difficulty in this matter. The answer that the Secretary of State for War gave just now equally applies to the Admiralty.

CREDITS (AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES).

42. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Minister of Agriculture if he can report any progress with the proposal to provide cheaper credits for farmers and other agriculturists; what are the present obstacles to the introduction of the necessary legislation; and whether part of the proposed credits will be made available for the deep-sea fisheries of the country?

Mr. GUINNESS: I regret that I am not yet in a position to make any statement with regard to agricultural credit. With regard to the last part of the question, I would refer the hon. and gallant Member to the reply I gave on the 16th May last to the hon. Member for the Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams).

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the reply to which he has referred me does not deal at all with deep-sea fisheries; and will he also be kind enough to answer the second part of the question?

Mr. GUINNESS: I find on reference to the reply that it did not specifically deal with fishermen, but obviously a form of agricultural credit to be advanced on land mortgage could not be suitable for the fishing industry, where the security would only be the boats and gear.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the second part of my question?

Mr. GUINNESS: I have explained that matter thoroughly in the answer to which I have referred the hon. Member. We are negotiating, but I am doubtful if it would be helpful to discuss the details of the difficulties in Parliament at this stage.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: May I ask whether the Press agitation decrying the condition of British agriculture is crippling the Government's effort to provide credit for this industry?

Mr. GUINNESS: I am getting a good many representations that, owing to the decrying of agricultural credit, merchants are pressing farmers to pay off their debts.

Sir ROBERT SANDERS: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any idea when he will be able to answer the first part of this question?

Mr. GUINNESS: I have said in answer to at least three questions in the last week that we are doing all we can to find a solution, and when I have anything to announce I shall announce it.

Mr. DIXEY: Is there any possibility of its being announced this Session?

Mr. GUINNESS: I really have nothing to add to what I have said.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's answer about the Press agitation, does he not think that agriculture has been helped by previous agitations, and why does he ride off by blaming the newspapers?

Mr. GUINNESS: I did not blame the Press. I was asked whether there was a restriction of credit owing to the decrying of agricultural credit, and I answered that I have had correspondence which bears out that suggestion.

Mr. E. BROWN: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think the Press is rendering a great service to agriculture by calling attention to the great difficulties under which it is labouring?

AFFORESTATION.

45. Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the Seventh Annual Report of the Forestry Commissioners, wherein it is declared that the planting programme being carried out does not reach the proposals contained in the Acland Report; that unless State planting can be speeded up there will be fewer than 3,000,000 acres under productive forest until the year 1955; and that this country is becoming increasingly dependent upon foreign supplies for timber and wood pulp which could be raised at home; and whether he proposes to take any steps to facilitate additional planting?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Baldwin): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The future policy of the Government in regard to afforestation is now under consideration.

DOGS (QUARANTINE PERIOD).

48. Lord APSLEY asked the Minister of Agriculture whether, seeing that the maximum period of incubation of any disease, including rabies, in dogs is two months, he will consider the reduction of the present period of six months' quarantine in certain establishments approved by his Department of dogs taken from England but brought back by their owners, on the ground that many of the latter cannot, owing to financial circumstances, afford to pay the necessary charges for this period?

Mr. GUINNESS: My Noble Friend is in error as to the maximum incubation period of rabies, as dogs from abroad have developed rabies from three to five and a half months after they have arrived at quarantine stations in this country. I do not consider that inability to pay the necessary quarantine charges would justify me in reducing the period of quarantine and, thereby, adding very considerably to the risk of the introduction of such a terrible disease into this country.

Captain A. EVANS: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House when last a case of rabies took six months to develop? Is it not the fact that this period of six months was only introduced during the War, or immediately after the War, when many dogs were being brought back from France?

Mr. GUINNESS: Oh, no; and anyhow the number of dogs being brought in does not affect the period of incubation. I have many cases; in the last one, which was in 1924, the incubation took five and a half months, while the dog was in quarantine.

UGANDA (LIQUOR TRAFFIC).

52. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a distillery has recently been started in the West African Protectorate of Uganda to facilitate the sale of intoxicating liquor to the natives; and why, in view of the provisions of the Peace Treaty, this has been permitted?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I am afraid the hon. Member is labouring under some misapprehension. As regards the first part of the question, I would point out that Uganda is in East and not in West Africa. No such distillery exists; and, even if there had been a distillery erected for such a purpose in Uganda, it would not be affected in any way by the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. WALLHEAD: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what bearing that has on the times in which we live?

POST OFFICE.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS (WITHDRAWALS).

56. Mr. COUPER asked the Postmaster-General whether he has under consideration any proposals for introducing a cross-warrant system in regard to Post Office Savings Bank accounts and increasing the amount of deposit that at present can be drawn on demand by holders of savings bank accounts at the Post Office; and, if so, is he in a position to make any statement regarding them?

The ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Viscount Wolmer): Yes, Sir, and I hope to be able to announce full particulars of these changes very soon.

TELEGRAMS, TUNSTALL (DELIVERY).

58. Mr. MacLAREN asked the Postmaster-General if he will give the post office of Tunstall, Stoke-on-Trent, the necessary authority to deliver telegrams, so as to facilitate delivery and remove the congestion now caused at the present office of delivery in Burslem, Stoke-on-Trent?

Viscount WOLMER: The arrangement recently introduced, under which telegrams for Tunstall are delivered by cycle messengers from the Burslem office, entails no delay and provides much more satisfactory accommodation for the messengers. I am informed that there is no congestion at the Burslem office; and accordingly I can see no good reason for reverting to the earlier arrangement.

Mr. MacLAREN: Might I tell the Noble Lord that I have just received intimations from fishmongers and people dealing in perishable goods, that their telegrams have been held up for one hour by the Post Office?

Viscount WOLMER: I shall be very glad to confer with the hon. Member, and go into any cases.

TRANS-ATLANTIC TELEPHONE SERVICE (CANADA).

57. Colonel MORDEN asked the Postmaster-General if the fact that the United States was connected by telephone with this country before the Dominion of Canada is due to the action of the Home or Canadian authorities?

Viscount WOLMER: Since, as my hon. Friend is no doubt aware, there is no wireless station in Canada capable, at the present stage of technical knowledge, of commercial telephonic working with this country, the opening of a service with the United States was necessarily the first step in establishing trans-Atlantic telephone communication.

Colonel MORDEN: Is it not a fact that the first wireless messages to America were sent through Canada?

Viscount WOLMER: Not the first wireless telephone messages.

PORTHENRY COLLIERY (GAS OUTBURST).

61. Dr. J. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary for Mines how many men were injured by the outburst of gas in the Porthenry colliery; and whether the precautions which were recommended by the committee of inquiry into the last outburst at this colliery have been observed?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Colonel Lane Fox): An outburst of gas and small coal occurred at the colliery on Tuesday last, when 150 men were below ground. Earth movements gave about 10 minutes' warning, and all the men were able to reach safety without injury, except that two or three were slightly gassed. The precautions laid down as the result of inquiries following the outburst in September, 1924, were observed.

ST. STEPHEN'S HALL (PAINTINGS).

62. Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether he is aware that the only historical picture in St. Stephen's Hall representing an incident in Scottish history deals with an act of national humiliation subsequent to the boycott of the Darien scheme by the English Government; and whether any other subject illustrative of an episode in Scots history was considered?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Captain Hacking—for The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS): The subjects for the paintings in St. Stephen's Hall, depicting the Building of Britain were selected after much consideration by an eminent historian, and approved by my Noble Friend, the First Commissioner of Works, who considers that the Act of Union, so far from implying any humiliation, was a striking exhibition of the good sense of both countries.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will the hon. and gallant Gentleman consider the advisability of affixing a tablet to that picture giving the names of the Scottish peers who were acting as Commissioners, and the amount of monetary bribes they received from the English Government for this act of national humiliation?

Captain HACKING: The names of the Commissioners are to be found in the Landbook, which can be purchased at the price of 1s. There is no suggestion, in the picture at any rate, that any money passed into the hands of the Commissioners. If any such opportunity had been given to Scotsmen, I am quite certain they would have availed themselves of it.

[Captain Hacking.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself in possession of the facts with regard to the amount of monetary bribes these Commissioners received, and does he think it desirable that that act of humiliation should be the sole subject of Scottish history represented in St. Stephen's Hall?

Mr. MacLAREN: Would the hon. and gallant Gentleman consider a suggestion, to placate Scottish patriots, that we should have a painting showing the little altercation that took place at Bannockburn between Robert the Bruce and De Bohun?

Sir H. BRITAIN: Is it not the fact that even this picture will not keep Scots away from London?

INDIA.

ZEMINDARS.

65. Mr. WELLOCK asked the Under-Secretary of State for India if any changes have taken place in the basis of payment to the Indian Exchequer by the Indian zemindars under the land settlement of 1793; and, in case such changes have taken place, whether he can give a record of them?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Earl Winterton): In 1793, a Bengal Regulation was enacted giving the force of law to the following declaration:

"The Governor-General in Council accordingly declares to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been concluded under the Regulations above-mentioned [namely, the Regulations for the decennial settlement of the public revenues of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa passed in 1789 and 1790], that, at the expiration of the term of the settlement, no alteration will be made in the assessment which they have respectively engaged to pay, but that they, and their heirs and lawful successors, will be allowed to hold their estates at such assessments for ever."

That Regulation is still in force.

66. Mr. WELLOCK asked the Under-Secretary of State for India what was the total annual income of the Indian zemindars and the total sum they paid to the Indian Exchequer at the time the permanent land settlement was made in 1793, and at some recent date?

Earl WINTERTON: The total sum paid in 1793 as land revenue by the zemindars affected by the permanent settlement of that year (i.e., the zemindars of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa) was about Rs.2,85,90,000, and in 1925-26 was Rs.3,11,37,819. My Noble Friend has no information regarding their total annual income.

ASSAM TEA PLANTATIONS (WAGES).

67. Lieut. - Colonel HOWARD - BURY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India the average monthly wages of men, women, and children in the Assam tea plantations during the years 1920-21 and 1925-26, respectively?

Earl WINTERTON: The average monthly wages of men in the Assam Valley Plantations increased from Rs.9 8a. in 1920-21 to Rs.12 8a. in 1925-26. The wages of women increased from Rs.8 1a. to Rs.10 1a., and of children from Rs.5 1a. to Rs.5 12a. In the Surma Valley the wages of men increased from Rs.7 10a. to Rs.9 12a., of women from Rs.6 2a. to Rs.7 14a., and of children from Rs.3 14a. to Rs. 5. As the figures for 1920-1921 include, whilst those for 1925-26 exclude, diet and subsistence allowances, the increase in cash earnings is greater than the figures indicate.

ROYAL NAVY.

DISCHARGES AND DESERTIONS.

70. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the First Lord of the Admiralty the number of ratings who secured their discharge by purchase and who deserted from the Navy during the year 1906, respectively; and the corresponding number during the year 1926?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The figures for the calendar years are not available, those for the financial years are as follow:

		1906-07.	1926-27.
Discharged	by purchase	...	1,070	197
Desertions	...	1,896	258

Sir J. NALL: Do not these figures illustrate the sheer futility of Communist propaganda?

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Does the hon. and gallant Gentleman suggest that Communist propaganda has anything to do with any of these desertions at all at any time?

DRINKING ARRANGEMENTS.

72. Mr. ROBERT YOUNG asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware that general request No. 21, A.F.O. 1346, for better hygienic drinking arrangements, where necessary, to be fitted in all ships, with particular consideration to the engine-room and boiler-rooms, was put forward by representatives of the whole of the lower deck; and will he state whether the suggestions will be carried out?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The existing drinking arrangements on board His Majesty's ships are considered to be hygienic. It is possible, however, that some different method of supply might be more convenient to the men and any suggestions submitted through the usual channels will be considered.

Mr. YOUNG: When a request was made was not the reply of such a character that the man could not understand it?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I cannot quite answer that question. As far as I know there is no substantial ground for the hon. Member's opinion, and what I have answered is the case. If any good suggestions can be made, we are perfectly willing to consider them.

Sir BERTRAM FALLE: Is the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that if a man in the engine room wants a drink of water, he has to leave the engine room before he can get it?

PRE-WAR PENSIONERS (WAR SERVICE).

74. Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty whether a naval seaman or marine who was discharged to modified pension before the great War and who subsequently returned for service during the War was allowed, after demobilisation, to count his war service for additional pension; and if the total service entitled him to the full pension of the rank held on demobilisation?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: Pre-War naval and Royal Marine pensioners who were mobilised for service in the late War were allowed to reckon their war service for the appropriate increase of pension for which they were eligible in respect of the combined service, including time served in petty officer and higher non-commissioned ranks.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (LOANS).

22. Mr. MONTAGUE (for Mr. W. THORNE) asked the Minister of Health how much of the £55,373 principal and interest payable during the financial year 1926-27 has been paid by the Bedwelty Poor Law guardians?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: No payment was made by the Bedwelty guardians during the financial year 1926-27 in respect of loans advanced by the Ministry.

23. Mr. MONTAGUE (for Mr. THORNE) asked the Minister of Health how much of the £30,688 principal and interest payable during the financial year 1926-27 has been paid by the Sheffield Poor Law guardians?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The total payment made by the Sheffield guardians during the financial year 1926-27 in respect of loans advanced by the Ministry was £49,946.

24. Mr. MONTAGUE (for Mr. THORNE) asked the Minister of Health how much of the £328,563 principal and interest payable during the financial year 1926-27 has been paid by the West Ham Poor Law commissioners?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The total payment made by the West Ham guardians during the financial year 1926-27 in respect of loans advanced by the Ministry was £108,674.

HOP PICKING (MODEL BYE-LAWS).

26. Captain GARRO-JONES (for Mr. BRIANT) asked the Minister of Health how many district councils have adopted

[Captain Garro-Jones.]
the model bye-laws issued early in 1926 for the better regulation of hop-picking areas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Eleven councils have made bye-laws based on the new model.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLYNES: May I ask the Prime Minister if he will state the business for next week?

The PRIME MINISTER: The business next week will be:

On Monday and Tuesday, Finance Bill —Committee.

On Wednesday, Opposition Motion of Censure on the Government relating to the House of Lords.

On Thursday, Supply, Committee:
Foreign Office Vote (on which a Debate on Disarmament will take place).

On Friday, Supply, Committee: India Office Vote.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY:
Will the Government be able to state their intentions on Wednesday with regard to the House of Lords?

The PRIME MINISTER: It is a very short time to wait until Wednesday.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Can the Prime Minister say whether there is any truth in the rumour that the Government intend to refuse to give battle next Wednesday?

The PRIME MINISTER: I am afraid
I did not hear the hon. Gentleman's question. I ought to have added the usual phrase, "On each day, if time permits, other Orders will be taken."

Motion made, and Question put, "That other Government Business have precedence this day of the Business of Supply."—[The Prime Minister.]

The House divided: Ayes, 224;
Noes, 112.

Division No. 227.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Atholl, Duchess of
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Beamish, Rear-Admiral T. P. H.
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
Bellairs, Commander Carlyon W.
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Col. Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
Braithwaite, Major A. N.
Brass, Captain W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Brittain, Sir Harry
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H.C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Calne, Gordon Hall
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prismth.S.)
Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.

AYES.

Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
Cohen, Major J. Brunel
Couper, J. B.
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Crooke, J. Smedley (Derfend)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Curzon, Captain Viscount
Davies, Sir Thomas (Clarence)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dawson, Sir Philip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixey, A. C.
Drewe, C.
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Elliot, Major Walter E.
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Erskine, James Malcolm Monteith
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Falls, Sir Bertram G.
Fielden, E. B.
Forestier-Walker, Sir L.
Forrest, W.
Foster, Sir Harry S.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
Ganzoni, Sir John
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Goff, Sir Park
Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
Greaves-Lord, Sir Walter
Gunston, Captain D. W.

[3.45 p.m.]

Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hanbury, C.
Harland, A.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
Hawke, John Anthony
Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Henn, Sir Sydney W.
Hoare, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir S. J. G.
Holt, Capt. H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aymer
Huntingfield, Lord
Hurd, Percy A.
Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Midi'n & P'bl's)
Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
James, Lieut.-Colonel Hon. Cuthbert
Jephcott, A. R.
Joynson-Hicks, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Kennedy, A. R. (Preston)
Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
Lelgh, Sir John (Clapham)
Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
Locker-Lampson, G. (Wood Green)
Loder, J. de V.
Long, Major Eric
Looker, Herbert William
Lougher, Lewis
Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Lumley, L. R.
Lynn, Sir R. J.
Macdonnell, Colonel Hon. Angus
MacIntyre, Ian
McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John

Macquisten, F. A.
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Manningham-Buller, Sir Mervyn
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Morden, Col. W. Grant
 Morrison-Bell, Sir Arthur Clive
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nall, Colonel Sir Joseph
 Newman, Sir R. H. S. D. L. (Exeter)
 Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (Preston)
 Nield, Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Perny, Frederick George
 Percy, Lord Eustace (Hastings)
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pilditch, Sir Philip
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rentoul, G. S.
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)

Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Savery, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith-Carington, Neville W.
 Smithers, Waldron
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fyde)
 Story-Deans, R.
 Streetfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)

Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Turton, Sir Edmund Russborough
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Warrender, Sir Victor
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Withers, John James
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, Sir Kingsley (Woolwich W.)
 Worthington-Evans, Rt. Hon. Sir L.
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Sir Harry Barnston and Major
 Sir George Hennessy.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
 Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
 Broad, F. A.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Compton, Joseph
 Connolly, M.
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
 Gibbins, Joseph
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenall, T.
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydfil)
 Hamilton, Sir R. (Orkney & Shetland)
 Hardie, George D.

Harris, Percy A.
 Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hayes, John Henry
 Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hore-Bellisha, Leslie
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 Johnston, Thomas (Dundee)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Kenworthy, Lt.-Com. Hon. Joseph M.
 Lansbury, George
 Lee, F.
 Lunn, William
 Mackinder, W.
 MacNeill-Weir, L.
 Macpherson, Rt. Hon. James I.
 March, S.
 Montague, Frederick
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Murnin, H.
 Naylor, T. E.
 Oliver, George Harold
 Pailin, John Henry
 Parkinson, John Allen (Wigan)
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Potts, John S.
 Purcell, A. A.
 Riley, Ben
 Roberts, Rt. Hon. F. O. (W. Bromwich)
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Runciman, Rt. Hon. Walter
 Salter, Dr. Alfred
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond

Short, Alfred (Wadnesbury)
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Caithness)
 Sitth, Charles H.
 Slessor, Sir Henry H.
 Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
 Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thomas, Rt. Hon. James H. (Derby)
 Thorne, G. R. (Wolverhampton, E.)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Townend, A. E.
 Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wallhead, Richard C.
 Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Webb, Rt. Hon. Sidney
 Wedgwood, Rt. Hon. Josiah
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Westwood, J.
 Whiteley, W.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.
 Young, Robert (Lancaster, Newton)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Sir Robert Hutchison and Mr. Fenby.

HASTINGS TRAMWAYS COMPANY (TROLLEY VEHICLES) BILL [Lords].

Reported, with Amendments.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

GRAVESEND, ROSHERVILLE, AND NORTHFLEET TRAMWAYS (AMENDMENT) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

Reported, with Amendments. [Provisional Order confirmed].

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

STANDING COMMITTEE A.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee A: Viscount Elveden; and had appointed in substitution: Lieut-Colonel Windsor-Olive.

Report to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to make such amendments of The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, as are necessary to give effect to a certain resolution adopted by an Imperial Conference held in London in the year nineteen hundred and twenty-six." [Workmen's Compensation (Transfer of Funds) Bill [Lords].]

And also, a Bill intituled, "An Act to vary the trusts, powers, and provisions of two several settlements, both dated the seventeenth day of August, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, and executed on the marriage of Ralph Frederic Bury and Violet Esmé Bentley." [Bury Estate Bill [Lords].]

Ouse Drainage Bill,—That they have appointed a Committee consisting of five Lords to join with a Committee of the Commons to consider the Ouse Drainage Bill, pursuant to the Commons Message of Monday last, and they propose that the Joint Committee do meet in Committee Room No. 1, on Tuesday the 12th of July next, at Eleven o'clock.

Rabbits and Rooks Bill [Lords].—That they request that the Commons will be pleased to give leave to Sir Edmund Turton, baronet, a Member of their House, to attend, in order to his being examined as a witness, before the Select Committee appointed by their Lordships in the present Session of Parliament on the Rabbits and Rooks Bill [Lords].

BURY ESTATE BILL [Lords].

Read the first time; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

OUSE DRAINAGE BILL,

So much of Lords Message as refers to time and place of meeting considered.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed by this House do meet the Lords Committee as proposed by their Lordships.— (Commander Eyres Monsell.)

Message to the Lords to acquaint them therewith.

RABBITS AND ROOKS BILL [Lords],

So much of Lords Message as requests the attendance of Sir Edmund Turton, baronet, considered:—

And, Sir Edmund Turton having consented, leave given.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

CONCRETE SHELTERS (GERMANY).

Sir F. HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government propose to take advantage of the invitation which has been conveyed by the German authorities to the military experts of the Powers, formerly represented on the Inter-Allied Military Commission of Control, to inspect the work of demolition of the concrete shelters in the eastern fortresses of Germany; whether this invitation has been referred by the experts of the Governments of the interested Powers; and will he arrange for the Report of the results of any inspection that may take place to be circulated to the House as soon as it has been received?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: I understand that General von Pawelsz, who represents the German Government in these matters, has now formally issued an invitation for one or two of the Allied military experts to accompany him on a tour of inspection of the fortifications on Germany's eastern frontier, the demolition of which was agreed upon between the German Government and the Allied Governments concerned last January. Formal note has been taken of this invitation and arrangements in connection with the projected visit are at present under discussion.

I am unable at this stage to forecast what decision will be taken with regard to the circulation of any report which may be drawn up as a result of this visit.

ROYAL NAVY (SPORTS CLOTHING).

Sir B. FALLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that an Admiralty circular letter of December, 1912, authorised naval ratings to wear sports clothing when going on shore and returning on board; and whether he will take the necessary action to draw the attention of commanding officers to this Order, which is still in force although generally unknown?

Lieut. - Colonel HEADLAM: This matter was raised by the Welfare Conference, and the Admiralty decision was that this was a matter which must be left to the discretion of the commander-in-chief or senior naval officer present. As the decision was promulgated as recently as 18th May last in Admiralty Fleet Order 1346, I have no reason for assuming that it is not within the cognisance of all commanding officers.

EDUCATION.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION, NORTH WALES.

Sir R. THOMAS asked the President of the Board of Education whether he has any information as to the number of schools in North Wales where the accommodation available is insufficient for the number of scholars attending; and in how many cases are the buildings in such an unsatisfactory condition as to require rebuilding in the near future?

Lord E. PERCY: The average attendance for the year 1926-27 exceeded the recognised accommodation in the case of 13 public elementary schools in the six counties of North Wales. None of these are included in Schedule A of the Black List.

VACCINATION LEAFLETS, MONMOUTHSHIRE.

Mr. GROVES asked the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the action of the local education authority in Monmouthshire in distributing a four-page leaflet, printed and published by an insurance company, advocating vaccination in the local schools; and whether, in view of the fact that propaganda on controversial subjects has not been allowed by the Board to be introduced into the schools which receive Government grants, he will instruct the local authority to refrain from circulating leaflets of this nature?

Lord E. PERCY: I am in communication with the local authority in regard to this matter.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

BOARD OF EDUCATION (TYPISTS).

Mr. AMMON asked the President of the Board of Education what is the number of temporary staff employed as Grade I shorthand typists, Grade II shorthand typists, Grade I copying typists, and Grade II copying typists, respectively, in each of the following offices under his control: Board of Education headquarters and provincial centres, respectively, British Museum, Imperial War Museum, London Museum, National Gallery, National Portrait Gallery and Wallace Collection?

Lord E. PERCY: The numbers employed at the offices of the Board are as follow:

Temporary shorthand typist:

Grade I	1
Grade II	—

Temporary copying typists:

Grade I	29
Grade II	12

One temporary shorthand typist, Grade I, is employed outside London. None of the other offices referred to by the hon. Member are under the control of my Department.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANTS, WOOLWICH.

Lieut.-Colonel McDONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War why, in view of the terms of appointment of supervisors and technical assistants in the Royal Ordnance factories, Woolwich, whereby engagements are dependent on obtaining a permanent appointment within a certain period of years, this condition was not enforced in the case of Mr. Bremner, who, although employed in a temporary managerial capacity for over two years, while serving in the grade of technical assistant was discharged prior to an employé who had longer service in the technical assistant grade?

Sir L. WORTHINGTON-EVANS: The terms of appointment to the grade of technical assistant, which superseded the grade of supervisor, mention the period of tenure as normally four years. This has not, however, been applied as a rigid rule, and retention for a longer period does not of itself imply subsequent promotion to the managerial ranks. The discharge of technical assistants not selected for such posts does not necessarily take place in order of length of service, but each case is considered on its merits and I regret that there are no grounds for altering the decision reached in Mr. Bremner's case. I am advised that Mr. Bremner has at no time discharged full managerial duties in the factories.

WOMEN CLERICAL OFFICERS.

Mr. DUCKWORTH asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what was the first date upon which a woman clerical officer received her appointment as a result of the Lytton limited competition of 1920; and what was the first date upon which a woman clerical officer was appointed from this examination in the Post Office?

Mr. McNEILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Miss Bondfield) on the 31st May.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

RELIEF SCHEMES, BRISTOL.

Mr. W. BAKER asked the Minister of Labour whether he is aware that, while there are 18,000 unemployed in Bristol, only 544 men are being employed on relief works; and whether he will urge the Unemployment Grants Committee and the Ministry of Transport to consider the possibility of further grants to enable the City of Bristol to extend its relief schemes?

Sir A. STEEL-MAITLAND: On the 20th June, 1927, 10,862 men were registered as unemployed at the Exchanges in Bristol, including Avonmouth, Kingswood and Eastville, while on the 28th May, 1927 (the latest date for which returns are available), 945 men were engaged on State assisted relief schemes in the area. The initiation of further relief schemes is a matter for the local authorities concerned, who are fully aware of the conditions under which State grants may be obtained.

BENEFIT (CASUAL RELIEF).

Mr. SHEPHERD asked the Minister of Labour whether there are any Regulations governing the case of an unemployed man who is otherwise entitled to unemployment benefit, but, travelling by road to secure promised employment, is compelled by destitution to have recourse for one night to a casual ward; whether in these circumstances the man becomes disqualified for benefit; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of an amendment of the Regulations?

Sir A. STEEL-MAITLAND: In ordinary circumstances an unemployed man who is otherwise entitled to unemployment benefit is not disqualified by the statutory authorities merely on the ground that he had recourse for one night to a casual ward. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, I should be glad to have inquiries made.

ROYAL AIR FORCE (HOME-GROWN FOOD).

Sir H. LUCAS-TOOTH asked the Secretary of State for Air whether all the potatoes, other vegetables, and fruit served to the Air Force are grown in this country; and, if not, whether he can estimate what proportion of them is home-grown?

Sir S. HOARE: Practically all the potatoes, vegetables and fruit consumed by Air Force units at home are home-grown; the main exceptions being those kinds of fruit which cannot be obtained in this country. The home-grown proportion of the whole would be very greatly preponderant, but I cannot give an exact percentage.

HOUSING.

NORTH WALES.

Sir R. THOMAS asked the Minister of Health the number of houses built in the six counties of North Wales during the period January, 1926, to 31st March, 1927; and what is the approximate average rent per house?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The number of houses completed with State assistance in North Wales during the period 1st January, 1926, to 31st March, 1927, was 1,546. Statistics of the number of houses completed without State assistance are obtained half-yearly, and the number completed in North Wales during the period of 18 months ended 31st March, 1927, was 1,634. I have no information about the rentals of these houses.

KENT COALFIELD.

Sir R. THOMAS asked the Minister of Health what information he has regarding the present stage of development of the Kent coalfield; to what extent it will be possible to avoid the nuisance of industrial smoke in this area; and whether there are in force such stipulations regarding town-planning as will prevent the creation of housing conditions similar to those prevailing in the older coalfields?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My information is that three mines are working and one being sunk. I understand that electricity is likely to be extensively used in the working of the mines, and that the risk of smoke nuisance will thus be much reduced. Provision is being made to ensure that the housing and other development is in accordance with town-planning conditions.

METROPOLITAN POLICE (HOUSING).

Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary what provision has been made with a view to finding suitable housing accommodation for married police officers who have been transferred to suburban areas for the 12 months ended to the last convenient date?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: The funds available for the provision of housing accommodation for the Metropolitan Police are necessarily reserved for the Central Divisions where the need is greatest. In the residential suburbs the men are left to make their own arrangements apart from a few sets of quarters at new stations.

Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary the number of married police officers at present occupying married quarters in the Metropolitan Police area; and whether, in view of the shortage of housing accommodation for married officers with families, it is intended in the near future to erect more up-to-date and modern homes for them?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: There are 937 married officers housed in officially provided married quarters within the Metropolitan Police district. A building is in course of erection in Lambeth which will provide 96 additional sets of quarters with up-to-date accommodation and conveniences; and the erection of another building in Clerkenwell will be commenced next autumn to contain a further 96 sets of similar married quarters.

ENCEPHALITIS LETHARGICA.

Mr. C. WILSON asked the Minister of Health how many cases of, and deaths from, encephalitis lethargica and other forms of encephalitis, or sleepy sickness, or variations of these diseases, have occurred during each of the last five years, the ages of each, and the period which has elapsed between vaccination and death?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: A statement giving these particulars is shown below.

As regards the last part of the question, medical practitioners are not required to report the vaccinal condition of persons certified to be suffering from, or to have died from, any of these diseases. Information as to the period which has elapsed between vaccination and death is accordingly available only in regard to the cases which have been brought to the notice of the Committee on Vaccination, in which vaccination has preceded the onset of symptoms of acute disease of the central nervous system within a period of a few weeks.

ENGLAND AND WALES.—Number of Cases notified of, and Deaths registered from, Encephalitis Lethargica, Polio-encephalitis, and Polio-myelitis and Deaths from Encephalitis during the years 1922-1926.

Disease and year.	No. of Cases notified including Port Sanitary Districts.	Deaths registered at following Ages.																		All Ages.
		Under 1 month.
		Under 1 month.	1-3 months.	3-6 months.	6-12 months.	Total under 1 year.	1	2	3	4	Total under 5 years.	5	10	15	20	25	30	35	40		45	50	55	60	65	70	75	80	85
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30
Encephalitis Lethargica.	454	—	—	—	—	4	4	6	8	6	40	19	29	32	18	18	12	19	31	27	25	24	18	22	4	1	—	—	—
1922	1025	—	—	—	3	6	19	15	15	7	62	39	35	44	31	36	21	42	34	34	46	45	31	21	5	4	—	—	—
1923	5039	—	—	—	22	28	48	39	33	30	178	88	100	150	103	75	60	82	118	111	99	88	78	43	27	4	3	—	—
1924	2635	—	—	—	14	16	40	44	30	22	152	75	89	131	92	70	78	83	96	109	112	105	89	58	21	10	2	—	—
1925	2267	—	—	—	14	18	32	32	29	29	140	81	64	105	88	96	71	82	97	99	118	112	76	60	25	7	3	1	—
Polio-encephalitis.	31	—	—	—	1	3	5	6	1	—	15	3	2	1	2	—	—	—	—	2	1	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
1922	57	—	—	—	1	3	7	4	2	2	22	4	5	1	1	2	—	—	1	2	—	—	1	—	—	—	1	—	—
1923	83	—	—	—	1	3	7	4	3	2	21	8	1	2	1	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
1924	51	—	—	—	1	5	8	1	7	1	24	4	4	3	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
1925	138	—	—	—	1	7	12	5	4	2	32	12	4	3	1	2	1	2	1	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Polio-myelitis.	355	—	—	—	10	14	20	11	8	7	60	15	13	4	7	1	3	1	1	—	1	1	2	—	—	—	—	—	—
1922	587	—	—	—	11	11	13	8	8	4	44	9	11	9	1	2	—	—	—	2	1	1	1	1	—	—	—	—	—
1923	777	—	—	—	8	8	17	5	11	8	49	18	19	16	5	2	4	1	2	2	1	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
1924	871	—	—	—	3	6	15	12	12	4	49	14	14	16	7	4	2	4	1	2	1	—	—	—	—	1	—	—	—
1925	1,159	—	—	—	8	10	26	17	7	4	64	30	17	25	20	10	1	2	1	3	2	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Encephalitis.	—	2	3	1	10	16	10	9	1	3	39	17	24	32	21	21	16	17	20	24	23	21	10	12	4	6	4	—	—
1922	—	—	3	5	8	16	4	4	3	3	30	22	19	30	27	25	13	13	15	22	19	24	9	12	7	5	5	1	—
1923	—	—	3	3	8	12	8	7	4	4	35	12	22	27	30	7	17	15	28	20	12	16	11	9	3	2	2	1	—
1924	—	—	1	1	3	6	9	2	8	11	43	13	27	27	22	26	22	13	19	21	20	15	7	5	6	6	7	2	—
1925	—	3	2	2	6	13	9	2	8	5	41	21	30	32	33	29	27	22	24	16	23	22	16	7	5	2	3	—	—
1926	—	—	—	—	9	9	12	9	6	5	41	21	30	32	33	29	27	22	24	16	23	22	16	7	5	2	3	—	—

ONE-WAY TRAFFIC.

Lieut.-Colonel MASON asked the Minister of Transport whether he is aware of the grave congestion of traffic at the junction of Hart Street and Shaftesbury Avenue with New Oxford Street; and, in view of the convenient arrangement of bye-streets at this point, will he cause an experiment to be made with one-way traffic?

Colonel ASHLEY: The proposal has already been considered by the London Traffic Advisory Committee, and I understand their view to be that the bye-streets at this point are not in fact convenient for the trial of a "one-way" traffic scheme. Traffic conditions from the Marble Arch through Oxford Street, Holborn and High Holborn are receiving constant investigation, and I trust that ultimately it will be found practicable to effect improvements.

INDUSTRIAL SPIRIT.

Mr. CLAYTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government, in removing restrictions, to make it possible to convey duty-free spirit, unmethylated, but to be used for industrial purposes, in tank wagons and by pipe line?

Mr. McNEILL: Clause 12 of the Finance Bill will make it possible to allow under suitable Regulations spirits made or intended to be made into any kind of methylated spirits to be conveyed by tank wagon or pipe line. There is, however, no provision in the Bill under which such methods of conveyance of spirits which are neither methylated nor intended for methylation could be permitted.

STAMP DUTIES (ISSUES OF CAPITAL).

Sir H. COWAN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield in the last financial year of the Stamp Duties on foreign State and company issues of capital on the London money market?

Mr. CHURCHILL: The yield of Stamp Duty on marketable securities liable to duty at the rate of 40s. per cent. amounted in 1926-27 to £875,000. I have no information to show how much of this duty related to securities issued on the raising of new capital in this country by foreign States and companies.

RECEIPT STAMPS.

Mr. CLUSE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that a large number of shopkeepers are refraining from giving receipts for amounts over £2; and what steps he is proposing to take in this matter to prevent defrauding of the Revenue?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question asked by the hon. and gallant Member for the Southwark Central Division (Colonel Day) on the 11th November, 1926. I am sending him a copy of that reply.

ANDAMAN ISLANDS (INDIANS).

Mr. J. HUDSON asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether it is the policy of the Government of India and of His Majesty's Government to throw open the Andaman Islands for free colonisation by Indians; and whether there are any restrictions as to the number taking up residence there?

Earl WINTERTON: The general policy of the Government of India, as explained in their published Resolution of the 27th February, 1926, was one of readiness to receive applications for land in the Andamans from suitable persons. Under the Andaman and Nicobar Islands (Amendment) Regulation, 1927, permits for landing in the Andamans are no longer required, though the Chief Commissioner may prohibit such landing, and licences to reside for periods longer than one month are still, with certain exceptions, required. No limitation has been laid down, so far as I am aware, as to the number of persons who may be allowed to reside in the islands.

PAPER MANUFACTURING WORKS, NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. RENNIE SMITH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can give any information as to the proposed changes in prospect for the paper manufacturing works at Cornerbrook, Newfoundland; what is the offer which has been made by an American firm; and what is the attitude of His Majesty's Government as one of the guarantors?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Negotiations on this subject are in progress in Newfoundland, and it is not possible at present to make any statement in the matter.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Sir F. HALL asked the Prime Minister if he will arrange for the issue as a White Paper of a comparison of the outline proposals of the Government for the reconstitution of the House of Lords and the proposals with this object in view which were formulated in 1921 by the Government then responsible?

The PRIME MINISTER: The proposals of 1922 for the reconstitution of the House of Lords have already been presented to Parliament as Command Paper 1715 of 1922. I think it would be premature at this stage to issue another White Paper.

AFFORESTATION.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked the hon. Member for Monmouth, as representing the Forestry Commissioners, whether he will place in the Library of this House papers in further explication of the statement in the latest Report of the Commissioners that large areas hitherto considered unplantable can now be afforested with success; and whether he can say how many acres of molinia peat lands there are in England and Scotland, respectively, suitable for afforestation?

Sir L. FORESTIER-WALKER: The statement is based on various experiments and investigations into growing woods; these data have not yet been collated for publication, but it is hoped to issue a bulletin on the afforestation of difficult sites. The areas of molinia peat land in England and Scotland have not been surveyed, but they include many thousands of acres on both sides of the border.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.

Further considered in Committee
[Progress, 28th June].

[Mr. JAMES HOPE in the Chair.]

CLAUSE 9.—(Customs duty on translucent or vitrified pottery.)

Mr. SNOWDEN: If I may be permitted to do so, I would like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make any statement as to how far he proposes to proceed to-day. There is a number of what I might call minor Amendments on the Order Paper, but there are two or three of major importance. There are the Clauses for dealing with the evasion of Super-tax. I understand that that is a matter in which hon. Members opposite are extremely interested, and I think it would be very undesirable that we should be dealing with these important proposals at a late hour. Therefore, I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has considered that matter, and, if so, has he any statement to make to the Committee?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): I have been giving consideration to the point which the right hon. Gentleman has raised. Personally, I hold very strongly the view, and have always held it, that we should try to arrange our business to bring on important Debates at times when the fullest publicity can be obtained, and that the crucial issues should be debated on the best occasions. I would, therefore, propose, if the Committee would agree, that when we reach Clause 28 I should move to postpone consideration of Clauses 29 to 34 inclusive, which are the Clauses dealing with Super-tax and its evasion, and that they should be considered after Clause 45. Then we should endeavour to make what progress we could, and, of course, the Government attach the greatest importance to getting as far as Clause 45 to-night. There is really nothing of a controversial character in the various intervening proposals, and a great many are in the nature of technical provisions. That would enable us to get the discussion of the evasion Clauses on Monday next in the best circumstances, and after that we could deal with the Road Fund. There will be a day for the new Clauses, with regard to which, I understand, it is intended and desired to have a very definite Debate upon the Betting Duty, raising the whole position. I think that is much the best division of our time, and I understand there is no difficulty whatever in the way of precedent for making this Motion. Very often a Motion is made to postpone a Clause to the end of the Bill, but a precedent exists for postponing a Clause or group of Clauses, not to the end of the Bill, but to a particular point of the Bill. I find that in 1908, when I was in charge of the Port of London Bill, I said:

"I am very anxious indeed that the crucial and fundamental Clauses of this Bill, of which, perhaps, Clause 3 is the most important, should be discussed in the House at the best period for publicity and criticism."

I then moved that that Clause should be postponed until after Clause 11 had been considered, to which the House gave its assent. I shall, therefore, propose to repeat that process this evening, and for exactly the same reason, by moving that Clauses 29 to 34 be postponed until after consideration of Clause 45, so that we can begin to debate the important evasion proposals on Monday, if that would be convenient to the Committee.

Mr. SNOWDEN: Of course, it is impossible to say what length of time the discussion to-day may take. It might possibly happen that we might reach the end of Clause 27 about 11 o'clock this evening, and, in that case, it might not be necessary for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make this Motion then, as we could begin Clause 28 on Monday.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I am afraid that would not do. There is very little in between to cause any trouble at all, but we must get it out of the way if we are to secure the good opportunities for debating evasion, the Road Fund, and the Betting Duty.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I ought to point out what is quite a small technical point, that the proper time to move to postpone Clauses is after the last Clause is disposed of, and in this case that would be after the Question, "That Clause 28 stand part of the Bill," has been agreed to. Also, under the Rules of the House, it will be necessary in that case to move to postpone each Clause.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The arrangement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has described is one which on other occasions might very favourably be adopted. It is, perhaps, the best way of obtaining a full discussion of one of the most important parts of the Bill, and in so far as we can facilitate that procedure, we shall do all that we can to help.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: Before we go on to deal with pottery, it might be for the convenience of the Committee if you, Mr. Hope, were to tell us what procedure you propose to adopt with regard to this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I propose to call upon the hon. Member to move the first Amendment—to leave out the words "five years" and to insert instead thereof the words "one year." I think it will be convenient, and in accordance with the usual practice, that we should have a general discussion on the Clause on that Amendment. I also propose to call his Amendment—on line 7, to leave out the words "or vitrified pottery." With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton)—in line 4, to leave out the words "nineteenth day of April," and to insert instead thereof the words "first day of July"—and the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence)—to leave out the words "nineteenth day of April," and to insert instead thereof the words "first day of May"—I am not very favourably disposed towards them. It appears to me that they are more suitable for discussion on the Resolution imposing the duty. I can see that the former would involve repayment of the whole quarter's revenue. The latter would also involve repayment of a very much smaller amount, and I am not very well disposed to accept those two Amendments.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: So far as my Amendment is concerned, it is not intended as a destructive Amendment.

It has been put down at the special request of those who are very much interested in this matter. It involves a very small concession, and I had hopes that, after hearing the case I should put forward, the Government would be willing to concede it. I hope, therefore, you will consider whether that particular Amendment could not be allowed.

Mr. HARRIS: I did not intend to press the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland and myself. I was quite prepared to ask you, Mr. Hope, to allow me not to move it, but I feel that the other one is not really controversial and that the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) could justify it.

The CHAIRMAN: It has reference to duties on goods that were coming into the country at the time. I think I will be disposed to accept that, but not the Amendment standing in the names of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland and the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris).

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I now beg to move, in Page 5, line 3, to leave out the words "five years" and to insert instead thereof the words "one year."

I am much obliged to you. I think we shall have an important discussion when we come to that point on the Paper. The ostensible object of the Amendment I now move is to limit the period for which this new duty on pottery runs, from five years to a single year, but I understand that, in accordance with your ruling, the Committee will be entitled to discuss the whole question of the Pottery Duties on this Amendment. When the subject was before the House in the form of the Money Resolution on Report, there was one feature of the position of the Government that was very noticeable on this side. It seems very likely that it will be repeated to-day. I refer, of course, to the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I venture to ask why it is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is always absent when these safeguarding duties are under discussion. I venture to supply the answer. The answer is, in my opinion, that he knows too much about these safeguarding proposals. It has been a matter of observation to myself, and I think to other hon. Members, that it is when the knowledge of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is least that his speeches are the most alluring, at any rate, to hon. Members on the opposite side of the House. We recall his attitude on Monday, on the question of the gold supply, and there are many other occasions which bear out that view.

The CHAIRMAN: I am allowing a general discussion on the Pottery Duty, but not a general discussion on the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I am very sorry to have offended, but I was only making a slight introduction to what I was going to say with regard to the attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the Pottery Duties. That, I think you will admit, is in order. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows quite well that these safeguarding duties are, in fact, pure and unadulterated Protection, and, although his feet have led him into the Conservative camp, his brain holds him still a Free Trader. If I might use a paraphrase, one might say of him:

"Whose brain rebels against his will Remains of the same opinion still."

For that reason, he seeks safety by staying away from these Debates, but, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer has gone away, our Debate is to be graced again, as it was before, by the presence of the President of the Board of Trade. The attitude which the President of the Board of Trade takes towards us on this side, on this safeguarding question, is something of this kind: "I am not arguing; I am telling you." The reason that the President of the Board of Trade is not prepared to argue, is because he cannot defend these duties by argument on their merits. The Committee is well aware that the President of the Board of Trade is himself a Protectionist, and he would like to defend these duties on the ground of protection. He cannot do that, however, and the reason is not solely because of the Prime Minister's pledge, but because he knows quite well—probably better than I do—that, if he were to defend these taxes on Protectionist grounds, he would make an additional rift in his party and widen the one which had already developed. But apart from that, why does he not defend this tax as a safeguarding tax? The reason for that is that that also is impossible, because, by all the tests which the White Paper relating to safeguarding imposes, this particular duty on pottery has failed. That is why, on the last occasion, we had the President of the Board of Trade, instead of defending the new taxes on their merits, coming to us and saying something of this kind: "Have we not done all that we are required to do under the Prime Minister's pledge? We have set up a committee, the committee have come to a decision, and now the House has just got to swallow the decision of the committee." I have slightly paraphrased his words, and have used the words "swallowed a decision of the committee," but I think that is amply justified by the facts.

The committee reported on 8th April. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared his intention of putting on these taxes in the Budget of 11th April. The only chance that the House or the committee could have had of discussing them was during that week, and, as a matter of fact, they were not discussed until 28th April, and they had already come into force on the 18th. There were only 11 days between the report of the committee and the date on which these duties actually came into operation. Therefore, I think I was right in saying that the position taken up by the President of the Board of Trade is that, if a committee issue a report, then both the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House must be expected to swallow the findings of that committee, and come to a decision in their favour without any real separate investigation or consideration of the question. The President of the Board of Trade says, "If you do not like that procedure, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to scrap it and have the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in consultation with myself, putting on any duties which we think desirable."

I have already pointed out the reasons which, I think, prevent the Government and the President of the Board of Trade taking that course. The fact is that the procedure of the White Paper contemplates something totally different from what the President of the Board of Trade would have us believe. The procedure there indicated is to the effect that any application for one of these duties must pass certain tests, and that is not satisfied if you merely have a majority of 21 of a specially appointed committee taking that view. It will only satisfy the required tests if, by competent authorities, a decision of the committee is reviewed and accepted after all the facts have been taken into account. That is particularly true with regard to this question of pottery.

[Mr. Pethick-Lawrence.]

Anyone who has gone in detail into the evidence brought before that committee, and has read the report, cannot fail to observe that, as a matter of fact, the findings were entirely contrary to the evidence. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fulfilled his duty, and allowed a little time to elapse between the report and coming to the decision, and also allowed the House time to examine the facts, they would come to the view which I have already given. But when the subject was before the House on the Report of the Money Resolution, we on this side went in great detail into the way in which these duties conflict with the test imposed by the White Paper.

So far as I am concerned, I have no intention of repeating the details which I and other Members, both above and below the Gangway, gave on that occasion. I propose to confine myself to two main points. The first point is this, that the articles which these duties propose to tax are not, in the main, in competition with the articles which it is hoped thereby to protect. They are in competition with different articles, the manufacturers of which do not ask for protection at all. The articles which it is suggested that these duties are imposed to protect, are broadly summed up in what is known as Longton china. If the Committee goes into the facts with regard to the sale of Longton china at the present time, they will discover that, since the War, the producers of Longton china have chosen to make of their industry a luxury trade. While the cost of labour in that trade has gone up about 80 per cent., and while many of the raw materials have gone up by about the same extent, and all except one of them have gone up by less than 100 per cent., the prices charged to the consumers of Longton china are, according to the manufacturers' own admission, not less than 125 per cent. above pre-War. Those who have gone into it will agree that, in many cases, they are much more than that, and are 150, 175 and even 200 per cent. above pre-War.

It stands to reason that people in these days are not prepared to pay twice or three times what they were asked to pay before the War, when they can obtain other articles which for their purposes are just as good, and which they can obtain at a very much lower rate. These cheaper articles come in from abroad in the form of felspar china and are manufactured at home in the form of earthenware. People can obtain articles of felspar china or earthenware for something like one-third the price they are expected to pay for Longton china. It has been alleged by those who defend this duty that the reason why these articles of bone china, Longton china, are so much dearer than articles of felspar china, on which it is proposed to put the duty, is that the wages paid abroad are much lower than the wages paid here. I believe that was the ground on which the majority of the Committee came to their findings; but the wages question has little or nothing to do with the discrepancy in prices. The articles of Longton china are so immeasurably dearer than articles of felspar china that even if you were to wipe off the whole of that part of the production of this home article which is due to wages, you would not bring the price down to anything like the price of the foreign imported article. On that point, I will quote the remarks made by the counsel against this duty, at the examination. He said:

"If you take the cheapest factory making bone china in Longton, of which we have heard anything, and if every individual in it, from the managing director down to the youngest operative, including the commercial travellers, worked free and for nothing, the cost of bone china"— that is, Longton china—would still be greater and in some cases twice as dear as the cost of a similar article in felspar china made in Germany."

I would remind the Committee that that statement was upheld by the Chairman of the Committee, who ultimately agreed to the imposition of the duty. He said:

"Taking the figures given to us for Canada, and working them out in one's head, I think that that is so."

Therefore, as a matter of fact this pretence that the duty is being imposed upon foreign imported china in order to countervail the difference in wages is exploded, because even if the British workers worked for no wages they still would not be able to compete with this foreign-imported article. The real competition is not between the felspar china which comes from abroad and the Longton china manufactured in this country, but between the felspar china which comes from abroad and the earthenware which is manufactured in this country, and the important fact has to be realised that the earthenware manufacturers in this country did not ask for protection and did not appear before the Committee. I do not know exactly the reason for taking that view, but I can only suppose that they thought that protection in respect of the importation of felspar china would injure the earthenware manufacturers' trade either by injuring the home market or by injuring their chance of getting trade by exports.

We who oppose this duty have nothing to say against the excellence of the Longton china. We realise that Longton china consists of some of the most beautifully manufactured china in the world, and that it rightly holds a very honoured place, but if it is to be produced in anything like the way as at present it is bound to have a limited market. It is open to the manufacturers themselves to decide whether they will cater solely for the market of the rich or whether they will cater for the market of the rich and the middle classes. The policy which they have adopted by forming a ring and keeping up prices has had the effect of restricting their own market. That is not our business. If they choose to take that course they are entitled to do so, but they are not entitled to make that an excuse for interfering with the table necessities of the working people of this country. That brings me to my second point, and that is, the repressive character of the duty which it is now proposed to impose. The position in regard to this duty is that the larger the cup the greater is the tax, and not merely the greater in proportion to its actual value. This tax is put on weight. The cups, saucers and table-ware generally used by the working classes are thicker and heavier than the better material; therefore the people who use these articles have to pay a duty which is not merely greater ad valorem, but actually greater per piece than the duty on the better material. In fact, on the cups and saucers and plates that are bought, say, by the labourers in this country the duty works out at something from 70 to 100 per cent., whereas on the thin and beautiful china of the best quality it gets down to below 10 per cent., and I believe I am right in saying that it gets down to as low as 2 or 3 per cent.

It is only by adding together the article worth several pounds, which is taxed two or three per cent., with thousands of articles of the cheap kind which are taxed 70 to 100 per cent., that the figure of 28 shillings per cwt. is said to average 33½ per cent. There is a great danger in taking averages in this way. I am reminded of the story of a man who went to dine at an inn and was given what the innkeeper told him was rabbit pie. When he came to eat the pie he found in it parts that did not belong to a rabbit, and he came to the conclusion that he had been put off partly with horse pie instead of rabbit pie. He went to the innkeeper afterwards and complained. The innkeeper admitted that there had been horse in the pie as well as rabbit, but he added: "Never mind, at any rate it is horse and rabbit pie fifty-fifty." "What do you mean by fifty-fifty?" asked the man. "One horse and one rabbit" replied the innkeeper. That illustrates the danger of averages. It is said that the 28 shillings per cent. duty is really the equivalent of 30 per cent. ad valorem for practical purposes, but so far as the working people of this country are concerned, and they will have to pay the great bulk of this tax, that is a pure snare and delusion. As a matter of fact, they are being asked to pay 50, 60 or 70 per cent. on the kind of materials which they actually have to use, and it is only by introducing the lower percentages on the high value articles that the average can be brought down.

What are the effects that are likely to arise from this taxation? It will have practically no effect upon the industries in Longton. I do not believe that there are any grounds for thinking that this taxation will beneficially affect the Longton manufacturers. What will be the effect upon the consumers? It will add to the tax on sugar, a tax on the sugar basin. It will add to the tax on tea a tax on the teapot. The other day, the Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the tax on motor tyres on the ground of symmetry. I suppose, on that principle, this duty will be defended on the ground that it makes the breakfast table taxes symmetrical; because it taxes the crockery materials on the table as well as the food which is eaten from them. The effect will be that the poorer classes will buy fewer of these articles. When a cup is chipped they will continue to use it, and when a plate is cracked it will have to remain part of the household utensils. This taxation will involve maintaining a chipped cup and a cracked plate. That will not only be bad for the people who have to eat from these utensils but it will be bad—this will appeal to hon. Members opposite—for trade. If goods are cheap and when they get a little injured they can be replaced without much cost, people will go on buying. That is largely the cause of the prosperity in the United States. People can buy cheaply and usually they more quickly discard things which are a little worn out and buy new ones. This policy of taxing the imports of cheap crockery will have the effect of raising the price of these simple household utensils and will make people buy less, and because it will make people buy less it will be bad for the earthenware trade of this country. That, no doubt, is one of the reasons why the earthenware manufacturers did not appear before the committee and ask for the duty.

[Mr. Pehick-Lawrence.]

I ask the Committee to accept this Amendment because I do not believe this duty will bring prosperity to the china trade at Longton but rather that it will bolster up that industry in making their trade a luxury trade, because it will bring added hardship to the working people of this country, and because it is a tax which increases with the poverty of the people who have to buy. That being so, we on this side will vote for the Amendment to limit the evil effects of the proposed taxation.

Sir ROBERT HAMILTON: The more one considers this proposed taxation the less justification one can see for it. There are various points from which the tax can be criticised, but I propose to confine my remarks more particularly to the way in which the tax is imposed. It is suggested that the tax should be imposed on weight. When that is worked out, it is perfectly obvious that the result is something quite different from that which the Committee intended. The Committee said that they intended to impose a tax of about 33½ per cent., but in practice we find that in applying their manner of taxation by weight the tax goes up to anything from 40, 50, 60, 70 to 100 per cent., and that in proportion as the articles become cheaper. The more expensive article bears less of the tax, while the cheaper article bears the higher proportion of the tax.

I should like to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he intends to attempt to justify the imposition of the tax in this manner. Is he going to argue that this manner of imposing the duty does, in fact, result in a duty of 33½ per cent? I ask the right hon. Gentleman does this method of imposing the duty work out in practice in the way in which the Committee suggested it would work out?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister): I will deal with that point in my reply.

Sir R. HAMILTON: We shall be very pleased to hear the arguments of the President of the Board of Trade, because in all the figures supplied by anyone connected with the trade it is obvious that this is not the case. The most conservative figures, taken over a large area, show that it will be a duty of 60 per cent. rather than 33½ per cent., and, if it be intended that the duty should work out at merely 33½ per cent., the method of imposing the duty should be modified. It does seem to me most extraordinary that, when it is desired to put on a protective tax of this character, it should be put on according to the weight of the goods, especially when we are dealing with a class of goods like china and when we know that the highest quality of finished article is the lightest and that it is obvious that the duty must fall with a very heavy weight on the cheap article. Therefore, the imposition of this duty will put a heavy burden on the poorest class of the community. You cannot get away from it that the highly-finished article bought as a luxury in Bond Street pays an infinitesimal tax, while the cheap jug, the cheap mug and the cheap cup will bear a heavy tax running to 50, 60 and 70 per cent. I really think this is one of the most extraordinary examples of all the extraordinary examples we have had in this White Paper, and the Board of Trade have given us no justification for imposing the duty according to this method. There is no justification to be found for an arrangement according to which the cheapest article bears the heaviest burden of taxation, and it cannot be too widely known that this is not a 33½ per cent. duty. It is infinitely more than 33½ per cent. I ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is intended to impose a heavier duty than the Committee recommended. The Committee recommended a 33½ per cent. duty, but, as I say, it will work out at infinitely more than 33½ per cent. if the duty is imposed on the weight of the article. It will work out at twice or three times as much as the Committee themselves recommend.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The case against this Clause is founded upon two grounds. The first which was advanced by the hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) was that it does not comply with the conditions of the White Paper. He said that, having detailed the arguments on a former occasion, he did not propose to repeat them. But as he has made that general charge I want to reply generally to the charge, because I equally replied at some length on the last occasion on which we discussed this Clause. The conditions of the safeguarding procedure laid down in the White Paper have been complied with by the Committee. No one will deny that the industry is one of substantial importance—it employs 7,200 people. The imports of pottery have grown rapidly during the last six years and now exceed the average for pre-War years. The imported article is sold at prices at which it is not possible to produce similar articles in this country, and the Committee found that the wages paid in Germany and Czechoslovakia are lower than in this country. The second ground on which the case against this Clause is founded is that the imports of china are not excessive. The Committee showed in their Report that imports were excessive at the time of their Report, and they have since increased. On the last occasion, we had a most interesting demonstration by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris) who produced a series of plates and cups, and I myself was also armed with a similar battery, and I defied any Member of this Committee to distinguish between felspar and bone china. There is a different process employed in the manufacture of these two kinds of china, and there is a difference in the component materials, but it is not that kind of scientific analysis which determines people when things are similar in appearance when they see them on the shop counter to purchase one or the other. The ordinary purchaser is content to buy what pleases him—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being present—

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: That is the real test of competition which any practical person will apply. [HON. MEMBER: "That is no reason why poor people should be taxed!"] I am dealing with the point raised by the minor Opposition. I now come to the charge made by the hon. Member for West Leicester with regard to the question of the volume of imports. Now there, the case is plain. Production in the home industry has been going down, and it would have been still lower were it not for the preference given to it in certain Empire countries which enabled us to do a trade which otherwise we would have been handicapped in doing. According to page 9 of the Report of the Committee, the home production of Longton china was in 1913, 1920 and 1921 considerably higher than it is at the present time. The estimated net imports of chinaware averaged 300,342 cwts. from 1909-1913. In 1913, the imports amounted to 341,511 cwts. The imports decreased in the years 1920 to 1925, but in 1926 they amounted to 365,131 cwts. I will bring the figures more up to date. The importation in the earlier months of this year showed, again, a progressive increase. It was 39,000 cwts. in January, 33,000 in February, 46,000 in March and 49,000 in April. Then it dropped owing to the duty.

Sir R. HAMILTON: Does that include earthenware?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: No. It follows the same classification that is adopted in the table owing to the difficulty of separating china from earthenware. The figures I am giving now are strictly comparable with the table set out on page 9. Therefore, when you come to the volume of competition, you will find that the imports are progressively greater while the home production is diminishing. That is one of the cardinal facts you must consider in regard to the White Paper in considering whether the conditions of the Committee are being carried out. On that, I think there is no dispute. The wages in Germany and Czechoslovakia are very much lower than the wages in this country. They are set out in page 14 of the Report. The average rates of wages for men and women employed in the china section of the industry in this country are about £3 9s. 9d. and £1 12s. 9d. per week, respectively, for a full 47-hour week. The average hourly rates are 1s. 5⁸/₁₂d. for men and 8³/₆d. for women. It was asserted by the applicants that the wages in Germany for skilled men were between 8¹/₂d. per hour in the case of time-workers and 10d. per hour for piece-workers. In Czechoslovakia the wages are lower still. Wages in both of these countries are about 50 per cent. of the cost, but the hon. Member says that because some of the raw material is cheaper abroad than in this country it is still more difficult for this country to compete with them. That is an argument to which I cannot for a moment assent, because if you really consider that the standard of wages is lower in the competing countries than here it makes the case for a duty stronger and not weaker. I should have thought, therefore, that the case was abundantly made out in the White Paper. Another construction which has been advanced upon the White Paper is whether you are likely to cause injury to any other industry in this country. It has been sometimes debated at length in this House that the finished article is more properly subject to duty than a partly manufactured article connected with some other industry. Now here is an article which is a finished one and cannot enter into any other industry unless you say that it is the raw material of a hotel keeper so far as he keeps table ware on his table.

I submit that on all these grounds there is a clear case made out in favour of this industry, and I am glad to say that even though the duty has been in operation a short time only, so far from it being clear that no help can be expected from the duty by the industry, I understand that manufacturers are getting inquiries of a kind which they have not experienced for years past. Then it is said you ought not to impose a duty because there was a ring in this industry. The allegation is very easy to make, but this happens to be an industry in which employers and workers are most closely related and have a general industrial council in which every difficulty is treated in common and thrashed out in common. But the charge of a ring was made to the Committee and that Committee said:

"We are aware that there is some agreement among the English bone-china makers which includes the fixing of minimum selling prices, but owing to the numerous graduations of quality and the large sale of 'Seconds,' it is clear that nothing in the nature of 'ring' prices exist."

I prefer the considered judgment to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I submit on these grounds there is a complete answer to the complaint that a case has not been made out under the White Paper. I say that the case for the duty is made out under the whole of the White Paper and I am sure—I have said this before and I adhere to it—it is wholly unreasonable to strain the meaning of the White Paper against the imposition of the duty. If the right hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) would consider the matter impartially, the one charge he simply cannot make against the Government is that they do not impose strict conditions. These conditions are a very stiff interpretation of the Prime Minister's pledge. If the stringent conditions of the White Paper are satisfied, we plainly are guilty of a gross breach of the Prime Minister's pledge if we refrain from inviting the House to impose the duty. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton) dealt with another ground. He said, "I accept what has been said by the other speakers as to reasons why you should not impose a duty." Then he said, "You are going to impose a duty of 28s. a cwt., and you ought to impose the duty which the Committee recommended." The Committee did recommend a duty of 28s. a cwt. The Committee says:

"We have consequently considered the possibility of a specific duty and have come to the conclusion that the duty of 28s. per cwt. would be approximately equal to an ad valorem duty of 33½ per cent. on the main classes of pottery to which the application relates."

The hon. Member said that as between the two duties that they would prefer to have a specific duty rather than an ad valorem duty which might press hardly upon grades of china in which competition was not severe. The Government were meeting the convenience of the importers by this duty. This hon. Gentleman says a specific duty is wrong, and that you must not put on this particular specific duty because it works out too high. Any specific duty that is imposed must in some cases be below and in some cases above, but I have carefully examined the matter, and about as good an example as I can take of what this duty in fact does is the example of a sample produced by the London Chamber of Commerce. It was a 975 cwt. consignment. It was a sample produced by a gentleman who was a principal witness on behalf of the opponents. He claimed that the comparison which has been given has been a comparison of duty on the works' costs of some foreign firm. But the 33½ per cent. duty will not be levied upon the figure equal to the cost at the foreign works. The ad valorem duty will be levied as at home on the c.i.f. value of the cost which of course has a figure of some thing like one-third on the works cost. As a matter of fact, taking that particular sample which was produced, we found that it worked out on the average that the c.i.f. value would be £3,981 on 975 cwt., and for a duty of 28s. a cwt. it would be £1,365, which was just a little over 34 per cent. on the c.i.f. value. That is a pretty good test. In another case which was taken, one finds that with cups and saucers where prices varied from 4s. 2d. to 5s. 3d. per dozen with 28s. a cwt. it worked out at 1s. 6d. a dozen, and the duty would range from 36 per cent. on cups and saucers at 4s. 2d. a dozen to 28 per cent. on cups and saucers at 5s. 4½d. a dozen. Those are pretty good general test cases, but there was one case raised on the last occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley (Sir J. Simon), who produced a specific example of a plate of a tea-set from Woolworths, and said this would be a perfectly enormous duty and that it would work out at exactly 50 per cent. The particular set he quoted was to cost 3s. 11½d. each. This is a specific case. I do not pretend to trace the cost of the set, but I am told that whatever may be the price at which Woolworths are buying, there is a plate sold by them at 9s. to-day so that whatever the rate of duty on the cost price, it works out instead of 50 per cent. least than 18 per cent. If that is the best kind of case that can be made out against this duty, I do not think it is a very substantial case, and therefore I ask the Committee to stand by the proposal that the duty of 28s. a cwt. should be taken as a fair and reasonable equivalent of the duty of 33½ per cent. on the c.i.f. value. If you had a duty which is at once a specific duty and an ad valorem duty, and you now charge the one and now the other, that would involve the Customs in difficulties over mixed consignments in order to decide on which the duty should be paid. That would make matters worse.

Mr. SNOWDEN: The right hon. Gentleman is always interesting and his innocence is rather captivating as is also his simplicity. I have never listened to a right hon. Gentleman whose speeches were always so wholly packed with fallacies. I am wondering whether he has convinced himself of the truth and accuracy of the arguments he puts forward. He is trying to justify this duty on the ground that the recommendation of the Committee justifies it on each of the five heads of the White Paper. He claimed that nothing could be fairer than the conditions laid down by the Government for this Committee's investigations. We are not now complaining about the terms of the White Paper; we are complaining that the terms of the White Paper and the Terms of Reference of the Committee were wholly ignored by the Committee itself. We are, therefore, not bound to accept the recommendations of the Committee or its views. I am not aware of a case—there

5.0 p.m. may be a case, but I am not aware of it—where a Committee has recommended the imposition of a duty, and the Board of Trade has not accepted the recommendation. But the circumstances in which this Committee submitted its Report, the recommendations of which were accepted by the Board of Trade and incorporated in this year's Finance Bill, constitute little less than a scandal. A day or two after this Report had been published, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget speech that he was proposing to include the recommendations in the Finance Bill. I will do the Chancellor of the Exchequer the justice to say that he made that announcement in his most contemptuous manner. He made no comment on it, except by the scornful tone of his words. He simply announced that this duty would be imposed. In fact, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) pointed out, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has never been here, heard either by word of mouth or by his presence, to support this Resolution, but he has left the case to the President of the Board of Trade, and that gives further support to the impression we have, which is derived from the manner of the announcement by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the imposition of these duties. They are, of course, purely protectionist in their action.

[Mr. Snowden.]

The President of the Board of Trade went through the five heads of the Terms of Reference to the Committee which are embodied in the White Paper, and tried to prove that this duty had been justified under each of those five headings. I am not prepared to dispute the statement, and it is a matter of no relevance to this duty, that this industry is one of substantial importance. Of course the word "substantial" is very vague and indefinite, but we will not waste time in discussing that first point. Then we get to the second point, as to whether this duty was justified on the ground that there had been an increase in imports of a competitive character. I listened to the President of the Board of Trade when he was attempting to go through that part of the Committee's recommendations. Nothing could be plainer than the fact that there has been no increase in imports of a competitive character. The President of the Board of Trade called attention to some figures which appear, I think, on page 9 of the Committee's Report.

I do not know if members of the Committee have got the Report of that Committee in their hands, but if they have they will see that the figures there laid down are figures giving the imports of chinaware from 1909 to 1926, and that from 1909, with one single exception—the year 1926—there has been a progressive decline in the imports of chinaware. In 1909 to 1913 the average net imports of chinaware are stated to be 30,626 cwts., and those figures then drop—the War figures, when the circumstances were quite abnormal are excluded—to a figure of 20,000 odd in 1920, then 10,000 odd in 1921, 10,000 odd in 1922, 11,000 odd in 1923, 10,000 odd in 1924, and 5,000 odd in 1925. "Ah, but," says the President of the Board of Trade, "look at the figures for 1926." Yes, the figures for 1926 are 109,000 odd cwt. But it might interest the Committee to remember that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has always warned the House of Commons not to accept these figures at their face value, because the year 1926 was an abnormal year.

The explanation, of course, is that, after 10 years of progressive decline in imports, and of a progressive decline in the severity of foreign competition, there was an increase of imports in 1926, because the importers of foreign manufactured goods knew that this duty was intended. The Committee had been set up and they knew the constitution of this Committee. They knew the scandalous composition of this Committee. They knew that, like nearly every other previous Committee, that Committee had been packed by the President of the Board of Trade, by two out-and-out pronounced, rabid, and violent Protectionists, and that, whatever the facts might have been, everybody knew what the recommendations of the Committee would be. Therefore, importers took advantage of the interval between that time and the coming into force of this duty, to rush into this country as many goods as possible. That is the explanation of the rise last year. If it had not been for the appointment of this Committee by the President of the Board of Trade, it is perfectly certain from the evidence and from the experience that we have seen for the last 10 years, that the imports last year would have shown a further decline. Therefore, the case under that heading is not made out. There has been no abnormal increase, of the imports of a competitive kind. On the contrary, there has been an annual decline. That is supported not only by figures but by the evidence of the only business man upon this Committee, a man who is fully acquainted with the industry, and who says in his report:

"I am not satisfied, however, that translucent table-ware is being imported into this country in abnormal quantities."

"Although there may not have been an abnormal increase in the import of translucent china," the President of the Board of Trade says, "there has been an increase in the import of the competitive article which serve the same purpose." The right hon. Gentleman is wrong there, if he looks at his own figures. Take the table on page 9. There you have the heading, "Estimated net Imports of Chinaware included in Earthenware." In 1913 the figure was 311,583 cwts. In 1922 that had fallen to 190,678. In 1925 it was 287,476. Last year included the large supplies of exceptional imports of chinaware. The table says, under the heading, "Net Imports of Chinaware," that in 1926 the net imports of chinaware were 109,370 cwts. The net imports of chinaware, including earthenware—

Sir P. J. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The table says, "included in earthenware."

Mr. SNOWDEN: I do not understand the right hon. Gentleman's interruption.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: It is common ground, as everybody has known for a long time, that there have been a great many imports of what was really china, but the figures of which were included in the return as earthenware.

Mr. SNOWDEN: That is not material to my point at all. Figures are my case, and not any explanation of the President of the Board of Trade. Here are the figures—in 1913, 311,000 cwts., and in 1926, 255,000 cwts. Certainly those figures do not justify the claim that there has been an increase in imports in recent years, but, on the contrary, they show that there has been a constant decline. Therefore, under that heading the case for this duty has not been proved.

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to deal with wages. It is, of course, quite impossible to make accurate deductions if you take only the rates of wages in one country, and compare those rates with the rates of wages in another country. If you are going to get at the real facts you must take a great many other factors into consideration, such as the general standard of living in a country. There may be a country where what seems a low wage compared with the wage in this country really represents a high wage on account of the different standard of living, and there may be a country where an apparent high wage really represents a low wage, compared with the wage in this country. The Committee, on this point, do not appear to be very certain as to whether there is much difference in the wages as between this country and the countries which compete with us in this market, but they do state one very important and pertinent fact, and that is given on page 11, about the middle of this Report. We are dealing here really with the matter of the cost of production, and methods of manufacture are most important in this connection. Here is one of the most significant sentences in the Committee's Report. It is to be found about the middle of page 11, and it reads as follows:

"They stated, by way of example, that in Czechoslovakia one skilled workman with thirteen assistants could turn out by means of automatic machinery 4,800 pieces per day as against about 360 in this country made by one man by ordinary hand methods."

There we have the fact—4,800 pieces a day compared with 360 in this country made by one man. It is not a question of wages. You cannot possibly take away the competitive advantage of a country which has adopted that method of production.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has done the arithmetic?

Mr. SNOWDEN: I leave it to the Tariff Reformers to do the arithmetic. There is a sentence somewhere else in the Committee's Report; it is to be found in paragraph 35. It gives the wages in the china section of the industry, then the wages in Germany and I think in Czecho-Slovakia, but it does not say that the wages in Germany are wages for the same class of work as the wages given in the china section in this country. We may assume that the wages in the china section, which is the highest class of pottery industry, are higher than the general rate of wages in the pottery trade. The Committee, as I have said, have gone altogether outside their terms of reference. They were to consider the question of the imposition of an import duty on tableware of translucent pottery, but they did not confine their investigations to that nor did they confine their recommendations to that. Without warrant, and without application from this particular section of the trade, they went out of their way to recommend an import duty on a class of pottery which they were never asked to consider.

[Mr. Snowden.]

There is one other important matter in this Report. The President of the Board of Trade is very anxious, indeed, to conform strictly to the terms of the White Paper, and the White Paper says that there must be an application from the industry. What is the industry? According to the President of the Board of Trade the industry is the employing section of the industry. What was the main justification put forward by the Government for this procedure? It was the question of employment. These Safeguarding Duties were to be imposed in order to increase the volume of employment in the particular industry. That is a matter in which the operatives are deeply interested. But they were not a party to this inquiry or to the application for this duty. The right hon. Gentleman said that the relations between the employers and workmen in the pottery trade were very intimate, and if the state of the industry was such as to need a protective duty, and a high protective duty, why were not the operatives a party to this application? It is very significant that there is no reference in their Report to the fact that the operatives were not a party to the application.

Brigadier-General Sir HENRY CROFT: They were not opposed to it.

Mr. SNOWDEN: They were not a party to it. If they had been anxious to see such a duty imposed in their interests, for an improvement of their wages, they certainly would have been a party to the application. Just a word on another matter which was dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman in his concluding remarks. He attempted to deal with the case against a specific duty put forward by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Sir R. Hamilton) and I do not think there was even an hon. Member opposite who considered that the President had made any reply to that case. I have had some figures supplied to me. The President says he has had some figures supplied to him. I believe the figures which have been supplied to me are quite as accurate as those which have been supplied to the right hon. Gentleman. They give the price of a consignment of cups and saucers. The President took the number of crates as the basis, and I will do the same. This was a shipment of 13 crates of cups and saucers, weighing 2 tons 7 cwt. 3 qrs., and the value was £87 10s. 6d. The duty charged upon that consignment was £66 17s. Hon. Members opposite are good at arithmetic and, as it is one of my weak points, I will leave it to them to work out the percentage of the duty in that case.

Lieut.-Colonel LAMBERT WARD: Can the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that the invoice was correct?

Mr. SNOWDEN: I am quite ready to accept these figures as being as correct as the figures given to the President of the Board of Trade, and which went unchallenged by the hon. and gallant Member. A duty of £66 17s. on a consignment of the value of £87 10s. 6d. is not a duty of 33½ per cent., but a duty of somewhere between 60 and 70 per cent.; and the applicants never asked for such a duty at all. Therefore, in two respects the Committee's recommendations have gone beyond what they were asked to do, and what the trade itself asked them to do. They have given them an average protective duty nearly double the figure for which they asked, and they have also given a high protective duty which a large part of the industry neither asked nor expected. The President of the Board of Trade, without a single exception, has accepted all the recommendations of this Committee, even when those recommendations were carried by a majority of only one vote.

I protest, as we protested at the time when the White Paper was before the House of Commons, against a question of national policy, which is a matter of acute division between political parties, being determined by one outside person. As a matter of fact, this question has been decided by Lady Askwith, and by nobody else. During the whole of the Committee's deliberations she was obviously a biased and prejudiced party. This recommendation was carried by one vote only, and, therefore, if you set off the vote of the chairman against that of Mr. Hayhurst you have only Lady Askwith left. Therefore, this Report is the Report of Lady Askwith, and the House of Commons this afternoon is not being asked to approve proposals of the Board of Trade or of the Government but to say that in fiscal matters, in trade matters, it is under the dictatorship of Lady Askwith.

Sir H. CROFT: The speech of the right hon. Gentleman has been very interesting, but I must at the outset take exception to his remarks concerning a member of the Committee—Lady Askwith. I have been associated with Lady Askwith for a good many years in connection with other questions, and I am quite safe in telling the right hon. Gentleman that Lady Askwith, who is a descendant of Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, has been a Free Trader all her life, and until a few years ago she used to look very sadly at me when I advanced any of my fiscal arguments. For the right hon. Gentleman, without any knowledge, to say that this lady is biased is not quite fair, and I hope he will withdraw his insinuations.

Mr. HARRIS: Is she is Free Trader now?

Sir H. CROFT: She has sat on two or three Committees hearing evidence and she may not be a Free Trader now. That is very likely. The right hon. Gentleman says that all these questions are decided by one vote. May I remind him that there are only three members on the Committee, and that after all it is not Lady Askwith who decides these questions but Parliament, although the Liberal party, judging from the state of the Liberal Benches, does not seem to take much interest in this matter.

Mr. ERNEST BROWN: Look behind you!

Sir H. CROFT: But I have always regarded this as the one remaining rag left to the Liberal party, and I am surprised that they show such little interest in it. I think it is only fair to consider the opinions of the third member of the Committee. It shows the impartiality of the President of the Board of Trade. This gentleman—Mr. Hayhurst—represents the co-operative movement, and is not a business man in the sense of being a producer. He is a commercial agent for the co-operative institution.

Mr. SNOWDEN: Mr. Hayhurst is a director of one of the largest distributing organisations in this country, an organisation which, I believe, is responsible for a trade between £150,000,000 and £200,000,000 a year. He is also a director of a pottery, and a very successful pottery.

Sir H. CROFT: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is quite accurate in saying that Mr. Hayhurst is a director of one of the largest distributing businesses in this country, and I am interested to hear that he is a director of a pottery. I can only regret that he only went to see one pottery, a co-operative pottery, and that he did not visit others. The right hon. Gentleman in making his case endeavoured to prove that there was no considerable increase in the imports of pottery into this country, and he said that the large increase of last year was only due to the fact that people abroad were getting nervous as to the possibility of an import duty being imposed and therefore increased their imports. Does he apply that same argument to British production? It has steadily fallen in the last 15 years, and it is inconceivable you can consider the case without putting the two facts together. May I be allowed to give the right hon. Gentleman the total value of the imports in those industries in 1924 in 1925 and in 1926. In 1924 the round figures were £8,500,000. In 1925 they had risen to £9,840,000 and in 1926 to £11,297,000. The right hon. Gentleman's greatest desire, I am sure, is to see our people employed. Does he not think that these increases are staggering, when we take account of the fact that our home production at the same time has decreased as is shown in the table in the White Paper?

[Sir H. Croft.]

The right hon. Gentleman tried to make a point in regard to wages, and he said that we must consider other matters as well. He went into a calculation which, I think, showed conclusively that the British worker is more efficient than his foreign competitors. There is, therefore, all the more reason that, with such efficiency, we should not permit him to be undersold by those who are working at a wage level like that referred to in the White Paper. The hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence) made a very interesting speech, but I hope he realises that his own constituents at the present time are very anxious. In the industry with which his constituency is principally concerned there is a demand from employers and employed. Both, I think, are approaching him with a view to some help being given in the matter of hosiery. When he told us that the working classes pay the whole duty on these imported goods, I think he was wrong. I have never been one of those who contend that any kind of protection is going to reduce the price of the article. I do not think that follows, though I also think that it is possible, with the greater security of the duty and a reduction of overhead charges by mass production, to produce an article which is cheaper. That has happened in some industries which have been protected under the McKenna Duties or the Safeguarding of Industries Act. But when the hon. Gentleman deliberately says that the working classes will pay the whole duty, he is going contrary to the experience which we have had in connection with every single duty imposed in this country.

It is a pity that fears such as this should be raised, because they have been proved false in every other case. The hon. Member might have been justified in saying that part of this duty may ultimately be borne by the consumer, but he was stretching his advocacy a little when he suggested that the whole of the duty would be paid in that way. In practically every case of articles protected by the present Government under these Measures, the price has not been increased to the working classes. The hon. Member then went on to say that this duty was going to be bad for the trade. I think he will admit that if it were bad for the trade those who are principally involved financially in the industry would not have asked for this security.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: What I said was that it is going to be bad for the earthenware trade and that the members of that trade were not parties to this application.

Sir H. CROFT: I am rather at a loss to see how it can be bad for the earthenware trade unless the protected trade is so successful that, in fact, the duty will do what the hon. Gentleman has told us it will not do, namely, reduce the price so as to compete with earthenware. The curious thing is that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) spoke on behalf of the workers just now. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Clowes) or some of the other Socialist representatives from the pottery districts are not here to say that the workers in the industry are opposed to the duty. That would carry more conviction. All I can say is that the fact that an hon. Member opposite sought to count out the Committee seems to show there is not any very considerable interest against these proposals on the benches opposite, and perhaps that explains why so many members of the party opposite have gone down to the country to play bowls this afternoon. The hon. Member for West Leicester also referred to the wages question, and I think on that point he must find himself in conflict with the majority of his party. He will not deny that the differences in wage values between the pottery industry in this country and Czechoslovakia or Germany are considerable. I think I am right in saying that our lowest wages are higher than the highest in Czechoslovakia.

If that be anything like the case, have we not arrived at the situation contemplated by the official Opposition when they laid down the policy—which has never been repudiated—that if goods were being imported into this country produced on lower wages or longer hours than those prevailing in this country, then they were in favour not merely of a tariff but of prohibition? How is it that the hon. Member goes counter to this view, endorsed, as it was, by over 1,000,000 of a card vote at the Trade Union Conference this year? He deliberately says that British workers ought to be subjected to the competition of a wage level which, if imposed in this country, would be regarded as sweating by every hon. Member opposite. There was an interesting Debate two days ago on the question of matches, and an hon. Gentleman who speaks for the co-operative movement in this House boasted that the co-operative movement were buying thousands of gross of matches from Finland. It surprised many of us that he should have been so bold, and his answer to us was that, while they bought these matches from Finland, they were selling, in return, a large number of bicycles and boots and shoes and other articles to the people of Finland.

I presume the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley would use the same argument in regard to pottery. We on this side say that not only has a case been made out for the pottery trade in this matter, but that the argument to which I have just referred can no longer hold water in these Debates, for this reason. A large number of people in the pottery trade have been out of work for a considerable time. If you give them employment they will be able to buy the bicycles and the boots and shoes which you may now be selling in exchange for imported pottery. That argument has not been realised by the party opposite. As long as we have 1,000,000 unemployed in this country, are we not wise to do everything in our power to see that our own people are employed, especially when we know that they are only on the streets because they are competing with something which is as near to being a sweated product as anything which the party opposite ever denounced in the past? I hope there will be no doubt about this duty. I hope hon. Members opposite will not go to a Division. I believe that deep down in their hearts they see that the policy which considers only the merchant is a selfish policy and that our bounden duty, if we are to regain our national prosperity, is to see after our national production.

Mr. RILEY: I desire to emphasise the objection to this duty, first, on the ground put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden), namely, that the Committee is now being invited to embark upon a development of national policy, on the strength of a report, in circumstances which are perfectly scandalous. I should like to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there was any meeting of the committee of inquiry to consider their report after the closing of the evidence, and, if so, how many persons were present at that meeting. We now know as a matter of public information that the committee, consisting of three persons, closed the taking of evidence on 15th February, and that one member of the committee, within a few hours, left this country for South America. The evidence was closed on 15th February and the report was signed on 23rd March. Only five weeks or thereabouts elapsed between the closing of the evidence on which the report had to be made to the Ministry, and the signing of the report. The member who, within a few hours of the closing of the evidence, went to South America, presumably could not possibly return in time to take part in the meeting, to assist in coming to a judicial decision and to sign the report.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I have never interfered with the conduct of the proceedings of the committee in the least or inquired as to when it was sitting. That was an undertaking which I gave to the House, and I have strictly kept it. I have not the least idea of how many meetings the committee may have held, but I have known many instances where a Judge, after hearing evidence, has immediately proceeded to give judgment.

Mr. RILEY: This is not the case of a Judge dealing with evidence but the case of three members of a committee appointed to hold an inquiry. Their duty was—after all the evidence had been submitted—to weigh up that evidence. A Judge may make up his mind in the course of the evidence and then decide, but their duty was, the evidence having been given, to weigh it up and in the light of all that evidence to come to a decision, agreed or otherwise. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley has said, this policy is being based on the decision of one person. There were only three persons in all, one of whom, after the collection of the evidence, left the country. The report had to be issued by the other two who presumably met together to consider it. We now know that of those two, one was entirely opposed to the recommendations. He issued a minority report and in several paragraphs he says that in his opinion the evidence submitted did not justify the applicants in seeking the order. We are told by the President of the Board of Trade that the Committee found that the main ground on which safeguarding should be granted was the abnormal increase in imports during recent years. What are the facts of the case? The President called attention to page 9 of the Report, where a table of imports of pottery is given, and he stressed the point that for the years 1909 to 1913 the average weight of imports was 300,342 cwts., and in 1926 it was 365,000 cwts. On the face of it, that is a very considerable rise. But let us take not simply one year, 1926, but take the years 1913 to 1926, or take the average of the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 and 1926. What we find then is that the average for these last years is only 224,000 cwts. per annum.

[Mr. Riley.]

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: If you are very ill, does the doctor judge of your temperature by the average of the last week, or at the time when he is examining you?

Mr. RILEY: The hon. Member can put that argument in the course of his speech. I was calling the attention of the Committee to this table which shows that from 1909 to 1913 the average imports were 300,342 cwts. In the year 1913 it was 341,000 cwts. If we take the average for the period from 1920 down to 1926 we find the average is 224,000, which is less than the average in the period for 1909 to 1913. Therefore, as Mr. Hayhurst, a member of the Committee said, the 1925 imports were less than those in 1913. On those figures I submit that the claim that a substantial duty is justified by an enormous increase in imports is not supported by the facts of the case. But I have an objection to this duty apart from the grounds upon which this recommendation is made, which I regard as inadequate grounds and grounds which have been arrived at in a manner not very creditable to the present Ministry in its conduct of these inquiries. I object to it on account of its niggling and petty character. In his Budget speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that he expected to get out of this duty on pottery £150,000 in the present year and, possibly, £200,000 in a full year subsequently. To disturb this trade and the price of these articles of everyday household use for a paltry £150,000 a year is not a sound policy, and is an unworthy method of trying to raise revenue when there are millions of pounds to be found elsewhere which could be tapped without those who would be liable to pay feeling the burden in the least.

As in so many other cases, this duty is being applied in such a way that it will fall on the backs of those least able to bear it. It has not been disputed that the duty will be lowest on the most expensive pottery and glassware and highest on the cheapest kinds of pottery. Take as an example what are called half thick tea-sets, in cases of 35 dozens. Here is an actual instance of a consignment weighing 2 cwt. 3 qrs. 12 lbs., invoiced at £4 2s. 8d. without the duty. The duty on that amounts to £4 0s. 4d.; that is a duty of 97½ per cent. on common cottage ware tea-sets. That means that a single article which on import is priced, say, 1s. without the duty, is raised in price practically to 2s. by the incidence of the duty. The users of that pottery have not only to pay the actual sum by which the duty increases the price of the article, but an extra sum in respect of the several profits which are made on the goods between the time they leave the importer and reach the retail buyer. Let us assume that there is a profit of 50 per cent. made between the importer and the retailer. The purchasers of this class of pottery, who are the poorest people, have to pay not only the duty of 100 per cent., but an additional 50 per cent. representing these profits. Not only is the duty passed on to the consumer, but he has to pay for the increased capital expenditure on the part of the traders who are handling these goods. From every point of view the incidence of this tax will be unjust.

Mr. REMER: Two points have emerged from this Debate which I think call for some protest, not merely from the party point of view but from the point of view of the whole House of Commons. I refer first to the criticisms upon the impartiality of the various committees, and in particular of this committee, which has given this decision as to a duty on pottery. If every committee appointed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is to be subjected to this kind of attack in the House of Commons, it will be impossible for him to secure men to serve upon these committees. It would be just as unreasonable for me to criticise my right hon. Friend about the far larger number of committees which have given decisions against the imposition of a duty, and condemn him for having appointed convinced Free Traders to serve on those committees. The second point which has emerged from the Debate is the statement by the right hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) that there was no demand for this duty from the industry itself. While this committee was sitting the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Clowes) made a reference in the "Staffordshire Sentinel" to a speech I had delivered in my own constituency. In that letter, which was extensively quoted in the proceedings of the committee, he made it quite clear that they of the society representing pottery workers were not either for or against a duty, but were entirely neutral in this matter. To say, therefore, that they are not parties to the duty does not mean that they are against it.

It is noteworthy, as my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bournemouth (Sir H. Croft) has already pointed out, that not a single Member for the Potteries is present this evening while this duty is under discussion. There are four Members representing the Potteries, three of them Labour Members. One of them, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Lieut.-Colonel John Ward) is, I believe—so he has told me—in favour of the duty. We all regret the reason for his absence. I think the whole Committee know that he is only absent on account of ill-health. It would be interesting to know why the Pottery Members, if they are so violently opposed to this duty, are not in their places to state their reasons in Debate. Some rather curious arguments have been put forward in the previous Debates on this duty. During the consideration of the Budget Resolution, the right hon. Member for Spen Valley (Sir J. Simon) condemned this duty at great length, calling it a cruel tax upon the working people of this country. His argument was based on the statement that the price of pottery would be increased to the very poorest in the land. I have been in consultation with a very large number of people in the pottery industry, as was my duty, seeing that I represent a constituency adjacent to that great industrial area, and they tell me that in the circumstances prevailing at the moment no manufacturer would raise his prices one penny above what he was charging before this duty was imposed.

Mr. RILEY: Will the hon. Member say who he expects will pay the duty?

Mr. REMER: I was coming to that in a moment. I can give the hon. Member a quite conclusive answer to his question. What were the conditions of the pottery industry prior to the imposition of this duty? The industry was working only three or four days a week. If a manufacturer can work full time the proportion of his standing charges, rent, rates and taxes, which are imposed whether he is working full time or short time, is reduced to such an extent that he can sell his goods at a lower price and make a profit, whereas when he was working short time he was making a loss even at the higher price. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley (Sir J. Simon), on the Budget Resolution, stated that he had studied the short-

6.0 p.m. hand notes at the inquiry dealing with this matter, and, therefore, he must know that it was stated quite clearly at the inquiry what a terrible amount of unemployment there was in the Potteries before this duty was imposed. It amounted to as much as 16 per cent., and, if the right hon. Gentleman has, as we know he has, sympathy for those people who are suffering, surely he should have sympathy for these people, one in five of whom are out of work totally—not temporarily—while the remainder are only working three or four days a week. The sum total of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman and of hon. Gentlemen opposite is to condemn these pottery workers permanently to their present condition—16 per cent. totally unemployed, and the balance working short time; and I would submit that it is poor comfort to these people, who have no money in their pockets, for the right hon. Gentleman or hon. Gentlemen opposite to tell them that, if they oppose this duty, they will have cheap pottery.

[Mr. Remer.]

England has been the natural home of the pottery industry. China clay—ball clay and china stone—is produced to the greatest extent in the world in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, and we export these commodities, not only to Germany, but to America, Spain, Portugal, and, indeed, practically all over the world. It may be asked why the pottery industry is stationed in Staffordshire, such a long way from where these commodities, which are so necessary for the production of china, are found. There is a very good reason, namely, that Staffordshire coal is the most suitable for making pottery, so that Staffordshire is the natural home of the most efficient production of pottery. In that area there are people who have been in the business for generations. The industry is unique in the world, and the manufacturers and workpeople in Staffordshire are admitted by everyone to be the most skilled potters in the world. It may be asked why, if this be correct, they are beaten in their own market. The answer is quite a simple one. It is that in Germany the wages are 33½ per cent. lower than in this country, and in Czechoslovakia they are 50 per cent. lower. Here was this industry, one of the finest skilled industries in this country, slowly bleeding to death, and the people who are supposed to protect Labour in this country come here and condemn the one means by which the industry can be restored.

I want to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) on the Budget Resolution. He told us that the remedy for the pottery industry was that the English manufacturers should start to manufacture felspar china. I do not know where he got his information from, or what was the basis of his knowledge of this industry, but it is rather surprising, if that be the remedy, that no Continental manufacturer of felspar china has attempted to manufacture it in this country before. There would be a great saving in carriage, there would be a closer liaison between the manufacturer and his customer, there would be many advantages for him if he came here and set up his works. If the hon. Member's arguments were right, one would suppose that Continental manufacturers would have done that. The reason why they have not done it is that the cost of labour in this country is twice what it is in Czechoslovakia, and the cost of erecting works here is twice what it is in that country. It will be very interesting to see if the Czechoslovakian manufacturers will now erect potteries as a result of the duty.

A further argument used by the hon. Member, when he was speaking on the Budget Resolution, was that the earthenware manufacturers had not applied for a duty upon earthenware. There was a very good reason why the earthenware manufacturers, in November of last year, did not make an application, namely, that at that time no earthenware of any kind was being imported into this country; but in November of last year, for the first time in 45 years, earthenware was offered for sale in this country, and I am informed that it is now being freely offered in this country by Continental manufacturers. Possibly, therefore, the earthenware manufacturers may look at this subject at the present time in a rather different light. I am quite satisfied that this duty is going to provide full employment and better wages for the workers in this industry, and I cannot understand the attitude of the Socialist party in condemning the one means of raising the standard of life of those workers—of raising their wages and bettering their conditions. I hope that in all the pottery districts it will be shown conclusively to the working people there that the party which represents them in the House of Commons has done everything it could to grind down those workers to a state of unemployment.

Mr. HARRIS: From this discussion very few people would think we were dealing with the Finance Bill, that is to say, a Bill to provide the necessary revenue for carrying on the country and raising taxation, because the question of taxation has been peculiarly absent from the discussion. This Bill is a Bill to impose taxes and raise revenue, but, under the new regime, our Finance Bill has been diverted from what has been its object for many years, and the discussions upon it are degenerating into a controversy in favour of Protection. Speeches have been made by hon. Members opposite—and I make no complaint of it—which would apply with equal reason to any manufactured article imported from abroad, or to bacon, bread, meat, butter, and every other import of any article produced in this country. I cannot help thinking that it is rather hard on the farmers, who used to look upon the Tories as their friends. They have been badly deserted. They have to pay more for everything they buy—cups, saucers, cutlery, and so on. The only purpose of this tax is to raise prices. The ground of this particular proposal is that manufacturers in the Potteries find that they cannot produce china as cheaply as manufacturers in Germany and Czechoslovakia, and they say, as was said by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer), that that is because of the labour costs. Whatever may be the cause, the contention is that they cannot sell at the present price because it means selling at a loss, and the admitted purpose of this duty is to remove foreign competition, so that the consumer, who, after all, is a more important person than the trader and the merchant—the trader and the merchant are of very small account; it is the user, the person who has to buy the articles, the housewife, the working-class family, the person who has to spend the money—will have to pay more for these items.

Sir H. CROFT: Can the hon. Member say where they have to pay more—in what particular industry?

Mr. HARRIS: They pay more in the shops when they buy across the counter. As an instance, I may mention that my hon. Friend the Member for North Lambeth (Mr. Briant) has been organising a camp, and he wanted to buy some mugs. He searched all London in his endeavour to buy drinking mugs for his camp. I do not suppose that the hon. and gallant Gentleman ever used anything so vulgar as a drinking mug. Probably my hon. Friend will be abused at every street corner by our Tariff Reform friends, but he wanted to buy these cheap china mugs. They are not obtainable any more. The tariff is having its effect. The market is there, but my hon. Friend has had to get a substitute. Now you cannot buy an English substitute—it is not available; and my hon. Friend has to buy cheap enamelled iron mugs imported from abroad. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman will say that a cheap mug of that kind is quite good enough for working-class children, but it is not so pleasant to use for a cup of tea, and, of course, it is a poor substitute for the china mug. That is a good example of what is going on all over the country as a result of this tax.

Mr. GREENE: Can the hon. Member say why gloves have gone down in price since they have been protected?

Mr. HARRIS: We are discussing mugs at the moment, not gloves.

Mr. GREENE: The hon. Gentleman knows more about mugs than I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN: You can always tell them when you see them.

Mr. HARRIS: I hope the Debate will not be allowed to degenerate into personal abuse.

Mr. GREENE: I was not referring to the hon. Member when I referred to mugs.

Mr. HARRIS: As a matter of fact, the cheap gloves of the ordinary working woman are more expensive and are far more difficult to get. I agree as regards the kid gloves of Bond Street. They were already very expensive, and it means that the rich woman can still buy them, but the working-class woman in the East End of London cannot buy expensive Westbury or Yeovil gloves in Bond Street; she has to put up with cheap cotton gloves.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I heard the hon. Member say he was discussing pottery.

Mr. HARRIS: So I was, but I was interrupted by the hon. Gentleman opposite, and I thought that perhaps you might have protected me, so that I might concentrate on my subject.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member so effectively corrected the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Greene) that I thought it unnecessary that I should do so.

Mr. HARRIS: The real reason why there is depression in the china industry, where there is undoubtedly short time and unemployment, is the high prices at which the articles are offered. The prices of china have gone up to three times the pre-War prices, and that has meant that at present prices these articles are quite out of reach of the ordinary user of crockery and china-ware. The result has been that, although there is depression in the manufacture of china, immense strides have been made in the substitute manufacture of earthenware, because earthenware has gone up only 75 per cent. as opposed to treble the price in the case of china. The very same amount of labour has been employed in the production of the earthenware as of the china. They are under very much the same trade unions, and have the same rates. The earthenware manufacturer having adapted himself to new methods and to the requirements of the market, and the public having the money to spend on china, they have been able to extend their plant, increase their production, improve their design, and meet the demands of the public. As far as one can see, the price is so enormously different from the foreign article, produced by better methods, with different materials, and by an entirely different process, that the English bone china cannot be called a really serious competitor with the felspar china produced under mass production and by new methods. You might as well compare the production of a Rolls-Royce car with a Ford as compare the manufacture of high quality china in Staffordshire, made under old-fashioned methods, and bone china with felspar china manufactured abroad under new methods and mass production with all that that involves.

When you come to the labour costs, it is doubtful whether you can really say there is justification under the machinery of the Safeguarding of Industries for imposing this duty. I find the labour cost of an equivalent tea set in earthenware works out at 1s. 8d., with the same trade union rates and conditions, as compared with 5s. 11d. for bone china; felspar china, which is very little different from earthenware, works out at 1s. 5d., a little less, but the fact remains that under the duties now proposed the real assistance will be given to the manufacturer of earthenware, who did not ask for a duty, who had no inquiry made into his case, who has never been asked to put forward evidence, and has not been subject to cross-examination. They will be freed from competition and will be able to get the advantage of a protected market. It is a curious fact, which has to be borne in mind, that many of the people who control the manufacture of china are also controlling the production of earthenware. Perhaps they knew the weakness of their case in asking for protection for earthenware and preferred to keep in the background and allow their case to be fought by the organisation representing the production of translucent china.

One thing we might ask is that the President of the Board of Trade might very well consider the exclusion of vitrified pottery. I understand already in many cases the Customs officials are not including many articles which would not come under the description of vitrified ware, because when you start going into a Customs tariff, it is very difficult to distinguish between this article and that. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that in his speech. He is very proud of the difficulty to the ordinary person of distinguishing between translucent ware and ordinary earthenware. It is only the initiated who can easily distinguish. The Customs House officials are already very worried and troubled to decide under which particular category the import comes. On the whole I understand many articles have already been excluded by taxation which are generally described as vitrified pottery, and I think it would be reasonable, when we come to the detailed Amendments, that this particular article should be excepted.

May I refer to the method of levying the duty. This plan of levying duty by weight is novel. Some of the interested parties thought it would be more convenient and would lead to less disturbance in the trade not to unpack the cases and value each article separately but to lump them together and charge the duty on the weight. In order to save trouble, the Committee came to the conclusion that that was the simplest plan. No inquiry was held and witnesses were not cross-examined. We do not know on whose advice it was, but the Commissioners came to the conclusion that 25s. a cwt. was a reasonable interpretation of the request for a 33½ per cent. duty. Since then the various trade interests have had time to inquire. They had gone to great trouble and given the right hon. Gentleman many examples. I believe most of the figures have been placed before his officials. I know he is a very busy man, and spends a good deal of his time upstairs, trying to get protection for films and various other matters. No doubt he did not have time to consider all the evidence before him, but it is a very peculiar thing that he has brought down to the Committee one example that is favourable to his case that this duty is a fair one. He took goods imported from Czechoslovakia, which are of a finer character and decorated, and, therefore, their value is higher compared with their weight. He ignored the fact that, generally speaking, the familiar china tea-set, the modern article used in every working-class home, is heavy, coarse, and not decorated, and its principal qualification is its cheapness. There is evidence to show that in most of these cheap tea-sets, which make up the bulk of the imports, the duty works out not at 33½ per cent. but at 70 per cent., 80 per cent., 90 per cent. and 100 per cent.

If the right hon. Gentleman desires to be just and fair, not to the foreign manufacturer but to the general public, especially the working class, he should be prepared to listen to representations to bring the proposed duty more into line with the rate asked for by the applicants and on which evidence was given at the inquiry. I have here examples extending over three or four months. Here is a case of 5,537 cwt., which at 28s. works out at £7,753, on goods invoiced at £11,108. I shall be pleased to hand the figures over. They have been placed before the Board of Trade and an unanswerable case has been made out for lowering the rate of duty, if you are not going to take advantage of this occasion to put something like a penal tax on an article of general use by the working class, who are already overburdened and suffering from high prices in many articles of general use, and I think the Minister ought to be prepared to consider it when we reach the Amendment in my name. The people of London have a specially strong case against this duty. There are 7,000,000 people living on open ports. Here is the Government, under the excuse of safeguarding machinery, giving protection to this industry in one part of this country and another industry in another, seriously interfering with the trade of London, whose very existence depends on open ports. This duty is going to divert trade from London to the mainland, and throw out a large number of workers employed as workers, carmen, packers, and, not least, seamen. For that reason only, I as a London Member would not hesitate to vote against this duty. It is against the weight of evidence. It singles out one trade for special favour, and is going to make an article of general use to the public very much more expensive.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I have listened with interest to the hon. Member's speech. He made a number of assertions which he did not support with any particular evidence. In conclusion he asked us to consider the situation of London, one of the constituencies of which he represents. London has a far lower level of unemployment than any other great industrial centre, perhaps only a third of that which prevails in North Staffordshire. The hon. Member should not be quite so narrow and selfish as he appears to be.

Mr. HARRIS: There are 7,000,000 people in London.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I quite agree that there are 7,000,000 people in London, but I am talking about percentages. The ratio of unemployment is about a third of that prevailing in North Staffordshire. I should imagine a man with his noble principles would have some consideration for other people. Then he says it is a novel thing that there should be a duty by weight. For many years he supported a Liberal Government that taxed tea and sugar by weight. There is nothing novel in duties by weight. He has only to examine any tariff in any country and he will find large numbers of specific duties, and in pre-War days, when he used to make speeches in opposition to Protection, I am certain he used to turn out the same kind of, shall we say stuff, that those who hold his views turn out, and say you could not possibly have ad valorem duties. It was so difficult to determine. It was always urged that these duties must be specific, and that was one of the attacks made on Mr. Chamberlain, because he rather tended to advocate ad valorem duties. So when we present them with what they want, they do not like it.

[Mr. Williams.]

Then the hon. Member attacked the efficiency of British producers, but he gave no evidence. I suppose he wanted to support what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) had said, when he drew our attention to page 11. He said, "Here we have 4,800 pieces a day turned out in Czechoslovakia, against 360 in this country made by one man by ordinary methods. But in Czechoslovakia there was one skilled workman with 13 assistants doing the job. The right hon. Gentleman declined to do the little sum in arithmetic, and left it to the Tariff Reformers. He did not want to do it, because it would expose the folly of his argument. The average per person in Czechoslovakia was 343, and the primitive, incompetent, unscientific Englishman, whom he is so happy in denouncing, does 360 in a day.

Mr. RILEY: It is one skilled person with 13 assistants.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I have always heard the hon. Member stand up for the bottom dog, the unskilled labourer. He has to live, and he lives out of his production. The single man, with 13 assistants, does less than one man in this country. I want to raise the standard of living of the people. I can only raise the standard of living by raising the efficiency of their production. If a man turns out 343 instead of 360, that would be his standard of living. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Riley), who has just interrupted me, has asked us to consider, not the imports during 1926, but to take the average of the last five or six years. If you take the average of the last five or six years, he said, the imports are not abnormal. But they did not make the application until the imports became abnormal. They are asking us to deal with the existing situation. It would be no satisfaction to the people in his constituency who are out of work now if you pointed out to them the average imports relating to some time past when they were in work. What they want is a job now, and we are trying to get them a job now by imposing this duty.

We have had some depressing examples of how a specific duty may result in a very high ad valorem rate. Taking the whole of the pottery imported this year, roughly 95,000 cwts. valued at just over £313,000, or an average of 66s. a cwt., a duty of 28s. does work out to rather less than the figure mentioned, but only to 42 per cent. It is no use coming along with some isolated cases and attempting to prove your case with an example which has been supplied no doubt by some foreign importer who is rather distressed because he is going to lose his trade, which will pass to the British producer. Mr. Hayhurst, who did not agree with the duty, pointed out that there was one pottery where they were making reasonable profits, though even in that case the organisation of the factory was not all that could be desired. I am told that the particular factory was a co-operative factory. I am told that it is the most inefficient factory in the district and yet it made reasonable profits. [An Hon. Member: "Why put on the duty then?"] It made reasonable profits for this reason. I imagine that it has a guaranteed market, the guaranteed market being its own proprietors. In order to maintain its success, no doubt, they bought the products at appropriate prices which produced a profit. That is not very conclusive evidence of the state of the industry.

Will this duty give more employment to my own fellow countrypeople? I think it will. I think an analogy of the existing duties shows conclusively that it will. You may take the analogy of a trade, one section of which is safeguarded, and the other section of which is not—the hosiery trade. The greater part of hosiery is made of wool or cotton, but there is a very large amount of hosiery made of silk or artificial silk. What has happened since the hosiery which is made of silk or artificial silk has been protected? The importation of this kind of hosiery has rapidly diminished, while the importation of hosiery made of cotton or wool has rapidly increased. When we come to exportation, the exportation of artificial silk and silk hosiery has increased, while the exportation of woollen and cotton hosiery has diminished, proving conclusively that you have raised the efficiency of that branch of the hosiery industry.

Mr. HARRIS: Not at all. You are using silk hosiery instead of woollen and cotton hosiery.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Surely, any Member of Parliament who, as part of his duties, attends a great many social functions in his constituency of the jazz variety, must have observed that the introduction of artificial silk on the nether limbs of the opposite sex took place long before the Silk Duties were imposed.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not considering the Silk Duties but the Pottery Duties.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I apologise. I did not wish to go beyond the analogy, but the interruption led me rather further than I intended to go. With regard to the question of prices, why should it be alleged that this burden is going to be cast upon the poor? Is there any justification, as far as we have experimented in this matter, for saying that the burden has been cast upon the poor? Broadly speaking, can any hon. Member opposite point to any new duty which has, in fact, made any serious addition to the price of any commodity? [An Hon. MEMBER: "Gas mantles!"] I hope I am not going to be stopped again, for I am only going to draw attention to an answer to a question in the House of Commons two days ago as regards gas mantles.

Mr. HARRIS: I stick to my facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Precisely, and the statement is true but entirely misleading. An hon. Member drew attention to one type of gas mantle sold at a certain price and another gas mantle which is a very much superior article and is sold at a higher price. He was merely misleading, because he read it in the newspapers like the rest of us, and did not investigate the matter. If he will take the official information based upon the inquiries as to the price at which they were sold last year, he will find that the wholesale price went up by a shilling a gross and that the retail price, broadly speaking, was not affected. I take the analogy of the one selected by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS: It is not true.

Mr. WILLIAMS: It is true. Go into the shops and compare quality with quality. Eighty-five per cent. of the gas mantles sold in this country last year were sold at an average price of only one shilling a gross higher than the average price which prevailed previously. That is the analogy. I do not care what commodity you may take—there may be odd exceptions—the price has not risen. As the result of increased efficiency in a guaranteed market, prices have fallen. It is no use getting up and constantly asserting, as you have done for the past three generations, that the sole effect of a duty is to raise prices, when you have innumerable cases destroying the theoretical basis of your argument. We do not want generalisations based on the past, but concrete examples based on our present experiences.

Mr. BARNES: Listening to these Debates on the Safeguarding of Industries, it appears to me that the only time that the Conservative party, or the Members of this party, and particularly the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer) and the Member for Bournemouth (Sir H. Croft), have a good word to say for the British working man is in a Tariff Reform Debate, when he becomes the most skilled workman in the world, and during a war, when he becomes the most patriotic worker in the world. But when the British working man is actually unemployed, whether it is of because of Free Trade or the absence of Tariff Reform, we do not find that sympathy and appreciation as to the value of the British working man displayed in the the policy of the party of the hon. Members opposite.

Sir H. CROFT: May I ask the hon. Gentleman if he has ever heard me make any speech or remark decrying the British working classes, who are so unfortunately led in this Debate?

Mr. REMER: Has the hon. Gentleman ever heard a speech from me decrying the British working man?

Mr. BARNES: I can quote something which is more effective than speeches—the votes of the hon. Members on occasion after occasion.

The CHAIRMAN: I think that the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. H. Williams) was going rather wide of the subject, but the hon. Gentleman is going a great deal beyond the scope of the Resolution for vitrified pottery.

Mr. BARNES: During the Debate the skill and the emotions of the workers have been referred to with regard to the state of unemployment in particular industries, and the hon. Member for Macclesfield in particular, addressed the Members on this side of the Committee as if we have no sympathy for the unemployed working man. As a matter of fact we have the utmost sympathy for any unemployed worker, because the majority of us on this side of the Committee at some time or other during our working career have experienced the difficulties of unemployment. Therefore, we do not wish to be reminded by persons, who, possibly, have never known the difficulty of getting a job in order to obtain a meal, of the reaction of Free Trade and Tariff Reform on the people of this country. As a matter of fact, I do not stand here as a fanatical Free Trader. I do not consider that the principle of Free Trade by itself can solve the difficulties and the problems of unemployment in this country, but I seriously state and with equal emphasis, that I do not consider the principle of safeguarding or of Tariff Reform will provide any additional employment for the workers of this country, or in any way ease the difficulties they have to meet. I do so because of this fact. I entirely agree that you can take a specific industry or trade and by artificial stimulus increase, possibly, the amount of employment in that trade. We have seen it in regard to the sugar-beet industry. We have seen it in other industries.

If you are prepared to administer artificial aid to an industry, of course you can produce favourable conditions. The principles on which the Safeguarding proposals are being introduced in this country are vicious and bad in practice, and must inevitably lead to corruption of political administration through the avenues of trade. It does not matter whether the President of the Board of Trade is a fanatical Tariff Reformer or not, he can always appoint committees of three who will give him the decision he wants. Does any hon.

Member opposite wish to assert that if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley had the responsibility of appointing committees of three he could not appoint committees that would give him a majority decision in favour of Free Trade. Any Member of this House knows very well that the system of appointing three persons to decide a question of fiscal policy in its relation to any particular trade or industry in this country is fundamentally wrong and that it must lay itself open to the charge of corruption for the purposes of serving vested interests.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Sir Burton Chadwick): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that on the committees appointed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade 50 per cent. of them have recommended against a duty?

Mr. BARNES: I am not at all surprised at that, because, as a matter of fact, in this country the bulk of our trade is based upon such a principle that it is impossible, in view of the fact that the working costs depend upon the importation of raw materials and things of that sort, to get applications through, even if you packed the committees entirely with tariff reformers. But it is a significant thing that it is the secondary trades that are beginning to get through under the principle of the Safeguarding of Industries Act. However much you may play with figures, you cannot avoid the fact that eventually the additional artificial costs of these industries are bound to find their way ultimately to the purchaser. I said once before in these discussions that the Conservative party and the people of this country must make up their minds what they are going to do, either we are going to sacrifice entirely the primary industries of this country upon which we built our wealth and upon which the secondary industries in the long run depend for their trade—I am speaking of coal, cotton, shipbuilding, engineering, iron and steel—

The CHAIRMAN: This is most suitable for a Second Reading Debate. If the hon. Member continues in this way there may be no end to the matter.

Mr. BARNES: I was led into that general statement by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, who pointed out that 50 per cent. of the inquiries under this Act had failed, and I was endeavouring to find out where they had failed.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not take exception to that being replied to, but I thought the hon. Member was suggesting there was an unconscious bias in these committees. That would be a fair point to take, but to go over the whole question cannot be done.

Mr. BARNES: I was endeavouring to prove that in the secondary trades the bias came out in administration, but when you come to another range of industries in this country it was impossible to get them through because of bias. However, I do not want to emphasise that if I am out of order. I should like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. H. Williams) when he stated that, as far as the position of Mr. Hayhurst is concerned, his connection with the pottery owned by the Co-operative Wholesale Society no doubt biased him.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BARNES: At any rate, the hon. Member has referred to a guaranteed market which the Co-operative Wholesale Society had. As a matter of fact, may I point out to him that a Co-operative Wholesale Society factory has no more guaranteed market than any other factory in this country? Each retail co-operative society has perfect freedom to buy their goods wherever they like. As a matter of fact, if the Co-operative Wholesale Society production were to move above the current manufacturing prices for these articles, the buyers for the retail society who have to hold their trade, the trade of their members, against the general competitive prices, would be compelled to go past the Co-operative Wholesale Society for the purpose of buying their commodities. As a matter of fact, that happens time after time. If the hon. Member would familiarise himself with co-operative buying a little more, he would find repeatedly in the Co-operative Wholesale Society complaints of the absence of loyalty on the part of the retail buyers. You do not find the co-operative system perfect all along the line, any more than any other industrial organisation, and its weakness develops in administration, but you will find that that is put right by the economic reaction of prices.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: How is it that this inefficient factory is able to make a reasonable profit when less efficient factories are not?

Mr. BARNES: It shows that the operation of the ring is effective.

Mr. WILLIAMS indicated dissent.

Mr. BARNES: The hon. Member disagrees with that, but I assert that prices are affected in this industry by a great decision between the manufacturers as to the prices they charge. If one doubts that, will the hon. Member try to explain how it is that in this bone china before the War you could get an ordinary set for 3s. or 4s. and this has jumped to 13s. 11d.? It is absurd to argue that the manufacturing costs have moved in that direction, because the bulk of the factories and plant were erected and in operation before the War. Wages have not moved to anything like that extent, so that no one can argue that is the reason for that. With regard to the question of prices, again I should like to assert that this duty has been passed on to the consumer, and I want to prove it by quoting a particular set I have in front of me. Take the ordinary set purchased before the War at 3s. 3d. and sold for 4s. 11d. That set moved to 5s. 5d. prior to the imposition of this duty, but to-day if you wish to buy that particular tea-set—just an ordinary set in common use in working-class homes—you would have to pay 6s. 11d. to be sold at 9s. 6d. I agree, if I might refer to artificial silk for a passing moment, that where you have a newly-developed industry, as the total output increases prices are naturally falling, and I agree that for a period the imposition of taxation of this sort can be hidden; but when you come to a well-established industry of this sort, where the production and the volume of production are not materially affecting prices, I state without any hesitation that at the present moment, whatever may happen ultimately, this duty which has been imposed has passed to the consumer, and is being passed to the consumer. But that is not all. One of the reasons why I—although I do not stand here merely as an automatic and fanatical Free Trader—oppose any imposition of tariffs or safeguarding in this country is, that ultimately it leads to a more intense exploitation of the consumer, and a more intense exploitation of the producer.

[Mr. Barnes.]

In the first place, if you impose a duty, it does not matter whether it is levied from the point of view of raising taxation as such or for the purpose of keeping out goods that are imported. Eventually it must go into price, and if it goes into price and the retailer or manufacturer has to collect that tax for the Government, it means that ultimately he must have more capital in his business, because the rise in the goods that he purchases necessitates a greater outlay on his part. What happens in respect to that? Every industry, broadly and roughly speaking, has to provide its own additional capital. How does it provide that? By enlarging and widening the margin between the cost of production and what the consumer pays. That is the only way by which industry ultimately provides the additional capital that is necessary either through inflation or an artificial system of increasing prices by tariffs. Take that one set I have mentioned. I wish to illustrate the general argument by that one set. Before the War it was purchased for 3s. 3d. and sold for 4s. 11d. The gross profit was 1s. 8d., representing 34 per cent on price. Because of this duty that is imposed on that set, and the natural rise in prices because of inflation, the price of that 3s. 3d. set comes to 6s. 11d. Obviously, every person who is engaged in that industry must roughly double his capital to stock the same range of goods as he did before the War, and I say without any hesitation that that additional capital does not come from saving, but from a more intense exploitation of the producer and the consumer from 1914 to 1926.

But that does not end the story, because that article is sold for 9s. 6d. The gross profit of 1s. 8d. on that set in 1913 now jumps to 2s. 7d., an item of 11d. represented in the value of gross profit which, although it is only 27 per cent. to-day as against 34 per cent. in 1913, takes an additional 11d. out of the consumer. This with the 1s. 6d. in tax that I assert this duty represents on that class of tea-set means a total of 2s. 5d.—an artificial price. It is not represented in the cost of labour or in overhead charges or by foreign competition or matters of that sort, but an additional 2s. 5d. is taken out of the productive power of the workmen of the country. When hon. Members opposite get up, and with that kind of emotional appeal to this House and through this House to the electors of this country, say that this system of tariffs is devised for the purpose of putting people into employment in this country, I say there are plenty of ways of putting people into employment in this country. Cut down the vast expenditure on—

The CHAIRMAN: Really, the hon. Member must keep to the point.

Mr. BARNES: I would hesitate to disagree with your ruling. I have sat all through this Debate and I assert without any hesitation that many Members have travelled far wider than I have, and if the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer) and the hon. and gallant Member for Bournemouth (Sir H. Croft) can make a reference in a general way to these problems, I am entitled to. However, I close with the observation I made before, that this system of imposing a tariff through safeguarding an industry of this sort would not benefit either employment or workers in this country, but lead eventually to a widening of the margin between what the workers get in wages and what they have to pay in prices.

Mr. E. BROWN: The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. H. Williams) has alluded to the reference of the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Mr. Harris) to London and said he was selfish and narrow because he said the unemployment rate in London was less than in the Potteries, and the hon. Member for Reading was rebuking the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Riley) for taking an average, and yet he committed the same sin himself. If he will consider the conditions of parts of London which will be mostly hit by this duty, he will find that the rate of unemployment in the areas of those parts of London is much heavier than in the Potteries where this particular industry is situated. It is useless for the hon. Member for Reading to take a selected case like that and leave out the parts which will be most hit by the putting on of a tariff like the tax on pottery.

I want to say one other word. It is about unemployment. We do not believe that the imposition of this duty of 28s. per cwt. on translucent and vitrified pottery will make more employment in the pottery industry which made application for this duty, for I think it is clearly shown in the evidence that a great part of the competition from which the bone china section of the industry has suffered did not come from abroad at all, but came from the manufacturers in the very same area. It did not come from manufacturers abroad paying low wages, but from the same trade paying the same wages in the same joint industrial council in the county of Staffordshire itself. We are against this tax because, first of all, we disagree with taking selected industries and giving them artificial protection on a separate basis, quite apart from the general argument of Free Trade and Protection; and when we get an industry like this which puts up a case, and in the course of putting up the case before the Committee refuses to produce its balance-sheet—it is the first time in any of these inquiries into safeguarding that the applicant has refused—

Mr. REMER: I challenge that statement.

Mr. BROWN: If the hon. Gentleman will read the minutes of evidence, he will find that the opponents' counsel made the statement in the course of the argument and asked for a production of the balance sheets, and they were not produced.

Mr. REMER: And he afterwards apologised.

Mr. BROWN: Well, he is entitled to his opinion, and I am entitled to mine, after reading the evidence. They did not produce the balance sheets. More than that, the evidence shows on the point of employment in the bone china section that there were no figures for that section of the industry to show what the rate of employment was in that particular section. Further, the evidence

7.0 p.m. went to show that when it was a question of foreign competition no proof was given that the sweated rates of wages referred to by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer) had anything to do with the difference in price between felspar china imported from abroad and bone china made in these small factories employing 7,000 people in Staffordshire. Counsel for the opponents actually made not only the statement referred to by the hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence), but a further statement in which he said:

"I will make another assertion. If the Longton manufacturers got their wages and firing and their materials for nothing, their overhead charges would still be more than the whole cost of the felspar china."

I think that is conclusive proof, which was not denied by the applicants in the course of the hearing, that the question of sweated wages does not come into this at all, and, as a matter of fact, the competition is more from the other branch of the trade, which did not associate itself with the application, than from foreign competition.

I do not think the nation as a whole appreciates the range of articles to be affected by the imposition of the tax. If you turn to Appendix A of the Report, the list of articles to be taxed at 28s. in the cwt. is an amazing one. It includes tea sets and component parts thereof; dinner sets and component parts thereof; morning sets; fruit or berry sets; dessert sets; breakfast sets; cups and saucers, all sizes, including cream soup cups, chocolate cups, sherbet cups, custard cups and all kinds of other cups, including egg cups; covered muffins of all sizes; and butter dishes. I think the public outside does not understand how wide is the range of these articles, and I propose to read a few more so that the public may know what is being taxed. The list includes tea-pots, coffee-pots, cocoa-pots, chocolate-pots and covered jugs of all sizes, sweet dishes, bon-bon dishes; oatmeal plates and bowls, and salad bowls—and that will make an appeal to the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Glasgow—nappies, round or square—I do not know what they are, but no doubt other hon. Members will know—sardine boxes, cheese dishes, covered jars, tea infusers, tea-tasting cups, milk or drinking horns, beakers, toast racks, butter pads, dessert dishes, fruit saucers, olive trays, pickle trays, sugar boxes, bread and butter plates; jugs, milk, cream, hot-water and syrup

[Mr. Brown.] of all sizes; ash trays or bowls, grape-fruit bowls, plates of all sizes, including service plates, whether flat or deep, and oyster plates; cress plates, salad plates and asparagus plates, bakers or pie dishes, cruets, powder boxes, egg-stand frames; biscuit jars, and of course the final item of, mugs of all sizes and kinds with one handle or more. I think the time has come when we might very well revive in this country the old art of the lampoon. I was wandering in a museum the other day looking at pottery, and among the articles I found was a spittoon on which was inscribed:

"I will spit on William Pitt."

Obviously political feeling in those days against William Pitt, the great statesman, was so strong that they inscribed a lampoon on their spittoons. I think if this kind of duty is to go on we shall have to inscribe on our spittoons

"I spat on Winston's hat," or something of that kind, so that the people who do not read our Debates will understand all about the ridiculous taxes to which this ridiculous Government and the President of the Board of Trade are subjecting the country. There is one other point about this range of articles. I have here a letter from a firm giving four lines of articles and showing how this tax of 28s. per cwt. will adversely affect the prices. First of all, there are tea-sets. The value of these sets is £10 4s. 2d. and their weight is 418 lbs. A tax of 28s. per cwt. will work out at £5 2s. on that 418 lbs., that is, just 50 per cent. The second line is a line of jugs. Their value is £5 4s. 2d. and their weight 332 lbs., and a tax will work out at £4 3s. 0d., or considerably more than 65 per cent. on the 332 lbs. The third line is a line of cups, the value being £3 6s. 8d. and the weight 242 lbs. The amount of the tax will be £3 0s. 6d., or nearly 100 per cent. on the 242 lbs. The fourth line is a line of cups and saucers—the china used by the poor people referred to by the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green and the hon. Member for West Leicester. This line is valued at £5 4s. 2d., and the weight is 440 lbs. The tax will work out at £5 10s. 0d. This very firm has 250 branches up and down the country, and this will be the result. My hon. Friend the Member for North Lambeth (Mr. Briant) has been accustomed to run a camp for boys of South London in the country, and he has always been able up to this year to give them an earthenware vitrified cup from which to drink. He was able to buy these before this year at 3d., but when he comes to this same firm to buy cups for this year's camp he is told that the price is up above the level at which they were sold before, and he has to content himself with enamel cups instead of china cups. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but it is no laughing matter that a tax of this kind should prevent children living in the slums of London from having the comparative joy of drinking out of these china cups rather than an enamel cup. Those of us who served in the Army know perfectly well that enamel cups are not the best kind of drinking instruments to have.

On these and other grounds this Committee ought to oppose this duty to the very last possible moment. The tax is bad, and the evidence before the Committee, in my judgment, did not justify the imposition of the tax, and especially it did not justify its extension to that part of pottery which was not asked for by the applicants, namely, vitrified pottery, which was not included in the application. I oppose this duty with all my heart.

Commander WILLIAMS: I hope when the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down proceeds to elaborate the speech he has just made in different parts of the country—

Mr. BROWN: Nothing of the kind.

Commander WILLIAMS:—he will not omit to give the information that the originator of the Safeguarding of Industries was the very respectable Leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of the Coalition Government—

Mr. BROWN: I opposed it at the time.

Commander WILLIAMS: That interruption is not very relevant.

Mr. BROWN: It is quite relevant.

Commander WILLIAMS: But everyone knows that in these respects one Liberal never supports another Liberal.

Mr. BROWN: Or one Tory another on the Lords question.

Commander WILLIAMS: My real object in rising was to draw attention to two or three points which have been raised. Both the hon. Gentleman who is now sitting on the front Opposition bench and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer poured out a very considerable amount of abuse on these Committees—though perhaps not as strong as they poured out on the Chancellor of the Exchequer—but they poured out much abuse on the Committees which have had to deal with this matter. These Committees, after all, are doing the public service. They have no means of defending themselves, and I think it is not quite up to the high standard of the House of Commons for hon. Members, and particularly the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, to say that these Committees do not endeavour to do their work fairly, honestly and in the interests of the nation as a whole. I believe that members of all parties, to whatever section they belong, if put on this type of Committee would try to give their decision with the same honourable intention, and I believe the front bench of the Opposition would do if any of them were on these Committees.

To leave that point, I think the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer has advanced a long way this afternoon in the admissions he has made. He made the admission that his position as regards mathematics was not quite so strong as it used to be. That was known to many of us, but he went on from that to say that he left the Tariff Reform League to work out these matters, presumably because of their greater accuracy. I think that that, coming from him, shows the very great value of the very large number of figures on this question of safeguarding which have been brought out by various parties who believe it is essential in the interests of the country that as a whole we should have a measure of safeguarding such as is contained in this particular Clause. I do not wish to take up much of the time of the Committee, but there is a point which was raised in regard to the proceedings of the Committee which inquired into this industry, and which was raised by the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to why the workers in that industry did not take any part in giving evidence before the inquiry. I think it is the very clear and simple reason that, unfortunately, in many places in this country at the present time the workers instead of looking after their industry—or rather the leaders of the workers—are much too engaged in political matters.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. Member is now opening up an entirely new discussion.

Commander WILLIAMS: I had no intention of following that up, but was only replying to the point raised that the workers took no part in this discussion, and to express a wish that in this matter of safeguarding the workers would take a very clear and definite part, because I am convinced in my own mind that this Clause is probably one of the most valuable Clauses in the whole of the Budget and it certainly will have my support.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think the hon. Member would have made the remark he has just dropped if he knew the facts. Unfortunately for his case, it so happens there are few industries in this country where employers and employed are more amicably agreed with one another than in the pottery industry.

Commander WILLIAMS: I quite agree, and that particular point has been made before several times in the course of this afternoon, as the hon. Member would know if he had heard all the Debate. I was replying to the point raised by one of his leaders on the Front Opposition bench that the workers did not take part in this inquiry, and I was saying quite clearly I wished they had taken a part. If it be the case, as the hon. Member opposite says, that the workers and employers are working in absolute harmony in this question, then I congratulate the trade and only wish that was extended further.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am afraid the hon. Member does not get exactly what I mean. The point made was that they were deflected by economic and political considerations, rather than attending to their own particular business. I want to assure the hon. and gallant Member that that is not so in the Potteries. The workers are divided very much upon this question with regard to safeguarding, but I really want to make it clear that the suggestion that they were deflected by other purposes is not true.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Commander WILLIAMS: There is some misunderstanding between us, because as I understand it, the point the hon. Member made was that the workers and employers in this particular industry were working in the closest possible alliance. Then all I say is, I congratulate the whole industry, both sides, on the success of that condition, and no one would wish to make it any different. To come back to the point to which I was referring, I wish to thank the Government for carrying out this Clause because I believe, as coming from the West country from where a very large amount of the material comes, in the shape of china-clay which is worked into this china, the Government are not merely doing something which will help enormously to encourage an industry which employs highly skilled and efficient workers in the Midlands, but which will also do something to encourage the production of raw material in the West country, which needs it very badly at the present time. I thank the Government most sincerely from the point of view of helping the unemployed, and from the point of view of encouraging trade and manufacture and enabling the Britisher to get an article in this country which, under a better scheme of production, there is no earthly reason why it should not be not only equal in quality but not so expensive as the foreign article.

Mr. CRAWFURD: I would not have intervened in this Debate had it not been for the fact that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Remer), by his intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. E. Brown), has repeated an allegation which he made during the discussion on the Report Stage of the Resolution. During these discussions I have made two complaints with regard to the procedure adopted in connection with the safeguarding of industries. I have complained in the first place of the action of the President of the Board of Trade in the appointments he has made to these Committees, and I do not feel in the least abashed by what has been said by the hon. Member for Torquay (Commander Williams). No one on this side of the House will believe that any of these Committees are consciously misrepresenting the evidence they hear. What we say is that people who have a strong bias in one direction, whether they may be members of a Committee or Members of this House, cannot possibly prevent that bias influencing them in the decision they make. The second complaint which I have made, is that this House is supposed to base its judgment upon these duties upon the merits of the case, but we have never been allowed to see the evidence on which the Reports are based. In this particular case, we find that of the three members of the Committee, two took one point of view and one took another view. In other words, the Committee is as divided as it can be about the merits of the question. Even then, this House is not allowed to see the evidence upon which these members have come to their conclusions.

My next point relates to something that has been said by the hon. Member for Macclesfield, and I hope he will take this seriously, because I propose before I have finished to show to him that it is a very serious matter. On the 28th April, 1927, the hon. Member said:

"A further statement was made that the manufacturers who were the applicants in this case refused their balance sheets. That statement is not correct. The statement was made at the last minute by Mr. Comyns Carr, the counsel for the opponents, and the manufacturers made it quite clear that they had never been asked until the last minute to produce their balance sheets."

That was the statement of the hon. Member. He went on to say:

"The Chairman of the Committee stated that Mr. Comyns Carr's statement was most unfair, and Mr. Comyns Carr withdrew the statement in face of what the Chairman had said."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 28th April, 1927; col. 1088, Vol. 205.]

The hon. Member made that statement in this House about someone who is not able to defend himself, because he is not here; a past Member of this House, and a very respected and very able ex-Member of this House. The hon. Member made a statement that a certain thing said by Mr. Comyns Carr was not correct, and that it was contradicted by the manufacturers. Not one of these statements of the hon. Member is true.

Every one of them is entirely untrue, and I am not saying that without producing my evidence. I have the evidence. One of the disadvantages of the procedure which the President of the Board of Trade has thought fit to pursue is that we have to pick up this evidence for ourselves when allegations of this kind are made by hon. Members opposite. One of the members of the Committee, Mr. Hayhurst, in his report says:

"During the course of the inquiry there has been an evident reluctance on the part of the witnesses appearing on behalf of applicants frankly to table certain details in support of the application, and in this connection the failure of witnesses to produce balance sheets for the inspection of the Committee indicates a lack of confidence in the investigating Committee."

That is a statement of a member of the Committee. One of the people whom we are told we must respect. Further reference was made to the question of balance sheets not only at the last minute, and I want the Committee very carefully to take account of this, but on the 5th, 10th, 12th and 13th day of the inquiry. I have taken the trouble to secure a copy of the evidence on the 21st day of the inquiry and I am going to read certain passages. The question was brought up by Mr. Entwistle in regard to evidence about debentures in the Longton industry.

"Mr. Entwistle: There is no evidence about debentures in the Longton industry at all.

Mr. Farraday: How can there be? They are all partnerships.

The Chairman: They are private companies.

Mr. Entwistle: No capital, no balance sheet, no anything has been produced of that kind.

The Chairman: We have had nothing at all.

Mr. Farraday: The answer is that during the time the German mark was depreciating the British pound was appreciating, so that the boot is on the other leg.

The Chairman: I do not see why we should not have had a balance sheet.

Mr. Entwistle: I do not see why we should not have been trusted.

Mr. Farraday: It was not quite a matter of trusting anyone. It is a matter of introducing irrelevant questions.

Mr. Hayhurst: I very well remember you saying that you were not going to show anything to your opponents, but we are not your opponents.

Mr. Farraday: No. You are our best friends.

Mr. Hayhurst: One hopes so, but one likes to be treated as others would treat us."

I now turn to the speech made by Mr. Comyns Carr in introducing the case for the opponents. He said:

"In every inquiry I have taken part in the manufacturers in camera have produced their balance sheets for inspection. We have had no balance sheets here. We have challenged them, we have asked for them, but we have not received them. We cannot, therefore, assume that things are bad with the manufacturers."

The Chairman makes no mention whatever of the fairness or unfairness of that statement.

Mr. REMER: I think the hon. Member is a little unfair to me in bringing forward an accusation about something which happened six weeks ago, without having given me notice that he was going to do so. The Committee is entitled to an explanation. On the night before the Budget Resolutions six very responsible members of the trade met me in one of the Committee Rooms upstairs, and this statement quoted from Mr. Entwistle's remarks were referred to the Committee and it was on their answer to that statement that I made my statement in the House. I am not able to verify it now, because it has only just been sprung upon me, but it was a statement made by six people who were present at the inquiry, and it was made by me in all good faith. All I can say is that I will make inquiries into the matter, and probably deal with it on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. CRAWFORD: I thank the hon. Member for that assurance, but when it comes to a question of my bringing forward a matter without giving him notice, I may say that it was my intention to refer to this matter later this evening and to ask the hon. Member to remain in the House; but he interrupted my hon. Friend the Member for Leith and repeated his accusation. If he says that I have no right to bring forward this matter without giving him notice, he has no right to intervene, when this Committee has no means whatever of judging of the truth of what was said by the responsible or irresponsible people who supplied the information to the hon. Member, particularly when he makes an assertion upon that sort of ground about someone who is not here. This is all of a piece with what we may expect from protective duties in this country. We have always said, and it has been said this afternoon from the Front Opposition Bench, that so surely as you begin to introduce tariffs into the fabric of your finance you will get corruption, and you will get people who are simply there to get all there is to be had.

[Mr. Crawford.]

Sir H. CROFT: On a point of Order. The hon. Member has just said, as an instance of what is going to happen, that this Bill will encourage corruption. May I ask if that is an insinuation against anyone in this House?

Mr. CRAWFURD: No. Certainly not.

Sir H. CROFT: On a point of Order. Can such an insinuation be allowed?

The CHAIRMAN: I was waiting for the hon. Member to finish the sentence. I was not able to catch the drift of it.

Sir H. CROFT: He has already practically called the hon. Member for Macclesfield a liar.

Mr. CRAWFURD: The hon. Member must be very careful. He has made his point of order and that point of order has been ruled on, and I am going to reply to it very directly. Nothing that I have said contains any imputation against any Member of this House. I used the phrase "corruption," and what I mean is that not only hon. Members on the other side of the House but hon. Members on this side will be approached by people who may be interested parties in these Duties or these tariffs. It is inevitable. In every country where you have tariffs you have that kind of corruption, and you are bound to have it.

Mr. MacLAREN: The right hon. Gentleman need not sneer.

Mr. CRAWFURD: If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade is casting any doubts on what I am saying, the best answer that he can make on this occasion and on every other occasion is to let the House see and judge for itself the evidence on which he acts. Until he does that, and until we have that, we on this side say that these duties are being imposed by secret Committees and by methods which are unworthy of the traditions of good finance in this country.

Captain FRASER: Will the hon. Member permit me to ask him a question? He is pleading that the Committees should produce their evidence so that Members of this House may be able to consider it. Does he think that that would facilitate the provisions by manufacturers of the very facts and figures which they must necessarily keep to themselves?

Mr. CRAWFURD: The hon. and gallant Member asks me a perfectly fair question, and my reply is that in the proceedings before these Committees the public are admitted, but some proceedings are taken in camera, and the evidence that is submitted on those occasions is the kind of evidence which manufacturers, in the interests of British industry, do not wish to make public. That protection can still be given. The main evidence on which these conclusions are come to should be put before this House, and unless that is done this House cannot come to a just conclusion.

Mr. MacLAREN: There seems to be some apprehension on the other side as to the righteousness of anyone on this side casting any reflection on the conduct of this inquiry. It was the most comical Committee I ever watched carrying on any business at all. In the Committee there was a lady, there was the Chairman, and Mr. Hayhurst, who seemed to be the only man who held strong and decided views about anything. The Chairman was non-committal, but the lady was very indiscreet very often. If I may be allowed to give an illustration of the qualities of the Committee to make such an inquiry, I think you will find that it will throw some light on the nature of the Committee, and I think the President of the Board of Trade will remember an incident connected with it, about which he was very nervous when I brought the matter up in the House. During the sittings of the Committee a very important matter was raised in connection with the comparison of hours of labour in the different countries. The question was under discussion and much was hinged upon comparative hours of labour in connection with competition. The question was raised by Mr. Faraday, who appears to be the champion of Protection in this country and other countries. He pointed out that in Germany they worked excessive hours of labour compared with the hours in this country, but that these hours were not included in the statutory number of hours as expressed in the State documents. He said these hours were "preparatory" hours of labour. I hope the President of the Board of Trade will listen to this because it has distinct reference to an incident which he will not forget. Mr. Hayhurst asked Mr. Faraday, the champion of the Tariff Reformers, what he meant by "preparatory" hours of labour. Mr. Faraday seemed nonplussed, but suddenly the lady in the Committee, Lady Askwith, sprang upon the Committee a very clearly defined definition of what "preparatory" work meant. She was asked what she meant because she was evidently quoting from a document. She said she had a private document, supplied to her by the President of the Board of Trade. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] I quite agree. Why not? It is interesting to know that private documents were supplied to members of the Committee to meet emergencies of that kind, but when Mr. Entwistle, who was defending the opponents, asked that this document might be submitted to him so as to prepare the case against the evidence, he was told that such a document could not be given to him, and the Chairman then ruled that witnesses had a right to submit evidence from any private document, and might refuse to submit them to the other side.

I raised the question afterwards in this House, and I do not think the President of the Board of Trade will forget that day. He had even to send round notice to the Committee that they must not in future carry on like this again, and also he instructed them that the private document made use of should be submitted to the other side. I congratulate him on having done so. I only give this as an illustration of the capacity of the Committee to make an inquiry. The lady had no right to be there at all. I am not saying that in any ungentlemanly way, but to watch the process of the Committee one could not fail to see that this lady was more governed by her political prejudices than by any capacity she might have for the job. It was very evident that there were two very strong Tariff Reformers on that Committee, and another fighting like a good Co-operative for Free Trade. To speak of this being an impartial inquiry is sheer nonsense. I expected that the recommendations of this Committee and the evidence upon which it was based would in due course come before this House for the usual review of a debate in this Chamber. But no. I do not think sufficient is made about this point. Surely it was the understanding in this House generally, if the Safeguarding policy was to be pursued, that any recommendation made in regard to it would be the subject of a discussion, and a free discussion, in this House. None of the evidence was brought before the House and no discussion was allowed upon it. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, looking afield for some fancy tax, landed on this wonderful child of the Committee and this duty has been adopted as one of the many ingenious devices in his Budget. I would not become very wroth about the proposal, and I would not wax hot about it, and denounce the Government for having adopted this policy. I would say to the Government now, "Keep your Safeguarding policy and double it, and put more on top of it, and you will do nothing to resuscitate the bone china industry in this country. Felspar china is a cheap shoddy which cannot compare with bone china as a finished product or as the work of a craftsman, and the dishonesty of this whole inquiry is shown by the fact that it is not the bone china industry but the earthenware industry which is being injured by the enormous importation of felspar china into this country. This felspar china is a cheap product, but has a certain amount of daintiness about it, and it is coming into this country and is being sold at a price out of all proportion to its value.

Really, it was not the bone china manufacturers at all but the earthenware manufacturers who felt that they were being displaced by this enormous importation of felspar china. The supporters of Protection in this country seized upon the bone china industry which is becoming more or less a fancy trade, and said to the Committee, "Here is an industry which cannot stand before this felspar competition." The earthenware manufacturers have been largely handicapped by this competition and if, in view of that fact, those manufacturers had come forward and asked for safeguarding there would have been some honesty in the appeal. But they did not come forward. That is where the dishonesty comes in in regard to this inquiry. The question was raised as to why some of those who are connected with this industry did not take any interest in this inquiry. The reason is simply because they had never been asked. We are in such a position in many parts of the potteries that it is not altogether safe for many of the employes to express their political convictions. There is a good deal of intimidation. The working people were not greatly interested. The only people really interested were the earthenware manufacturers whose interest it would have been to keep down this competition of felspar china. But they did not appear in the picture—the bone china industry was brought in and now it is put forward that we must have a certain measure of protection against felspar china, and that in that way we are going to help industry in the potteries. Well, you can double your Protection and even make it four times what it is, and yet you will not provide for the bone china industry.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

There are certain technical points one could bring out to prove that case, but I refrain from doing so. I want to support and to reinforce what was said by the last speaker. I do not wish to cast any reflection on this House or on any Member of this House, but I say this, whenever you allow private interests to be a moulding force in the policy of any country, these interests will in time begin to hamper and to influence that policy. I, therefore, quite agree with what has been said regarding possible corruption in the sense of spoiling the pure stream of political thought by the intrusion of private interests. Corruption of this kind is bound to grow in connection with this kind of thing. These are my own personal views on the matter.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 247; Noes, 100.

[Division No. 228.]

AYES.

[7.43 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Apsley, Lord
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Col. Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brookbank, C. S. R.
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.

Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Pritmth.S.)
Ceall, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
Cohen, Major J. Brunel
Colman, N. C. D.
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Cooper, A. Duff
Couper, J. B.
Courthope, Colonel Sir G. L.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Crooke, J. Smedley (Derford)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Curzon, Captain Viscount
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Drewe, C.
Eden, Captain Anthony
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
Erskine Lord (Somerset, Weston-a-M.)
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Falls, Sir Bertram G.

Fermoy, Lord
Finburgh, S.
Ford, Sir P. J.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Goff, Sir Park
Gower, Sir Robert
Grace, John
Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Grotrian, H. Brent
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
Hammersley, S. S.
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
Harland, A.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Hartington, Marquess of
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Hawke, John Anthony
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxt'd, Henley)
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Booth)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
Hills, Major John Waller
Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
Holt, Captain H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Horne, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert S.
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.

Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'n & P'b'l's)
 Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
 Jackson, Sir H. (Wandsworth, Cen'l)
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Lamb, J. O.
 Lane Fox, Col. Rt. Hon. George R.
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
 Loder, J. de V.
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir Robert J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
 MacIntyre, Ian
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Macquisten, F. A.
 Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel-
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
 Meller, R. J.
 Merriman, F. B.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monseil, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Lieut.-Col. T. C. R. (Ayr)
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth

Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
 Oakley, T.
 O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Penny, Frederick George
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pilcher, G.
 Pidditch, Sir Philip
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Scott, Rt. Hon. Sir Leslie
 Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Ranfrew, W.)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)

Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
 Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'land)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Turton, Sir Edmund Russborough
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Wilson, Sir Murrough (Yorks, Richm'd)
 Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
 Winby, Colonel L. P.
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Major Sir Harry Barnston and Mr.
 F. C. Thomson.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
 Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Bates, Joseph
 Beckett, John (Gateshead)
 Briant, Frank
 Broad, F. A.
 Bromley, J.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Right Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenall, T.
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.

Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W.R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydfil)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Harshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lawson, John James
 Lee, F.
 Lawth, T.
 Lunn, William
 MacLaren, Andrew
 MacNeill-Weir, L.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Naylor, T. E.
 Oliver, George Harold
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Potts, John S.
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.

Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Sinclair, Major Sir A. (Calthness)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Keighley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thorne, G. R. (Wolverhampton, E.)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plalstow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Tinker, John Joseph
 Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I beg to move, in page 5, line 4, to leave out the words "nineteenth day of April," and to insert instead thereof, the words "first day of May."

The duty, according to the Finance Bill, comes into operation on the 19th April. My Amendment is to delay the coming into operation of the duty until 1st May. The reason for that is very simple. There were at the time when the duty was imposed a great many consignments already on their way, and when the actual days are remembered it will be seen that the Report of the Committee was on 8th April, which was the first announcement of the proposal to impose the duty, that a speech announcing the duties was made three days later, on 11th April, and then Good Friday, 15th April came, on which the Customs were closed. The Saturday following, the 16th, the Customs were closed nearly all day, and the duties came into force on the 18th. There were only 10 days between the Report of the Committee and the coming into effect of the duty, and it will be remembered that many of these consignments came from a very long distance, and therefore started before any indication that the duty had been imposed had reached them, and many of them had been on the sea for six weeks. It is felt that this very rapid imposition of the duty before any of the consignments could be stopped is very unfair, for commitments were entered into which could not reasonably be carried out, and very great hardship arose. In cases of other countries which imposed duties against our manufacturers they were protected against the sudden imposition of duties of this kind.

One of the reasons given for putting on these duties rapidly is the fear of evasion. That reason cannot arise when the time has now considerably gone by, and the actual amount of goods which came into the country is known. It may be thought by some Members of the Committee that to do this retrospectively is absurd, and it could not reasonably be carried out, but, as a matter of fact, there is a definite precedent for doing this thing. In 1925 three Safeguarding Committees reported in favour of duties. They were the Cutlery, Glass and Gas Mantles Committees. The Reports were published in November in that year, and in December Parliament was asked to give effect to these duties and to fix the date for 23rd December. These industries have already had considerable notice that the duties were to be imposed. Nevertheless, some months afterwards, the date was retrospectively altered from 23rd December to 1st January. I have here, if the Committee wish to be troubled with it, the actual order which was published by the Commissioner of Customs and Excise postponing the duties retrospectively in this way. There is, therefore, a precedent, and in view of the very great hardship which would be inflicted if the 19th April were strictly adhered to, I hope this very reasonable request will be conceded by the President of the Board of Trade on this occasion.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The Treasury attach very considerable importance to this matter, and I am afraid it is quite impossible to accept the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman will remember that the Committee considered very carefully the question of dates on which this duty should come into force. The decision was that the duty should come into force forthwith. If we gave this concession to-day, it would operate in all cases, and this would be the worst case of all. The amount of the import duties in the earlier months of this year shows that the importers were fully alive to the possibility of this duty being imposed. We, therefore, could not possibly give way.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: There is another precedent for the Amendment, and it is that in 1921, when the German Reparations were on, and a number of people had bought and rebought, heavy duties were imposed, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day dated back the duties to give the people who had contracts abroad time to get them in. I have a similar case in connection with motor tyres where a man had some tyres which had not actually arrived. It was on the seas, and it was going to bust his business. Notwithstanding the fact that it is a precedent, the Treasury might in a case where it is obvious that there is no attempt at dumping, make some arrangement and not stick to the cast-iron principle as in the case of motor tyres.

Mr. E. BROWN: I regret the statement of the President of the Board of Trade, not only on the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Argyll (Mr. Macquisten), but about the duty under discussion. There is a great deal of dubiety about the pottery which comes, or does not come, under this duty, and it is extremely hard on the importers of this pottery whose articles have been ruled by the Customs and Excise unexpectedly to come within the duty. It is extremely hard on those who have forward contracts to have to face up to this duty so suddenly without any warning whatever. I, therefore, support the Amendment, which is similar to that in the name of three of my hon. Friends but for a longer period.

Mr. GILLET: We have as a precedent the case where the Treasury made an exception. If they have done it once they should do it again. It seems to me, in view of the importance of our business relations, which affect us more than any other country that, taking a broad view of the question, you ought to have thought that it would be wiser and in our interests to make this concession.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 236; Noes, 96.

Division No. 229.]

AYES.

[8.2 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Colonel Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Captain G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prismth.S.)
Ceeli, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cockerill, Brig.-General Sir George
Colman, N. C. D.
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Cooper, A. Duff

Couper, J. B.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Cooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
Dawson, Sir Phillip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Drewe, C.
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Ellis, R. G.
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Falle, Sir Bertram G.
Fermoy, Lord
Finburgh, S.
Ford, Sir P. J.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Gower, Sir Robert
Grace, John
Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's.w.F.)
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Grotrian, H. Brent
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
Hammersley, S. S.
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
Harland, A.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Hartington, Marquess of
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Hawke, John Anthony
Henderson, Capt. R.R. (Oxt'd, Henley)
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
Hills, Major John Waller
Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
Holt, Capt. H. P.

Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
Hume, Sir G. H.
Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
Huntingfield, Lord
Hutchinson, G.A. Clark (Mid'n & P'b'l's)
Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
Jephcott, A. R.
Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Lamb, J. O.
Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
Little, Dr. E. Graham
Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
Loder, J. de V.
Looker, Herbert William
Lougher, Lewis
Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Lumley, L. R.
Lynn, Sir Robert J.
Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
Macmillan, Captain H.
Macnaughten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel-
Makins, Brigadier-General E.
Malone, Major P. B.
Margesson, Captain D.
Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
Meiler, R. J.
Merriman, F. B.
Meyer, Sir Frank
Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Moore, Sir Newton J.
Murchison, Sir Kenneth
Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
Oakley, T.
Penny, Frederick George
Perkins, Colonel E. K.
Perring, Sir William George
Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
Pilcher, G.
Pilditch, Sir Philip
Power, Sir John Cecil
Pownall, Sir Asheton
Radford, E. A.
Raine, Sir Walter
Ramsden, E.

Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Salmon, Major I.
 Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. Mcl. (Renfrew, W.)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)

Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
 Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'eland)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfeild, Captain S. R.
 Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles

Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Willson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
 Winby, Colonel L. P.
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, E. (Chest'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Mr. F. C. Thomson and Captain
 Viscount Curzon.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
 Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Beckett, John (Gateshead)
 Broad, F. A.
 Bromley, J.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Clynes, Rt. Hon. John R.
 Connolly, M.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenall, T.
 Granfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.

Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Jones, J. J. (West Ham, Silvertown)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lawson, John James
 Lee, F.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 MacLaren, Andrew
 MacNeill-Welr, L.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Naylor, T. E.
 Oliver, George Harold
 Palin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Potts, John S.
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W. R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.

Scrimgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wadnesbury)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, Joseph
 Thorne, G. R. (Wolverhampton, E.)
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Tinker, John Joseph
 Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Wilkinson, Ellen C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I beg to move, in page 5, line 7, to leave out the words "or vitrified pottery."

The reason I ask for the omission of these words is that vitrified pottery was not really a subject of inquiry at all. Vitrified pottery, in the view of the trade, means earthenware. It does not mean china, and, when the earthenware and when the inquiry was fixed to deal with china, earthenware was entirely excluded because it was supposed that all forms of earthenware would be excluded from any question of duty. It was, therefore, a very great surprise to the trade, after the terms of reference and after the way in which the question had been handled, that at the last minute vitrified pottery was included with translucent pottery in the proposals of the Committee. If there had been any suggestion from the beginning that vitrified pottery would be included, evidence ought to have been given in regard to the earthenware which would be classed under that description. But, as there was no expectation that it would be so included, all evidence relating to earthenware was most carefully excluded from the inquiry. No figures were given, and it was confidently supposed that the inquiry would be confined to translucent pottery. There are very large numbers of articles which, in the general definitions of the trade, are included in this term. It is, therefore, very difficult to know what will be admitted free of duty. When the proposal came into force, the greatest confusion prevailed, and the importers were in doubt whether every article of earthenware should not be included under these terms. I understand that the Customs officials have not taken an extreme view and included all sorts of articles that could possibly be described as vitrified pottery, but they have confined themselves to a certain number, and, in that respect, the situation is better than it possibly might have been.

The fact remains that the very greatest uncertainty and difficulty prevails at the present time as to what is going to be included and what is to be excluded, and it is largely because of that difficulty that we suggest that vitrified pottery should be omitted from the scope of this taxation. It is exceedingly harassing, because it includes a great number of articles which are certainly not translucent pottery or china, and it creates the utmost confusion because, where you are dealing with portions of a trade in this way, it is exceedingly difficult to know what will or what will not be included by the Customs. Therefore, I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who, I think, rather unnecessarily ruled out our last Amendment, which was a small one, will not do that on this occasion, but will make this concession largely in the interests of clarity, so that people may know what imports will be subject to taxation and what will not.

Sir B. CHADWICK: In reference to what the hon. Gentleman has said I may say that the word "vitrified" was introduced for the sake of clarity, and in order that the duty shall operate as it is intended to operate, it was thought by the Committee that the word should be introduced. Though the imported china may be non-translucent, it might be altered by the introduction of oxide, and therefore the Committee has recommended that the duty shall extend to all vitrified pottery. I should like to give the Committee a definition of vitrified pottery. I want to give the hon. Member the actual facts as to what takes place, and how the introduction of these words will relieve the Customs officials instead of embarrassing them as he suggests. In general language the expression "vitrified" may be explained in this way. In the manufacture of glass various materials such as sand, soda and potash are mixed and raised to a high temperature so that they fuse or melt and flow together. Precautions are, of course, normally taken to see that the resulting product is colourless.

Glass is pre-eminently a vitrified product. In the case of china, various clays are mixed with certain fluxes, easily fusible bodies. When the temperature is raised, the fluxes melt with some of the material in the body and form what may be regarded roughly as a vitreous or glassy mass in which the unfused particles of clay are disseminated. That is vitrified pottery. Let me also give the Committee a clear definition of vitrified earthenware pottery; a great deal has been said about the difficulty of distinguishing earthenware from translucent pottery. In the case of earthenware there is no component in the body which melts or flows at the temperature at which the body is fired. That is unvitrified pottery. The vitrified pottery is non-porous while the unvitrified pottery is porous and this is the clear distinction between china and porcelain on the one hand and earthenware on the other. I hope that explanation will satisfy the hon. Member and will clear away any confusion which may exist in his mind.

Mr. E. BROWN: I accept the explanation given by the Parliamentary Secretary in so lucid a form. The term "vitrified pottery" will bring inside this duty a great range of articles which are commonly consumed by the poorest people, because they are the heavier ware. It is our contention that this range of articles was not inside the terms of reference, and I therefore join with the hon. Member in opposing this duty. We consider that the Committee had no right to go outside their terms of reference and recommend a duty on articles which are not within their terms of reference.

Question put: "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."
The Committee divided: Ayes, 228; Noes, 95.

Division No. 230.]

AYES.

[8.20 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Col. Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchan, John
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bull, Rt. Hon. Sir William James
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth.S.)
Ceill, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. W.
Colman, N. C. D.
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Couper, J. B.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Croft, Brigadier-General Sir H.
Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Col. G. de W. (Berwick)
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Gloucester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
Dawson, Sir Philip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Elliot, Major Walter E.
Ellis, R. G.
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Fermoy, Lord
Finburgh, S.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Grace, John
Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E)
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Grotrian, H. Brent
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, Lieut. Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
Hammersley, S. S.
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
Harland, A.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Hartington, Marquess of
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Hawke, John Anthony
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henlry)
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
Hills, Major John Waller
Hoag, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
Holt, Captain H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
Hume, Sir G. H.
Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
Huntingfield, Lord
Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'n & P'b'l's)
Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
Jephcott, A. R.
Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Lamb, J. O.
Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
Little, Dr. E. Graham
Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
Loder, J. de V.
Looker, Herbert William
Lougher, Lewis
Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Lumley, L. R.
Lynn, Sir R. J.
Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)
MacMillan, Captain H.
Macnaughten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
Macquisten, F. A.
Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel
Makins, Brigadier-General E.
Malone, Major P. B.
Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
Meller, R. J.
Merriman, F. B.
Meyer, Sir Frank
Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
Monseil, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Moore, Sir Newton J.
Murchison, Sir Kenneth
Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
Oakley, T.
Penny, Frederick George
Perkins, Colonel E. K.
Perring, William George
Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
Pilcher, G.
Pliditch, Sir Philip
Power, Sir John Cecil
Pownall, Sir Assheton
Radford, E. A.
Raine, Sir Walter
Ramsden, E.
Rawson, Sir Cooper
Reid, D. D. (County Down)
Remer, J. R.
Remnant, Sir James
Rice, Sir Frederick
Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
Ropner, Major L.
Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
Rye, F. G.
Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
Sandeman, N. Stewart
Sanders, Sir Robert A.
Sanderson, Sir Frank
Sandon, Lord
Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
Savery, S. S.
Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Renfrew, W)
Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
Shepperson, E. W.
Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
Skelton, A. N.
Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kine'dine, C.)
Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Sprot, Sir Alexander
Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'land)
Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Streatfeild, Captain S. R.
Stuart, Hon. J. (Moray and Nairn)
Styles, Captain H. W.
Suster, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
Tasker, R. Inigo.
Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, S.)
Tinne, J. A.
Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
Watts, Dr. T.
Wells, S. R.
Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
Winby, Colonel L. P.
Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
Wise, Sir Fredric
Wolmer, Viscount
Womersley, W. J.
Wood, E. (Ches't'r, Stalyb'ge & Hyde)
Wragg, Herbert
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Captain Lord Stanley and Captain
Margesson.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
 Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Beckett, John (Gateshead)
 Broad, F. A.
 Bromley, J.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Connolly, M.
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Day, Colonel Harry
 Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenall, T.
 Grentell, D. R. (Glamorgan)

Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W.R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hardie, George D.
 Harris, Percy A.
 Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
 Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lawson, John James
 Lee, F.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 MacLaren, Andrew
 MacNeill-Weir, L.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Mosley, Oswald
 Naylor, T. E.
 Oliver, George Harold
 Pallin, John Henry
 Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Potts, John S.
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)

Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shiels, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Smith, H. B. Lees (Keighley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
 Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Tinker, John Joseph
 Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
 Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, E.)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr.
 Whiteley.

Mr. E. BROWN: I beg to move, in page 5, line 8, to leave out the words, "suitable for use," and to insert instead thereof the words, "of a description commonly used."

I move this Amendment in a form which is slightly different from that appearing on the Paper.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I am prepared to accept the Amendment.

Mr. BROWN: Then there is no need to argue the point. The Amendment is designed to leave out certain fancy articles which are only used in connection with breakfast sets and are not essential to the primary purpose of the report.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. E. BROWN: I beg to move, in page 5, line 10, to leave out the words, "one pound and eight," and to insert instead thereof the word "fourteen."

The object of this Amendment is to lower the rate of duty from £1 8s. per cwt. to 14s. per cwt. and thereby to bring it nearer the application made to the Committee, which was for a duty approximating to 33½ per cent. This point was debated at great length on the first Amendment to this Clause and I think it is only treating the Committee fairly if I refrain from adding any facts and figures to the arguments submitted previously.

Mr. LEES-SMITH: It may assist the Committee and expedite business if, instead of moving an Amendment standing in my name later on the Paper—to insert the words "or thirty-three and one-third per cent. of the value, whichever is the less"—which covers much the same point, I make at this stage any observations which we wish to make on this point. That will free the President of the Board of Trade from the objection to a particular form of argument which he expressed during the Debate on the main question. We wish to support the Amendment by certain figures which have been brought to our attention. We have had brought before us figures which indicate that when the Committee said that a duty of 28 shillings per cwt. was equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 33½ per cent., they had not sufficient evidence before them, and that, in fact, they laid down a duty higher than that which they had in mind in their statement about the equivalence of the specific and the ad valorem duty. I do not anticipate that this Amendment will be accepted, but I suggest that with the evidence which we have, and the evidence a part of which, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman has, he should give us an undertaking to look into these figures again and satisfy us on the Report stage that the intention of the committee of inquiry is being carried out. A duty of 33½ per cent. at the factory becomes equivalent to a duty of, say, 40 per cent. or thereabouts c.i.f. If this duty were merely equivalent to 40 per cent. or so, c.i.f., we should not be using the particular argument which we are using now; but our evidence is that this duty is going to work out on the average, on the main classes of pottery, at over 50 per cent.—nearer 60 per cent.—and in many cases at between 60 and 70 per cent.

[Mr. Lees-Smith.]

The President was furnished with certain schedules in which it was argued that such would be the result. He has this afternoon quoted one single example taken from those schedules. Does he say that, taking all the schedules submitted to him, the average duty works out at 33½ per cent.? If that be so, they contradict the figures in the annual returns of the Board of Trade. If we take those returns for any year in the last five years and divide the total weight of imports by the total value, we get a duty of nearer 50 than 40 per cent. But the figures in the Board of Trade returns include all classes of pottery. They include Copenhagen ware and rare Japanese pottery on which the average is much less than 33½ per cent. I think it has been said to go down to about 3 per cent. in some of these cases. That being so, it follows that on the main classes of pottery, to which the committee refer, and in connection with which they wish to secure an ad valorem duty of 33½ per cent., the average duty is nearer 50 per cent. In fact, the duty is far nearer to those figures which we have indicated as resulting from the evidence submitted to us. That is why we believe these figures have not been tested with sufficient accuracy. So far as we know, they were not tested at all by the committee of inquiry. There is no evidence of any figures on this subject having been submitted to them, and they do not say how they arrived at their conclusion. The inquiries have been simply those which have taken place subsequently at the Board of Trade, and we wish to ask the President whether he will repeat them and call for full information on this subject, and, if necessary, bring up revised terms on the Report stage.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I do not want to go over the whole of the answer which I gave on the main Debate. The figures have been carefully considered; they were considered not only after the Report was presented but while the Committee were sitting. While it is true that in some cases the duty is considerably above 33½ per cent., in other cases it is considerably lower. That will always happen with a specific duty, and in this case the specific duty is much more convenient than an ad valorem duty. It is quite true that some of the figures submitted show a higher duty on some commodities. They were all based on factory cost, which, of course, is an entirely unsound basis on which to calculate the duty. The C.I.F. price would, I should think, add another 10 per cent. to the value. The illustration I quoted to the House was not quoted because it favoured my contention. I quoted it because it was an example given by the man who, I understand, asked to give evidence on behalf of the opponents in this case. Everybody naturally will produce the arguments which are most convenient to his own case, but I am checking this figure in this way. I have taken the figures of prices which were produced by the opponents, showing what are the costs of production here and what are the prices at which the foreign articles are sold. The figures I gave included "tea-sets, 5s. to 6s. 9d." That means a duty varying from 24 per cent. to 33½ per cent. In the case of certain special Czechoslovakian ware, the duty works out at 36 per cent. There are certain to be variations one way or the other. Cases could be given showing the duty to be as low as 18 per cent. What we have got is a pretty good working average, and I must ask the Committee to adhere to the rate of duty.

I am much obliged to the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Lees-Smith) for raising his point on this Amendment, and so saving a debate on his further Amendment. I feel sure that his proposal to have an alternative duty, so that it would be possible to charge either a specific duty or an ad valorem duty, would be the most inconvenient course. This china comes in in consignments of varying value, and the Customs officers would have to hold up each article to decide the weight or value, and consignments would have to be broken up in order that we could decide, in the case of each article in the consignment, whether the ad valorem or the specific duty was to be charged.

Mr. GILLET: Our fundamental difficulties still remain, in spite of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because we have grave doubts about the assurances given by hon. Members opposite that this duty is not going to be thrown on the consumer, and the method of levying the duty according to the weight of the article is certainly going to throw the heaviest duty on the very goods which are used by the poorest people. Although that argument must be very familiar to the Minister, he has not in any way met it. I understand that the china and glassware section of the London Chamber of Commerce investigated the effect of the duty upon some typical goods imported, and they estimated that the duty would range as high as 60 per cent. or 70 per cent. The one exception worked out at 45 per cent., and in that case the goods were of a rather thinner make, showing that in the case of the more expensive goods the duty is lighter. Take the case of Longton china and a 21-piece tea-set sold at 13s. 2d., and compare that with a cheap china set which may be sold at 4s. 6d. Under the method by which this duty is being imposed, the cheap set, the set used by the poorer people, is the one that is penalised.

I have here one or two other illustrations which were brought to my notice. In the case of a tea-set valued at £10 4s. 2d., the duty worked out at £5 2s. In the case of some cups and saucers valued at £5 4s. 2d., the duty worked out at £5 10s. Because this ware was heavy stuff the duty amounted to more than the value of the goods themselves. An hon. Member speaking earlier in the Debate said British manufacturers had assured him they were not going to alter the price of their goods. That statement ignores one important point, because they have been telling us they are not selling their goods at the present time through being undercut by the cheaper foreign imports. It is obvious that, if they are going on selling, in spite of this duty, at the price at which they are selling to-day, they are counting upon the duty preventing the cheaper stuff from coming in, and, although they may not alter their prices to the consumer, he would have his prices raised, because he would be compelled to buy the English ware at a higher price. There is a certain fallacy in the argument that the manufacturers are not going to alter their prices. Of course, they are not; there is no need for them to do so if foreign ware is to be prevented from coming in, because that will leave the market secure for the English maker; but it still leaves the fact that the consumer is going to bear the extra cost, or at any rate part of it. On these grounds we attach great importance to this question, and I very much regret that the Minister has not seen his way to meet us.

Mr. RILEY: Although there is force in what the Minister said with regard to the difficulty of adopting an ad valorem duty rather than a specific duty, that does not apply to a specific duty at a lower rate than is set forth in the Clause. The Minister, in his reply, has not met at all the substantial objection that, as the duty stands, it presses very heavily upon the people who are least in a position to bear it. We have also been told that, in spite of what the Minister has said, so far as regards the goods which have come in since the duty came into operation, the average duty has worked out at about 42 per cent. How the Minister justifies the statement that he makes it actually less, namely 34 or 35 per cent., I do not know.

It has been admitted in the Committee this afternoon that actual experience, since the duty began to operate, has shown that it averaged about 42 per cent. That indicates that the class of goods in use by the poorest people and in the greatest demand is the class of goods which is going to bear the largest proportion of this duty, while goods of better quality will have only a very small duty imposed upon them. The Minister has not met that substantial objection. It has not been denied that the vast bulk of the pottery which is imported and which comes under these duties is pottery of cheaper quality, and that, therefore, it will bear, under a specific duty, a higher and not a lower duty. That being the case, I submit that the Minister should face the fact that the incidence of the duty as it now stands is not fair. I also submit, as an additional reason for accepting this Amendment, that clearly the Committee, when they were examining the request of the applicants, had before them the view that the duty as a whole would be 33½ per cent. They probably saw the difficulty of fixing an ad valorem duty, and they therefore recommended a specific duty. It is known that a duty of 28s. per cwt. amounts to more than 33½ per cent., and I therefore urge the Minister to meet those who are moving this Amendment.

[Mr. Riley.]

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 225; Noes, 94.

Division No. 231.]

AYES.

[8.52 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Berterton, Henry B.
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Colonel Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth. S.)
Cazalet, Captain Victor A.
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Colman, N. C. D.
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Couper, J. B.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Crooke, J. Smedley (Derlind)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Dalkeith, Earl of
Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
Davies, Sir Thomas (Cirencester)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Dayson, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
Dawson, Sir Phillip
Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Edmondson, Major A. J.

Elliot, Major Walter E.
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Fallie, Sir Bertram G.
Fermoy, Lord
Finburgh, S.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Grace, John
Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'ith's'w, E.)
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Grotrian, H. Brent
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hackling, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
Hall, Capt. W. D'A. (Brecon & Rad.)
Hammersley, S. S.
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
Harland, A.
Harrison, G. J. C.
Hartington, Marquess of
Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
Hawke, John Anthony
Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
Hills, Major John Waller
Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
Holt, Capt. H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hopkins, J. W. W.
Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
Hume, Sir G. H.
Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
Huntingfield, Lord
Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'n & P'b'l's)
Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
Jephcott, A. R.
Kidd, J. (Llithgow)
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Lamb, J. Q.
Cister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Phillip
Little, Dr. E. Graham
Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
Loder, J. de V.
Looker, Herbert William
Lougher, Lewis
Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Lumley, L. R.
Lynn, Sir R. J.
Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
Macdonald, R. (Glasgow, Cathcart)

Macmillan, Captain H.
Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
Macquisten, F. A.
Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel
Makins, Brigadier-General E.
Malone, Major P. B.
Margesson, Captain D.
Meller, R. J.
Merriman, F. B.
Meyer, Sir Frank
Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Moore, Sir Newton J.
Murchison, Sir Kenneth
Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
Oakley, T.
Perkins, Colonel E. K.
Perling, Sir William George
Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
Pilcher, G.
Pilditch, Sir Phillip
Power, Sir John Cecil
Pownall, Sir Assheton
Radford, E. A.
Raine, Sir Walter
Ramsden, E.
Rawson, Sir Cooper
Reid, D. D. (County Down)
Remer, J. R.
Remnant, Sir James
Rice, Sir Frederick
Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
Ropner, Major L.
Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
Rye, F. G.
Samuel, A. M. (Surrey, Farnham)
Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
Sandeman, N. Stewart
Sanders, Sir Robert A.
Sanderson, Sir Frank
Sandon, Lord
Sassoon, Sir Phillip Albert Gustave D.
Savery, S. S.
Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Renfrew, W.)
Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
Shepperson, E. W.
Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
Skelton, A. N.
Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
Smith, R. W. (Aber'd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
Smith-Carlinton, Neville W.
Smithers, Waldron
Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Sprot, Sir Alexander
Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
Stanley, Lord (Fyfe)
Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (West'm'land)
Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Streatfield, Captain S. R.
Styles, Captain H. W.
Sugden, Sir Wilfrid

Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
Tasker, R. Inigo.
Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Tinne, J. A.
Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
Wallace, Captain D. E.
Ward, Lt.-Col. A.L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Waterhouse, Captain Charles
Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)

Watts, Dr. T.
Wells, S. R.
Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
Winby, Colonel L. P.
Windsor-Gilve, Lieut.-Colonel George
Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl

Wise, Sir Fredric
Wolmer, Viscount
Womersley, W. J.
Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'ge & Hyde)
Wragg, Herbert
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. F. C. Thomson and Mr. Penny.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
Baker, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Aberlillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Beckett, John (Gateshead)
Bromley, J.
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Charleton, H. C.
Cluse, W. S.
Connolly, M.
Crawford, H. E.
Dalton, Hugh
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwelty)
Edwards, J. Hugh (Accrington)
Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Unlver.)
Forrest, W.
Gardner, J. P.
Gillett, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Greenall, T.
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.

Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hardie, George D.
Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
MacLaren, Andrew
MacNeill-Weir, L.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Naylor, T. E.
Oliver, George Harold
Palin, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Potts, John S.
Rees, Sir Beddoe
Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.
Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)

Rose, Frank H.
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Smith, H. B. Lees (Keighley)
Smith, Rennie (Penistone)
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Strauss, E. A.
Sullivan, J.
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Tinker, John Joseph
Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Wellock, Wilfred
Welsh, J. C.
Whitley, W.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, East)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter
Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Mr. Fenby and Mr. Ernest Brown.

Mr. E. BROWN: I beg to move, in page 5, line 11, at the end, to add the words:

"Provided that nothing in this Sub-section shall apply to fireproof china."

The case of this Amendment is that when fireproof china, the word "fireproof" being used in a technical sense, was mentioned in the inquiry, it was said these articles were made in France and did not come under the scope of the inquiry. The Chairman did not invite evidence on the subject at all. Furthermore, none of the articles coming under the term "fireproof" were exhibited before the Committee, and a very great number of them do not come in competition at all with Longton ware, because similar articles are not made in England at all. We have put down this Amendment in the hope of saving cooking utensils and other pottery ware not normally used for table ware and getting them exempted from the duty. There is a great range of these articles which are not commonly used as table ware, and we consider it is not fair, as they were not argued before the Committee and do not come into competition with Longton ware at all, that they should be subject to the duty.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: While I cannot accept the Amendment, I do not really think that there is anything between the hon. Member and myself. Actually all china, as distinct from earthenware, is fireproof, and I am advised by the Customs authorities that if these words were put in they would have to exclude all the china that is subject to the duty. What the hon. Member wishes to exclude are those things that are not normally used for the service of food and drink, but only occasionally. The Customs practice is to exclude those, and they have issued an instruction making it plain that that kind of thing does not come within the scope of the duty. I have already accepted the hon. Member's Amendment.

[Sir P. Cunliffe-Lister.]

"of a description commonly used." That makes plainer what is already the practice.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Captain FitzRoy): The next Amendment I select is the first standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Southwark—in page 5, line 11, at the end, to insert the words:

"Provided that there shall be allowed and paid in the case of any manufactured article exported from Great Britain a drawback equal to the amount shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners to have been paid as duty on the translucent or vitrified pottery used as a container."

Mr. STRAUSS: I should like first to move the next Amendment—in page 5, line 11, at the end, to insert the words:

"Subject to the exclusion from the operation of this Section of all translucent or vitrified pottery imported and used solely as containers for chocolate and sugar confectionery manufactured in the United Kingdom,"— as, if the Government give me that, it will not be necessary to move the other.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I have my doubts about selecting the next Amendment at all.

Mr. STRAUSS: I beg to move, in page 5, line 11, at the end, to insert the words:

"Provided that there shall be allowed and paid in the case of any manufactured article exported from Great Britain a drawback equal to the amount shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners to have been paid as duty on the translucent or vitrified pottery used as a container."

This is simply to ask the Government to give a drawback on these cheap containers. I think that is a reasonable request, as the confectionery trade has to meet very keen competition abroad, and if it is handicapped and has to pay the duty on the re-exported article it is placed in a very difficult position.

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: While I cannot accept anything that is different in its terms from the regular drawback practice, I think the hon. Member already has all he wants under the Bill as it stands. There are imported into the Clause the provisions of the second Schedule of the Safeguarding of Industry (Customs Duty) Act, 1925. In that Schedule, in Sub-section (3) of Section 6 of the Finance Act, 1925, this is provided:

"If it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that duty has been paid under this Section in respect of any goods, and that the goods have not been used in Great Britain or Northern Ireland, a drawback equal to the amount of the duty so paid shall be allowed on the goods if exported as merchandise."

That covers the whole of the ordinary entrepôt trade, and I am advised by the Customs that in the case I understand the hon. Member referred to, of taking an article that is subject to this duty, like a teapot, and filling it with confectionery and then sending it out, it is the practice not to regard that as using the article, and it will already obtain the benefit of this Section. Therefore, while I could not agree to admitting any new principle of drawback, the point he is anxious about is, in fact, covered by the Customs practice under an existing Section of the Finance Act.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 225; Noes, 95.

Division No. 232.]

AYES.

[9.7 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Applin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Barnston, Major Sir Harry
Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.

Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Col. Sir T. Vansittart
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brocklebank, C. E. R.
Broun-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Burton, Colonel H. W.

Butler, Sir Geoffrey
Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbert R. (Prtamth.S.)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.

Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
 Colman, N. C. D.
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Couper, J. B.
 Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
 Davies, Sir Thomas (Gloucester)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Finburgh, S.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gilmour, Colonel Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th'sw, E)
 Grotlan, H. Brent
 Gunston, Captain D. W.
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hail, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
 Hall, Capt. W. D'A. (Brecon & Rad.)
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Booth)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major J. R. G.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Holt, Captain H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.

Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Midl'n & P'b'l's)
 Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Kidd, J. (Linthgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
 Loder, J. de V.
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
 Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Macquisten, F. A.
 Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Margesson, Capt. D.
 Mason, Lieut.-Colonel Glyn K.
 Meller, R. J.
 Merriman, F. B.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
 Oakley, T.
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perrins, Sir William George
 Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pilcher, G.
 Pilditch, Sir Philip
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch't's'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)

Rye, F. G.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Renfrew, W.)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Smithers, Waldron
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
 Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'land)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Styles, Captain H. Walter
 Sugden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheeler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple-
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
 Winby, Colonel L. P.
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburch, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Mr. F. C. Thomson and Mr. Penny.

NOES.

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
 Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Ammon, Charles George
 Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
 Baker, Walter
 Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
 Barnes, A.
 Batey, Joseph
 Beckett, John (Gateshead)
 Broad, F. A.
 Bromley, J.
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
 Buchanan, G.
 Charleton, H. C.
 Cluse, W. S.
 Connolly, M.
 Crawford, H. E.
 Dalton, Hugh
 Day, Colonel Harry

Dennison, R.
 Dunnico, H.
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
 Fenby, T. D.
 Forrest, W.
 Gardner, J. P.
 Gillett, George M.
 Gosling, Harry
 Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
 Greenall, T.
 Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
 Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
 Groves, T.
 Grundy, T. W.
 Hall, F. (York, W.R., Normanton)
 Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
 Hardie, George D.
 Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)

Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
 John, William (Rhondda, West)
 Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Kennedy, T.
 Lawrence, Susan
 Lawson, John James
 Lee, F.
 Lindley, F. W.
 Lowth, T.
 Lunn, William
 MacLaren, Andrew
 MacNeill-Weir, L.
 Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham N.)
 Naylor, T. E.
 Oliver, George Harold
 Pallin, John Henry
 Parkinson, John Allen (Wigan)
 Pathick-Lawrence, F. W.
 Potts, John S.

Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Riley, Ben
 Ritson, J.
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Rose, Frank H.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Scurr, John
 Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
 Shleis, Dr. Drummond
 Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
 Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
 Smith, Rennie (Penistone)

Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
 Stamford, T. W.
 Stephen, Campbell
 Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
 Strauss, E. A.
 Sullivan, J.
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Thurtle, Ernest
 Tinker, John Joseph
 Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)
 Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhonda)

Wellock, Wilfred
 Welsh, J. C.
 Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
 Williams, David (Swansea, East)
 Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
 Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
 Windsor, Walter
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr. W.
 Whiteley.

Clause 10 (Time for payment of beer duty) ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 11.—(Alteration of duties on certain licences for mechanically-propelled vehicles.)

Mr. CRAWFURD: I beg to move, in page 5, line 30, to leave out the word "and."

This Amendment, and the next Amendment in my name—after "5" to insert "and 6"—are designed for one purpose, and I am perfectly sure they will have the keen sympathy not only of hon. Members on this side of the House whose sole interest in legislation, financial or otherwise, is justice, but also the sympathy of a number of Members on the opposite side of the Committee, and not least the Minister of Transport. The Amendment says, in effect, or it carries out to the logical conclusion this argument, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is going to take—and I think "take" is the kindest word that has been used in this connection—for other purposes money which was raised specifically for the purpose of improving and the upkeep of the roads—and when I say money that was raised specifically for that purpose, I reassert what has been asserted and reasserted over and over again by Minister after Minister, both before and since the War—that that money should be used for the purpose of improving the transport communications of the country, and for no other purpose. I do not think that any hon. Members in any quarter of the Committee will really wish to penalise the motorists as such. They might wish to penalise the speedy motorist or the motorist who does not care for the convenience of other people, but motorists as such they will have no desire to penalise. While you raise taxation which was designed for a special purpose from a special class of people and do not apply the results of that taxation for that special purpose, but take them for general purposes, you are imposing a special tax upon a special class, which seems to me a wrong system of finance. The Amendments to which I have alluded would have the effect of reducing the amount of money raised by motor taxation to the level which is required for the purposes for which that taxation was originally imposed, namely, for the upkeep and construction of roads. That is the principle underlying the tax—a perfectly simple and comprehensible principle, which is, I think, quite unanswerable.

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Colonel Ashley): The hon. Member has given us a dissertation upon the purposes to which the Road Fund should be devoted in a speech appropriate to Clause 46, but not appropriate at all to this Amendment, and he has told us nothing about the Amendment he seeks to move. The Amendment is simply to reduce by 25 per cent. the amount imposed on those who use what is called light cars, that is, ordinary motor cars. Of course, the answer, in a sentence, is that we cannot possibly accept the Amendment. The Amendment would diminish the amount paid into the Road Fund by 25 per cent. and would reduce the £6 which is paid for a motor car up to six horse-power from £6 to £4 10s., and would impose a duty of 15s. instead of £1 on each horse power over six. I need not weary the Committee by any further remarks, except to say that the Government cannot possibly accept the Amendment, because it would reduce the income of the Road Fund in this financial year by £2,500,000. The hon. Member has raised the general question of the raiding of the Road Fund, and I am personally in entire agreement with the action of the Chancellor. I think he had no other option than to do what he has done. From a Departmental point of view, of course, one likes to have as much money to spend in one's own particular Department, but I am quite clear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was absolutely right, and I entirely support him.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: I have a great deal of sympathy with the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend. In 1920 the motor users were asked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time if they would consent to a very heavy horse-power tax, and they agreed on condition that that money was applied to the benefit of the roads. He gave a definite promise in 1920 that when there was a surplus there would be a reduction of the tax upon motors. In the last two years the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken no less than £27,000,000 from the Road Fund. That shows that there is a surplus, and that might very well be devoted to a reduction of taxation. I fully realise that the past year has been an unexampled year, and a year we hope the like of which will not happen again. But we do ask that in future, when there is a surplus in the Road Fund, this should be devoted to a reduction of the horse-power tax. We have always objected to this tax as being a most unfair type of tax that could be put on the motor car. By far the fairest type of tax is one on petrol. If you reduce the tax to 15s., you will reduce the amount of unfairness, and I would ask him seriously to consider, if he does not change to the tax on petrol, a reduction of the horse-power tax.

The tax on petrol is one that would bring in the same amount, in fact possibly more. If all the money that is devoted to the upkeep of roads is paid by the motorists, the more the motorist uses the roads, the more he should be taxed. At present the tax on horse-power does not do that. In 1924 there were 873,000 cars. The number has more than doubled since that time. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has told us that this would act as a reduction of 25 per cent., but in 1920 he promised us that when there was a surplus of money it would be devoted to a reduction of tax. Private cars have increased since 1920 by two and a-half times, and I do ask him whether next year—I do not ask him to do it this year, for I realise it is impossible—he cannot turn over to a tax on petrol, or think seriously of a reduction in the rate of the tax.

Mr. SNOWDEN: We are not willing to support this Amendment, because we are not in favour of any reduction in the yield of motor taxes. If this Amendment be carried, it will involve a very considerable reduction. I must express my admiration of the loyalty of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to his colleagues, although I have to extend my admiration of his loyalty to his own Department. There was a point made in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down which is capable of misunderstanding. He said a pledge had been formerly given that if the yield of these motor taxes were in excess of that required for the needs for which they were levied, some reduction in the rate of tax would be made. The fact that there was the enormous sum of £27,000,000 does not mean that the needs of the roads have been exhausted, and that it was a surplus which could not possibly be devoted to the purpose for which the tax was originally imposed. As a matter of fact, the need for the expenditure of money on the roads has grown at a more rapid rate than the remarkable increase in the number of motor cars. I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Member's observations about a change in the basis of the tax from horse-power to a petrol tax, were in order or not, but I assume they were as the Chair did not call him to order. I hope the hon. and gallant Member will not assume that there is agreement in this House as to the desirability of such a change. After a considerable study of this question, all my convictions are that the present method of assessing on a combination which we call horse-power is definitely preferable to a tax on petrol. I will not go into that now, but some time in the future we shall have an opportunity of discussing it fully, and then I may be able to put to the House the reasons—I think substantial reasons—why the present method of basing the tax should be adhered to.

Question put, "That the word 'and' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 209; Noes, 7.

[Division No. 233.]

AYES.

[9.28 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
 Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
 Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
 Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
 Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
 Astbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
 Atkinson, C.
 Balfour, George (Hampstead)
 Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
 Barnston, Major Sir Harry
 Benn, Sir A. S. (Plymouth, Drake)
 Bennett, A. J.
 Berry, Sir George
 Betterton, Henry B.
 Birchall, Major J. Dearman
 Boothby, R. J. G.
 Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
 Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
 Brassey, Sir Leonard
 Briggs, J. Harold
 Briscoe, Richard George
 Brocklebank, C. E. R.
 Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
 Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
 Buckingham, Sir H.
 Bullock, Captain M.
 Burman, J. B.
 Burton, Colonel H. W.
 Butler, Sir Geoffrey
 Butt, Sir Alfred
 Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
 Campbell, E. T.
 Carver, Major W. H.
 Cassels, J. D.
 Cautley, Sir Henry S.
 Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtsmth.S.)
 Ceell, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
 Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
 Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
 Christie, J. A.
 Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
 Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
 Clarry, Reginald George
 Clayton, G. C.
 Cobb, Sir Cyril
 Colman, N. C. D.
 Conway, Sir W. Martin
 Couper, J. B.
 Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
 Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
 Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
 Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
 Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
 Dalkeith, Earl of
 Davidson, Major-General Sir John H.
 Davies, Sir Thomas (Gloucester)
 Davies, Dr. Vernon
 Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
 Dawson, Sir Philip
 Dean, Arthur Wellesley
 Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
 Edmondson, Major A. J.
 Elliot, Major Walter E.
 Ellis, R. G.
 Elveden, Viscount
 Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
 Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
 Everard, W. Lindsay
 Falle, Sir Bertram G.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Finburgh, S.

Forrest, W.
 Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
 Fraser, Captain Ian
 Gates, Percy
 Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
 Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
 Gil'mour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
 Glyn, Major R. G. C.
 Gower, Sir Robert
 Grace, John
 Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
 Greene, W. P. Crawford
 Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's'w, E)
 Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
 Hammersley, S. S.
 Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Oxf'd, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw k, Nun.)
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Mid'l'n & P'bl's)
 Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Philip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 MacMillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Macquisten, F. A.
 Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Margesson, Captain D.
 Marriot, Sir J. A. R.
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
 Meller, R. J.
 Merriman, F. B.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Moore, Sir Newton J.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
 Oakley, T.
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George

Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pidditch, Sir Philip
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Rees, Sir Beddoe
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sassoon, Sir Philip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aberd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
 Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'land)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Styles, Captain H. W.
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Suggden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Lichfield)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, E. (Chesh'r, Stalyb'dge & Hyde)
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Mr. F. C. Thomson and Mr. Penny.

NOES.

Briant, Frank
 Brown, Ernest (Leith)
 Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)

Groves, T.
 Scrymgeour, E.
 Watson, W. M. (Dunfermline)

Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Mr. Crawford and Mr. Fenby.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: I beg to move in page 5, line 32, at the end, to insert the words:

"and as if the duties specified in the said paragraph (5), as amended by the Finance Act, 1926, were further amended in respect of the duties of excise on vehicles adapted for the conveyance of goods by the substitution of the rates of duties for such vehicles set out in the Fourth Schedule to this Act for the rates for such vehicles set out in the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926."

This Amendment must be taken in conjunction with the Amendment to the Fourth Schedule later on the Order Paper. The effect of the Amendment is to grade commercial cars for taxation purposes. Last year a new tax was imposed upon commercial cars and the grading was very steep. Over one ton and up to two tons there was a sudden rise of £10 in the tax. Over two tons and up to three tons there was a rise in the tax of £14. The grievance of the manufacturers is that they were not consulted and that they had been consulted, without doing away with the maximum tax, they would have suggested a tax which included smaller steps. Private cars are taxed on horse-power, the tax being £1 per horse-power, but on commercial cars the tax is by tons, and there is a very big rise in the steps. The effect of the Amendment is to put in intervening steps of five cwt., so that the tax instead of rising by £10 or £14 as at present would rise by steps of £3 or £4.

The manufacturers have found that the effect of the present tax is to limit design. When there is a sudden increase in the tax, as at present, the effect is that if a commercial car weighs a few pounds over one ton, it means an additional tax of £10 a year. Putting a limit on design has an effect on our export trade. To increase the efficiency of a car it may be necessary to have an electric lighting set, or a self-starter, or four-wheel brakes; but the effect of these improvements may be to increase the weight of the car to a few pounds above one ton, or to a few pounds over two tons, and that would mean an increase of £10 or £14 a year in tax. I do not think that the effect of this Amendment would be very appreciable on the amount of revenue that comes in, because the greater number of the cars to-day are within five cwts. of those limits. Such being the case, and when nearly half the number of commercial cars are under one ton, and the greater part of these within five cwts. of that ton, if we had this regrading it would not affect the tax yield to any great extent, but it might in certain cases improve it. By adding improvements to a car, you might make the weight slightly above one ton, in which case, under the scheme which I propose, there would be only a £3 extra tax on the car, whereas at the present time manufacturers are often prevented from putting in those improvements, because the added weight might mean the addition of a £10 tax.

As the yearly rate of increase in commercial cars is about 20,000, it means at the minimum an increase of over £300,000 a year. The effect of this proposed tax would be practically stationary, because instead of having an increase of, say, £300,000 or £400,000 a year, for the next year it would be stationary, and after that it would increase. I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer can put this scheme into operation this year, but I do ask him seriously to consider whether next year it would not be advisable to have this regrading of commercial motor cars, in consultation with the manufacturers, keeping the maximum amounts as they are at present, but having smaller steps so as to encourage our export trade. At the present time the manufacturers are compelled to make two kinds of cars, one for the home trade, and another for the Colonial trade. That can only mean that there is an increase in production costs, whereas if they had one model both for the home trade and the export trade they could sell the cars at a cheaper rate abroad. That is a most important point, and I would ask my right hon. Friend seriously to consider it. It will mean practically no difference in the revenue, but it is a matter of great concern to our manufacturers in this country. I would ask him if next year he would seriously consider this proposal before the Budget is framed.

Colonel ASHLEY: I have two objections to my hon. and gallant Friend's proposal, one a minor and one a major objection. The minor objection is that the more steps you have, the more administrative expense there must be in carrying out the operation of the tax. Although that is not an insuperable difficulty, one can well understand that those who have to carry out a tax desire to carry it out as economically as possible.

[Colonel Ashley.]

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: Have you not steps in horse power?

Colonel ASHLEY: We want as few steps as possible, from the administrative point of view.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: You have them now in horse power.

Colonel ASHLEY: It is very simple to deal with one horse, two-horse power or three-horse power.

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: The steps which I propose are steps of five cwt.

Colonel ASHLEY: My major objection is that I am advised that this Schedule would cost the Road Fund certainly £500,000 a year, and probably £600,000. The Committee must realise that with the increasing demands made upon the Road Fund, and when hon. Members representing rural constituencies are asking for further help for rural roads, it is impossible to give away half a million a year from the Road Fund. As my hon. and gallant Friend has asked me, I will look personally into the matter between now and next year, and as soon as possible, and see whether anything can be done to deal with the matter. I am sure he will not expect me to say more now.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and gallant Member press the Amendment?

Lieut.-Colonel HOWARD-BURY: No, Sir.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SCURR: I beg to move in page 5, line 32, at the end, to insert the words:

"Provided that a rebate of twenty-five per cent. of the licence duty payable in respect of a vehicle exceeding two tons in weight unladen under the said paragraph (5) shall be allowed in respect of every such vehicle fitted with pneumatic tyres."

The object of this Amendment, which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherhithe (Mr. B. Smith) is to encourage the use of pneumatic tyres on heavy vehicles by giving a 25 per cent. rebate on licence duties payable under paragraph 5 of the Schedule to which reference is made in Clause 11. The effect of Clause 11 as it stands is to provide a reduced rate of duty for certain classes of vehicles. We desire to extend that for the purpose of encouraging heavy grade vehicles which have solid tyres at the present time to resort to pneumatic tyres. The result of that would be a considerable saving in the expenses which fall on the Road Fund, because a considerable amount of traffic is done by heavy vehicles with solid tyres, not only when they are new, but more particularly as they get old, and when the tyres are damaged. Consequently, they damage the road much more. I think the right hon. Gentleman has sympathy with this Amendment, and I hope his sympathy will be demonstrated by his acceptance of it. At the present time at least 95 per cent. of the heavy trade vehicles have solid tyres. We estimate, after careful investigation by the Transport Workers' Union, that the effects of this Amendment if adopted will be to double at least the number of vehicles that will use pneumatic tyres, and we anticipate that the cost to the revenue of the whole thing would be £62,000, but we maintain that the saving would be greater than that, on account of the expenditure saved on repairing the roads.

Colonel ASHLEY: Last year an Amendment was proposed on the same lines as that which has been moved by the hon. Member, and it was rejected by the House. We cannot accept this Amendment, because of the cost to the Road Fund. But though we cannot accept the Amendment, I would point out that the saving is not quite as great as the hon. Member imagines. It is quite true that the pneumatic tyre does less damage to the roads than the solid tyre, but, on the other hand, the pneumatic tyre travels at a greater speed than the solid tyre, and, therefore, greater extent of road is involved. Therefore, the difference in the damage done by these two classes of tyres, though it is substantial, is not as great as the hon. Member seems to think. Then there are administrative difficulties. The acceptance of the Amendment would result in adding considerably to the duty to be carried out by the police authorities. As the Committee has heard, complaints are constantly coming to the Home Office that the police are being asked to perform a number of duties outside their normal functions, and it is really undesirable, if not impossible, to ask them to undertake any further work, because every piece of extra work you give them to do hampers the discharge of their ordinary duty. I must, therefore, resist the Amendment.

Mr. PALIN: I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman when he says that under this Amendment no saving would be effected.

Colonel ASHLEY: I did not say that. What I said was that the saving is not as great as some people imagine.

Mr. PALIN: It is very much greater than the Minister realises, and if the Road Fund is for the purpose of maintaining the roads in proper condition and making them safe for ordinary people, it should be so used. In my own town the other night the roads were crowded, and there were three deaths and a number of people injured owing to the road in certain parts being too narrow. If the roads are dangerous to human life owing to their dangerous condition, surely it is quite a proper thing to get rid of the danger to ordinary people by widening the roads. Prevention is very much better than cure, and the extra cost to the Road Fund would be well spent. The great damage that is done to the paved roads in our cities does not fall on the Road Fund, but, unfortunately for the local authorities in the smaller towns, it falls upon the tramways or on the rates of the principal town. It does seem to me that the Minister does not appear to have any conviction on any particular point in regard to this matter, because otherwise his own conscience would make him feel the reasonableness of the Amendment which has been moved by my hon. Friend.

Miss WILKINSON: There are two problems and two different kinds of roads. One is the problem of the tar-macadamised roads where you get heavy vehicles with solid tyres doing great injury in warm weather and making the roads corrugated. This is frightfully bad for the roads. The second kind of road is the road where the surface is not tarmac, and it is extraordinarily difficult to get the country to take up this question of this kind of road and to press that such roads should be kept in decent condition. These roads have an ordinary metal surface, and on a wet day these heavy, overladen, solid-tyre lorries simply ruin this kind of road. Two or three of these lorries are almost sufficient to ruin the road. I, myself, have seen a road of this kind simply torn up in wet weather by these heavily laden vehicles with solid tyres, and put into such a condition that it was not fit to be used. It is entirely false economy not to agree to a duty which would pay for itself over and over again. There is a great deal of trouble in getting the county authorities to come along and improve these roads. It is all very well to talk about the claims of the Road Fund, but the right hon. Gentleman had better tell that to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Even if he does want to save the Road Fund, it is not unreasonable to accept this sensible suggestion.

Mr. R. MORRISON: There is one thing that has not been mentioned in this discussion, but I do not think even if it were the Government would take any notice of it. It is the amount of damage that is being done every day by these heavy solid tyre vehicles not only to the roads but to residential property. Every Member of this House has at some time or other received a communication from the National Citizens' Union and other Bolshevik organisations of that kind begging them to raise this question of the damage done by these heavy vehicles to residential property. I apologise for having mentioned this matter, because I am sure no member of the Government takes the slightest interest in the question of damage to residential property.

Mr. E. BROWN: I agree with the protest that has been made against the continual damage to the roads by these heavy solid tyre vehicles. We are continually getting resolutions sent to us about the damage done where there is a great deal of heavy traffic of this kind. If you travel between Rugby and Northampton, for instance, you will see how the tarmac road is damaged in hot weather by these solid tyre vehicles. I, therefore, support the protest that has been made. If, on the other hand, you leave that town and come south along the road which is partly tarmac and partly ordinary material you will see that the solid tyres cut the road about in hot weather very heavily indeed. This is a very sensible Amendment.

[Mr. E. Brown.]

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided: Ayes, 97; Noes, 240.

Division No. 234.]

AYES.

[9.57 p.m.]

Adamson, Rt. Hon. W. (Fife, West)
Adamson, W. M. (Staff., Cannock)
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Ammon, Charles George
Baker, J. (Wolverhampton, Bilston)
Bakes, Walter
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Barnes, A.
Batey, Joseph
Beckett, John (Gateshead)
Bowerman, Rt. Hon. Charles W.
Brant, Frank
Broad, F. A.
Bromley, J.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Brown, James (Ayr and Bute)
Buchanan, G.
Buxton, Rt. Hon. Noel
Charleton, H. C.
Clase, W. S.
Compton, Joseph
Connolly, M.
Crawford, H. E.
Dalton, Hugh
Day, Colonel Harry
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Evans, Capt. Ernest (Welsh Univer.)
Fenby, T. D.
Gardner, J. P.
Gilliat, George M.
Gosling, Harry
Graham, D. M. (Lanark, Hamilton)
Greenall, T.

Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W. R., Normanton)
Hall, G. H. (Marthyr Tydvil)
Hardie, George D.
Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
Hirst, G. H.
Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
Kelly, W. T.
Kennedy, T.
Lawrence, Susan
Lawson, John James
Lee, F.
Lindley, F. W.
Lowth, T.
Lunn, William
MacLaren, Andrew
MacNelli-Welsh, L.
Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
Naylor, T. E.
Oliver, George Harold
Pallin, John Henry
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Potts, John S.
Riley, Ben
Ritson, J.
Robinson, Sir T. (Lance, Stretford)

Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
Rose, Frank H.
Scrymgeour, E.
Scurr, John
Shepherd, Arthur Lewis
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Short, Alfred (Wednesbury)
Smith, H. B. Lees- (Kelghley)
Smith, Rennle (Painstone)
Snowden, Rt. Hon. Philip
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Stamford, T. W.
Stephen, Campbell
Stewart, J. (St. Rollox)
Strauss, E. A.
Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
Thurtle, Ernest
Tinker, John Joseph
Walsh, Rt. Hon. Stephen
Watts-Morgan, Lt.-Col. D. (Rhondda)
Wellock, Wilfred
Welsh, J. C.
Whiteley, W.
Wilkinson, Ellen C.
Williams, C. P. (Denbigh, Wrexham)
Williams, David (Swansea, East)
Williams, Dr. J. H. (Llanelli)
Wilson, R. J. (Jarrow)
Windsor, Walter

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
Mr. Charles Edwards and Mr. Allen Parkinson.

NOES.

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Alexander, Sir Wm. (Glasgow, Cent'l)
Appin, Colonel R. V. K.
Ashley, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Wilfrid W.
Ashbury, Lieut.-Commander F. W.
Astor, Viscountess
Atkinson, C.
Baldwin, Rt. Hon. Stanley
Balfour, George (Hampstead)
Barclay-Harvey, C. M.
Barnett, Major Sir Richard
Beckett, Sir Gervase (Leeds, N.)
Bennett, A. J.
Berry, Sir George
Betterton, Henry B.
Birchall, Major J. Dearman
Bird, E. R. (Yorks, W. R., Skipton)
Boothby, R. J. G.
Bourne, Captain Robert Croft
Bowater, Col. Sir T. Vansittart
Bowler, Captain G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Briggs, J. Harold
Briscoe, Richard George
Brookbank, C. E. R.
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Brown-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H.C. (Berke, Newb'y)
Buckingham, Sir H.
Bullock, Captain M.
Burman, J. B.
Butler, Sir Geoffrey

Butt, Sir Alfred
Cadogan, Major Hon. Edward
Campbell, E. T.
Carver, Major W. H.
Cassels, J. D.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Maj. Sir Herbt. R. (Prtamth.S.)
Cecil, Rt. Hon. Sir Evelyn (Aston)
Chadwick, Sir Robert Burton
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. N. (Ladywood)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Christie, J. A.
Churchill, Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer
Churchman, Sir Arthur C.
Clarry, Reginald George
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Colman, N. C. D.
Conway, Sir W. Martin
Cooper, J. B.
Cowan, Sir Wm. Henry (Islington, N.)
Craig, Sir Ernest (Chester, Crewe)
Crooks, J. Smadley (Deritend)
Crookshank, Col. C. de W. (Berwick)
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Dunliffe, Sir Herbert
Dalketh, Earl of
Davidson, J. (Hert'd, Hemel Hempst'd)
Davidson, Major-General Sir J. H.
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Davison, Sir W. H. (Kensington, S.)
Dawson, Sir Philip

Dean, Arthur Wellesley
Dixon, Captain Rt. Hon. Herbert
Eden, Captain Anthony
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Elliot, Major Walter E.
Ellis, R. G.
Elvedon, Viscount
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Evans, Captain A. (Cardiff, South)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Falls, Sir Bertram G.
Fermoy, Lord
Finburgh, S.
Foxcroft, Captain C. T.
Fraser, Captain Ian
Gates, Percy
Gault, Lieut.-Col. Andrew Hamilton
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Gilmour, Lt.-Col. Rt. Hon. Sir John
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Gower, Sir Robert
Grace, John
Graham, Fergus (Cumberland, N.)
Greene, W. P. Crawford
Greenwood, Rt. Hon. Sir H. (W'th's.w. E)
Grenfell, Edward C. (City of London)
Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John
Grotrian, H. Brent
Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, Lieut.-Col. Sir F. (Dulwich)
Hall, Capt. W. D'A. (Brecon & Rad.)
Hammersley, S. S.

Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
 Harland, A.
 Harrison, G. J. C.
 Hartington, Marquess of
 Harvey, G. (Lambeth, Kennington)
 Hawke, John Anthony
 Henderson, Capt. R. R. (Ox'ld, Henley)
 Henderson, Lt.-Col. Sir V. L. (Bootle)
 Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
 Herbert, Dennis (Hertford, Watford)
 Hills, Major John Waller
 Hogg, Rt. Hon. Sir D. (St. Marylebone)
 Hohler, Sir Gerald Fitzroy
 Holt, Capt. H. P.
 Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
 Hopkins, J. W. W.
 Hopkinson, Sir A. (Eng. Universities)
 Howard-Bury, Lieut.-Colonel C. K.
 Hudson, Capt. A. U. M. (Hackney, N.)
 Hume, Sir G. H.
 Hunter-Weston, Lt.-Gen. Sir Aylmer
 Huntingfield, Lord
 Hutchison, G. A. Clark (Midl'n & P'bl's)
 Iliffe, Sir Edward M.
 Jephcott, A. R.
 Jones, G. W. H. (Stoke Newington)
 Kidd, J. (Linlithgow)
 King, Commodore Henry Douglas
 Lamb, J. Q.
 Lister, Cunliffe, Rt. Hon. Sir Phillip
 Little, Dr. E. Graham
 Lloyd, Cyril E. (Dudley)
 Loder, J. de V.
 Looker, Herbert William
 Lougher, Lewis
 Lucas-Tooth, Sir Hugh Vere
 Luce, Maj.-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
 Lumley, L. R.
 Lynn, Sir R. J.
 Macdonald, Capt. P. D. (I. of W.)
 Macmillan, Captain H.
 Macnaghten, Hon. Sir Malcolm
 McNeill, Rt. Hon. Ronald John
 Macquisten, F. A.
 Maitland, Sir Arthur D. Steel
 Makins, Brigadier-General E.
 Malone, Major P. B.
 Margesson, Captain D.

Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
 Mason, Lieut.-Col. Glyn K.
 Merriman, F. B.
 Meyer, Sir Frank
 Mitchell, S. (Lanark, Lanark)
 Mitchell, W. Foot (Saffron Walden)
 Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
 Murchison, Sir Kenneth
 Nelson, Sir Frank
 Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
 Nicholson, O. (Westminster)
 Oakley, T.
 Ormsby-Gore, Rt. Hon. William
 Pennefather, Sir John
 Penny, Frederick George
 Perkins, Colonel E. K.
 Perring, Sir William George
 Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
 Pilcher, G.
 Pilditch, Sir Phillip
 Power, Sir John Cecil
 Pownall, Sir Assheton
 Radford, E. A.
 Raine, Sir Walter
 Ramsden, E.
 Rawson, Sir Cooper
 Reid, D. D. (County Down)
 Remer, J. R.
 Remnant, Sir James
 Rice, Sir Frederick
 Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
 Roberts, Sir Samuel (Hereford)
 Ropner, Major L.
 Russell, Alexander West (Tynemouth)
 Rye, F. G.
 Samuel, Samuel (W'dsworth, Putney)
 Sandeman, N. Stewart
 Sanders, Sir Robert A.
 Sanderson, Sir Frank
 Sandon, Lord
 Sassoon, Sir Phillip Albert Gustave D.
 Savery, S. S.
 Shaw, Lt.-Col. A. D. McL. (Renfrew, W.)
 Sheffield, Sir Berkeley
 Shepperson, E. W.
 Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
 Sinclair, Col. T. (Queen's Univ., Belfast)
 Skelton, A. N.

Slaney, Major P. Kenyon
 Smith, R. W. (Aber'd'n & Kinc'dine, C.)
 Smith-Carlington, Neville W.
 Smithers, Waldron
 Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
 Sprot, Sir Alexander
 Stanley, Lieut.-Colonel Rt. Hon. G. F.
 Stanley, Lord (Fyde)
 Stanley, Hon. O. F. G. (Westm'eland)
 Steel, Major Samuel Strang
 Streatfield, Captain S. R.
 Styles, Captain H. Walter
 Sueter, Rear-Admiral Murray Fraser
 Suggden, Sir Wilfrid
 Sykes, Major-Gen. Sir Frederick H.
 Tasker, R. Inigo.
 Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
 Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
 Tinne, J. A.
 Tryon, Rt. Hon. George Clement
 Wallace, Captain D. E.
 Ward, Lt.-Col. A. L. (Kingston-on-Hull)
 Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
 Waterhouse, Captain Charles
 Watson, Sir F. (Pudsey and Otley)
 Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
 Watts, Dr. T.
 Wells, S. R.
 Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
 White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dalrymple
 Williams, A. M. (Cornwall, Northern)
 Williams, Com. C. (Devon, Torquay)
 Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
 Wilson, R. R. (Stafford, Litchfield)
 Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
 Winterton, Rt. Hon. Earl
 Wise, Sir Fredric
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Womersley, W. J.
 Wood, B. C. (Somerset, Bridgwater)
 Wood, E. (Chester, Stalyb'ge & Hyde)
 Wragg, Herbert
 Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.
 Young, Rt. Hon. Sir Hilton (Norwich)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Major Sir Harry Barnston and
 Captain Viscount Curzon.

Colonel ASHLEY: I beg to move, at the end of the Clause to insert the words:

"(2) No duty shall be payable under the said Section thirteen in respect of vehicles used for no purpose other than the haulage of lifeboats and the conveyance of the necessary gear of the lifeboats which are being hauled."

I am sure this proposal will meet with the approval of the Committee. It simply means that lorries which are used for hauling lifeboats up and down the beach and to bring the necessary gear to enable lifeboats to go out shall be exempted from this duty.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

CLAUSE 12.—(Extension of Section 16 of Finance Act, 1921.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Sir HILTON YOUNG: Before we pass this Clause, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is always so helpful and so lucid, to tell us briefly what its effect is and why it is necessary. If it were possible for the uninitiated to discover, by any amount of research and hard work, what the effect of it is, I would not venture to trouble the right hon. Gentleman, but, as this Clause stands, it is quite impossible for the uninitiated to discover what its provisions mean, and, under the circumstances, I do not think it will be a waste of time if the right hon. Gentleman tells us what in effect we are voting upon.

Commander WILLIAMS: This Clause affects a considerable number of people, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will naturally wish to give the House that full and complete information which is usually given by the Treasury.

[Commander Williams.]

It will be noted that this Clause deals with methylated spirits. These, I believe, are used by certain people for various causes. Rumour has it that sometimes it is used by teetotalers to enable them to rouse themselves for taking part in debates and so forth. I have no knowledge of that part of the subject, but I would ask if, under this Clause, teetotalers will be prevented in any way from getting this commodity. I do not know if this Clause will help the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remove his deficit in any way or whether it is merely a part of the machinery of the Bill.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): I would like to express my gratitude to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Torquay (Commander Williams) for enlightening the Committee and for giving me an opportunity to dive into the recesses of my box. I do not know that the question which was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Norwich (Sir Hilton Young) really requires very much elucidation, because the Clause does very little. But what it does do is very necessary. Hitherto, the regulation of the manufacture of spirits has been governed by the Spirits Act. That Act was placed on the Statute Book at a time when there was comparatively little use made of spirits for industrial manufacturing purposes. It is quite true, as has been pointed out by a writer in the "Times," that it is not by any means a modern habit to use spirits in industry, but the amount used until comparatively recently was inconsiderable, I think about 4 per cent. of the total consumption. Now things have altered, and a very considerable use is being made of spirits for different forms of manufacture. We have reason to believe that we are on the eve of a very much larger development of its use. If the Spirits Act, which imposes very strict regulations upon the production and the method of production of spirits, remained unmodified, it would be very hampering to the use of spirits for industrial purposes. Consequently, we are asking the Committee to give us much wider powers of discretion in regard to the use for industrial purposes of alcohol in its various forms, while safeguarding the revenue, of course, from any encroachment upon it when spirits are used as a beverage. We are asking the Committee to give us this power in order that different forms of alcohol may be produced and handled, because one of the most difficult and restricted parts of the Act relates to the handling of it. If this Clause, with other Clauses which have been introduced, will relieve industry from that burden I have no doubt the Committee will readily agree to it.

Mr. STEPHEN: I listened with interest to the explanation of the Financial Secretary, but there is one point on which I am not quite clear. I should like to ask him whether this is going to make any difference to the revenue. I understand that the provisions which have been in operation in past years have been found to be rather limited and, consequently, they are to be extended in order to provide for the greater use of alcohol and spirits in connection with various processes. Are we to understand that there will be no difference to the revenue one way or the other?

Mr. McNEILL: That is so. It will have no effect on the revenue one way or the other.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clauses 13 (Provisions with respect to certain processes of distillation), 14 (Amendment as to allowances in respect of spirits), 15 (Power to make regulations requiring returns with respect to importation, etc., of certain alcohols), and 16 (Bottling of spirits in warehouse), ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 17.—(Income Tax and Super-tax for 1927-28.)

The following Amendment stood on the Order Paper in the name of Sir BASIL PETO:

In page 7, line 35, to leave out the words "four shillings" and to insert instead thereof the words "three shillings and sixpence."

Sir EDWARD LIFFE: This Amendment was placed on the Order Paper by the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Sir B. Peto) in order to raise the question of the co-operative societies and the Income Tax.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. James Hope): I think that matter should be raised on the Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill." This is an Amendment purely for a reduction.

Sir WILLIAM PERRING: I desire to raise a similar point to that of my hon. Friend, but if you rule that it would be desirable we should raise the point on the Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," I prefer to wait.

The CHAIRMAN: The Amendment raises the question of the difference between four shillings and three shillings and sixpence. If it be desired to raise the question of Income Tax generally, that must be raised on the Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Sir W. PERRING: I desire to raise the question of the incidence of the taxation and the inequality which exists under the present system.

The CHAIRMAN: It would be possible to raise that point on the Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Sir E. ILIFFE: I desire to raise the question of the co-operative societies and Income Tax. There is a large body of opinion in this House and in the country which thinks it is unfair that a large body of traders should have any special privileges in regard to Income Tax. There is a great deal of difference as to the amount of revenue which is lost to the Treasury by this privilege to co-operative societies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates that loss at £100,000 per annum, others estimate the loss at something in excess of £500,000 per annum, while the hon. Member for Hillsborough (Mr. A. V. Alexander) told us the other day that the co-operative societies under the present system actually pay more in Income Tax than other traders. It is apparent, therefore, that there is a great diversity of opinion as to how much co-operative societies do benefit by the privileges they possess, and I think it is quite clear that there is a case for an inquiry.

It is very difficult to estimate what the profits of the co-operative societies are to-day. That is largely due to the system of depreciation. The national programme of the co-operative societies encourages very liberal depreciation. The depreciation recommended is 2½ per cent. on buildings and shops, 10 per cent. on fixed stock and plant, and 20 per cent. on rolling stock. This depreciation is recommended to be on the original value of these buildings, shops and plants, as the value of these assets in the accounts issued by the Co-operative Union is something like £47,000,000 it is quite clear that if this system is rigidly carried out, some £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 can be depreciated, which is much in excess of the amount by which the ordinary trader is allowed to depreciate his assets. Therefore, I feel that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to appoint a Departmental Committee to examine the profits of these societies, and issue a statement showing exactly what profits they are making as computed for Income Tax purposes, what tax they are paying at the present time, and what tax they would be called upon to pay if they were taxed in the same way as their competitors.

There is also a political aspect of this matter. At the present time, certain contributions are made to the Co-operative Party, and it seems to me that it is quite possible in the future that further contributions may be made to the Labour party. It seems to me these contributions ought to be made out of the profits made by the co-operative societies and those profits ought to be taxed under Schedule D. If I make a contribution to the Unionist party, I have to pay Super-tax and Income Tax, and they ought to be called upon to pay Income Tax on their profits. I never could understand why co-operative societies do not readily agree with this view, because it seems to me that in the first place it is equitable and, in the second place, it affects them very little. If the Chancellor's Estimate be correct, the only effect on the co-operative societies would be that it would cost them one-tenth of a penny in the pound upon their sales.

I do not propose to go into the details regarding this taxation. I made a speech on the matter some two months ago, and went into the question rather fully. I would like, however, in order to avoid a certain amount of discussion to admit straight away that the dividends to the purchasers are not in my opinion profits which are subject to taxation, because they do in fact constitute a reduction in the purchase price. Secondly, it is quite clear that the interest which is paid on the capital invested by members of the co-operative societies is at present subject to Income Tax. The part which escapes taxation consists of the profits which are being put to reserve, and not distributed in any way and the amount represented by over depreciation, which does not at present appear as profits at all. In this connection one must remember that recently co-operative societies have been purchasing a considerable number of competitive businesses, businesses which before they were bought by the co-operative movement had been paying Income Tax under Schedule D. The price one gives for a business must depend, not only on the profits of the business, but on the amount of the profits one is able to retain, and if a co-operative society can retain a larger share of the profits than any independent purchaser could retain, the co-operative society must always outbid anyone else.

[Sir E. Iliffe.]

We may be told the law does not tax profits arising from a mutual transaction. I believe that is usually called the principle of mutuality. I submit that that law cannot apply to co-operative societies, because the mutuality has been so greatly diluted. There are 5,000,000 members of co-operative societies, which serve 15,000,000 consumers. That means that a third of the population of the country are served by co-operative societies to-day. We have been told that co-operative societies do not pay Income Tax under Schedule D. I do not think that is true in the case of every part of their enterprise. The co-operative movement has a colliery at Shilbottle. Up to 1926 mines were assessed under "Concerns, 3," of Schedule "A" on the basis of the five years' average, but under Section 28 of the Finance Act, 1926, mines ceased to be chargeable under Schedule "A," and have become chargeable under Case 1 of Schedule "D." Societies being exempt from Schedule "D," one might presume that they would escape assessment, but that is not so. In order to prevent this, there is a proviso to Section 28 whereby exemption under Schedule "D" is not extended to cover income transferred from "A" to "D," and I understand that to-day the mines are actually paying Income Tax under Schedule "D." What I desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that not only shall one section of the co-operative movement be assessed to Income Tax under Schedule "D," but every section of the movement, in the same way as are other traders. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to give the House the assurance that he will appoint a Departmental Committee to go into the question and issue a considered statement on the matter.

Mr. HANNON: I rise to support the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for the Tamworth Division (Sir E. Iliffe). This question of the equitable taxation of co-operative societies has been before Parliament on many occasions, and those of us who feel that co-operative societies vis-à-vis the ordinary retail trade enjoy a preferential position think the time has come for an inquiry to ascertain the precise circumstances under which they carry on their trade in relation to the collection of the revenue. My hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth has given a great deal of time and thought to the examination of this problem, and I think the facts he has submitted to-night must have made a considerable impression upon the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We are not asking for any particular penalisation of co-operative societies. As my hon. Friend pointed out, there is no suggestion of asking that co-operative societies should pay Income Tax on the dividends which in the ordinary course of their business they give to their members; but we feel very strongly that the co-operative society, which not merely confines its operations to its own members, but competes with the ordinary trader and canvasses for business as against the ordinary retail trader, should certainly be brought under the operation of the ordinary taxation system of this country.

In Birmingham, we have a very great co-operative society, and, within the limits of real co-operation, I have always been an ardent advocate of co-operation among the working classes of this country. In this particular case, however, and, indeed, in many others throughout the country, you have the example of this great enterprise acquiring large businesses which were previously carried on by private enterprise, absorbing them into their co-operative network, and then at once securing immunity from payment of the ordinary taxation which was incidental to the previous conduct of those businesses in private hands. I do not think that that, in competition with the ordinary trader, is really a position which the co-operative society ought to occupy, and I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough (Mr. A. V. Alexander), who in this House is the very respected and eminent protagonist of the interests of the co-operative movement, would, in justice to his own self-respect, like to feel that his great movement was not enjoying any particular advantage at the expense of the ordinary private traders in this country.

The co-operative societies advertise that you deal only with "co-ops"—I am using the ordinary vernacular phrase employed by co-operative societies—but at the same time, you find in some of the provincial newspapers whole-page advertisements inviting people to deal with co-operative societies, and we have no means of ascertaining whether in point of fact bona fide membership of a co-operative society is established before such transactions are carried out; and that is something which a Departmental Committee of the quality suggested by my hon. Friend would certainly help to determine. I, as an old co-operator myself, on the side of productive co-operation, and, as one who gave many years of his life to preaching co-operation among farmers, am the last person in this House to say a single word that would be unfair to the co-operative movement, but when I find, in my own city of Birmingham, this great organisation constantly carrying on its work in conflict with the ordinary retail trader, who has to struggle with the payment of rates and taxes, and otherwise to discharge his obligations as a citizen, I think the least that might be asked from the State is that both sets of traders should be put exactly on the same level in relation to the collection of the revenue which maintains the whole administrative machinery of this country.

Therefore, with great respect, I submit to the Committee and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the time has come when some impartial inquiry, giving every possible consideration to the bona fide interests of co-operative societies, on the original principle on which they were established, should be undertaken to examine to what extent the business is conducted without any loss to the revenue, while at the same time conforming to the ordinary principles which govern the trade of other people in this country. That, I think, is a perfectly fair proposition to submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course, he pointed out to us that we have supplied him with a great deal of useful information, but it is one of the qualities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, while the information supplied to him is always of the most admirable quality, he very often does not accept it at all, and I am not quite certain that he accepted the whole substance of the Daniell Memorandum which my hon. Friend and others presented to him on this subject. But, after the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth, I think the Chancellor will see the plain justice of the suggestion we are making to him, not that he should interfere in this Finance Bill with co-operative societies, but that he should have an investigation carried out which will satisfy the whole community, including co-operators themselves, that they are not in any respect receiving special advantages from the State which place them in a preferential position in contrast with other citizens who have to pay taxes. That is the proposal we have submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That is the whole project put forward by my hon. Friend, and I very much hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see the propriety and, indeed, the justice, of acceding to the suggestion that has been made to him.

Marquess of HARTINGTON: My object in speaking on this Clause is not so much to deprive my right hon. Friend of all revenue from Income Tax and Super-tax, which would, I understand, be the effect if the Clause were negatived, as to call attention to the very real injustice which arises under the present system of collecting Income Tax and, if possible, to move my right hon. Friend to an act of clemency. I quarrel particularly with Sub-section (2), which perpetuates all the various enactments of the past with regard to the collection of Income Tax and Super-tax. I have taken the earliest moment of raising the question of the machinery of these taxes, because I think it is very important that before the Committee authorises the continuance of this machinery for another year we should have some statement from my right hon. Friend as to his intentions in the matter.

[Marquess of Hartington.]

It is a matter of universal complaint, and it is even admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the enactments with regard to the collection of Income Tax and Super-tax are drafted in such a way as to be almost completely unintelligible to the people who have to pay the taxes. I want, in passing, to protest against being governed in an alien language, in the language of a small body of men, aloof from the industrial and commercial life of the nation, who regard the main body of the citizens of the country as having one function and one function only, that of producing more and more revenue in ever-increasing quantities to satisfy their own ever-increasing demands. My right hon. Friend will possibly tell us that that is inevitable and that it is impossible to re-draft the various enactments relating to Income Tax and Super-tax in such a way that they will be easily understood of the people. That may or may not be so, but there is a widespread suspicion in the country that the revenue authorities purposely keep these Acts in an unintelligible form because they realise very large sums indeed in excess of what they are strictly entitled to realise. If it is indeed the fact that it is impossible to re-draft these various enactments in plain English, I most earnestly hope my right hon. Friend will give the Committee some assurance that the cost of discovering what they really mean shall be borne, not by some unfortunate individual taxpayer, as has so often been the case in the past, but by the main body of the taxpayers.

It has long been an injustice—I think that this has also been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman—that the taxpayer who feels that he is aggrieved may take his case to the General or Special Commissioners, and win his case, and again and again it has happened that the revenue authorities have appealed until it becomes impossible for the ordinary taxpayer to go on. There have been very many cases where the taxpayer has won his appeal, but has lost the benefit of it because he has been unable to face the risks and the costs of further litigation. Law costs entail an immense burden, and it is impossible for very many people to face the risk, and, as my right hon. Friend very well knows, even if the taxpayer ultimately wins his case and is awarded costs, the taxed costs do not amount to anything like the total expenses he is called upon to bear.

Last year my right hon. Friend received an influential deputation on this subject, which included, I think, some hon. Members of this House. With the dexterity which we are accustomed to expect from him, he sent that deputation away almost satisfied, but completely empty. The injustice was a severe one then, but if this year's Finance Bill goes through, it will be infinitely worse. My right hon. Friend in introducing his Bill claimed with what seemed to be some show of satisfaction, that he might say with safety, that few people would understand its language. I think that anyone who studies this Finance Bill will agree with my right hon. Friend that in that respect, at any rate, his claims for this year's Finance Bill are more than justified.

When he received the deputation last year he pointed out, in reply to their representations, that same injustice existed in other things. I think I have got his words:

“In all other fields of controversy where a person of small means fought against the large and rich corporations,”

I would urge in reply to that, first, that two wrongs do not make one right, and, secondly—and it is a very much stronger point—that in no other field of controversy is it one of the parties which itself has framed the legislation which is the subject of the dispute. That is my contention. Parliament may possibly have a right to frame unintelligible legislation if it sees fit to do so, but, I think, it can hardly be contended that Parliament has a right to frame legislation which cannot be understood by the mass of the people who are affected by that legislation, and then to insist that the cost of finding out what it really does mean shall be borne by certain selected individuals.

I believe that my right hon. Friend can make a concession on this point without incurring any substantially increased burden of law costs. The dice are so heavily loaded in his favour now that he can afford to give away an ounce or two. I need not remind him that it is now the law that if a taxpayer feels himself aggrieved, and goes before the Special or General Commissioners, and they find against him on a question of fact, no further appeal is open to him.

That avenue is closed, and quite rightly. I do not quarrel with that. It is only when the question of the interpretation of the law arises that an appeal is possible, and it is obviously desirable where you have one of these very difficult and complicated questions of the interpretation of the law that an authoritative and final ruling should be obtained. That means a decision by the House of Lords. I do not complain: it is obviously desirable that these rulings should be obtained, but what is unjust is, that the very heavy cost of obtaining a ruling of this kind, which it is in the interests of the general body of the taxpayers to obtain, should be borne by an individual and not by the general body. I do not suggest, and I would not expect my right hon. Friend to accept it if I did, that the cost of all appeals should be borne by the revenue authorities. I do think it reasonable to suggest that where the Crown appeals from the decision of the Special or General Commissioners—and I think it is a specially reasonable suggestion in view of this year's extremely complicated legislation—the Chancellor should give us some assurance before we go any further that it should be the Crown that bears the cost of both parties.

It is not and cannot be just that the Crown should win cases—and it very often has done in the past—merely in default of the ability of some particular taxpayer to go to appeal and again to the House of Lords. The risk he runs in most cases vastly exceeds the amount which is at stake. Cases of the kind I have in mind are not fought to wring a few pounds from a taxpayer, but to get a ruling on a principle, and they are of benefit to the whole body of taxpayers and it is right that they should pay the cost.

It is more than 600 years since the English people assimilated their Norman conquerors and ceased to groan under the burden of being governed by an alien race in an alien language. As the paintings which have just been unveiled in St. Stephen's Hall may remind us at a time when we need reminding, it is more than 400 years since the sources and origins of our religion became available to us in the common tongue, and now, after all these years, we are again having to complain that our temporal and spiritual rulers are attempting to govern us in a language which we cannot understand. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman's Norman blood, which at this season of the year in particular, is even more in evidence than his kind heart or simple faith, will not induce him to refuse the rather small concession which I ask. I would remind him of the fact that there have been some rumours of discontent, that some sullen mutterings of the Saxon serfs, must already have penetrated his castle walls.

The CHAIRMAN: The argument of the Noble Lord appears to be a little obscure, but I doubt if it is relevant to the re-enactment of the Income Tax.

Marquess of HARTINGTON: I have only three more words to say. There have been rumours that the burden of the Income Tax and the complexity of the enactments by which the tax is collected have caused complaint. I believe some murmurs of discontent have reached the right hon. Gentleman's ears, and I would urge that a wise concession now might not only save him a great deal of trouble but would remove a really severe injustice.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The moving peroration to which we have just listened must, I regret, to some extent leave me unmoved. The question of the costs which should be held in such cases has often been discussed, and debated; and, as my Noble Friend reminded us, I received a deputation on this subject only a year ago. It is not the fact that it is the practice of the Inland Revenue to wear down the poor appealing taxpayers by carrying them on from Court to Court until their funds are exhausted. When test cases are taken up and encouraged in order to arrive at a general decision of the law we have the discretion, and frequently use it, to pay the costs of the other side in whole or in part; but in regard to cases which are not test cases, but which are controversial disputes designed to settle a case as between the Crown and a particular party rather than arrive at an interpretation of the law, it seems to me to be a very moderate claim that costs should follow the judgment. In ordinary cases the Crown does not pay costs whether it wins or loses, but in the Income Tax sphere it does pay them if the judgment goes against it. But to pay costs in all cases would surely be to foster and incubate litigation against the Crown to an extent which, though it might be highly satisfactory to many of our hon. and learned Friends who are present, would, I am sure, result in a vast amount of needless disputation in the Courts, and a very considerable addition to those burdens of the general taxpayer in regard to which my Noble Friend has so feelingly descanted.

[Mr. Churchill.]

When my Noble Friend speaks of the importance of writing the Income Tax laws in a tongue understood of the people, I am entirely in accord with him, and I am setting up, as I mentioned in the Budget Speech, a highly expert Committee of lawyers, who will have the fullest assistance which can be rendered them by gifted laymen, for the express purpose of consolidating and re-writing this immense tangle of Income Tax laws which has grown up, year after year, in the last three or four generations, and which rolls on like a snowball from Session to Session with ever-growing additions and complexities. It is believed that that Committee might, in the course of the next five years, make a considerable inroad on this subject, and I have arranged for its work to be expedited as much as possible, and for interim Reports to be issued in order that we may simplify as far as possible our legislation. But I should like to point out that though we might simplify the statement of the purpose of a Clause in the Bill from the literary point of view, and make it very easily apprehended by the ordinary reader, yet when that came to be interpreted in the Courts it might lead to far greater difficulties of interpretation and argument than arise when the recognised and highly respectable jargon and rigmarole of a great profession is employed.

I come to the other question which has been raised, and here I must endeavour to compress into a few sentences what is an immensely interesting and important topic. I have given close attention to this allegation that the co-operative societies do not pay their proper share of the Income Tax, and I have used the full machinery of the Inland Revenue to explore that subject. In the result I have been convinced that they very nearly pay the full tax that could be exacted from them under the law, and I will just explain this. I do not want to keep back the hon. Member for Hillsborough (Mr. A. V. Alexander) who is preparing to make a vigorous speech, but I hope that if what I am saying expresses, to some extent, the views he is going to express, he will not think it necessary to go over that ground a second time. The public accounts of the trading co-operative societies show that, as a result of the year's working, they had about £21,000,000 in hand. Of this £21,000,000, they paid away £14,000,000 as discount on purchases. This sum of £14,000,000 is usually described as dividend. This "divi," which is a very well-known phrase—

Mr. E. BROWN: It is understood by the common people.

Mr. CHURCHILL: It is well understood as "divi." This "divi." cannot possibly be charged to Income Tax. It is a trade discount which is immune in every sphere of our taxation schemes from Income Tax. Income Tax has never been charged on trade discounts, and to do so would upset the whole of the long-established trading methods of this country. If it were attempted to charge Income Tax on trade discounts, obviously the attempt would be defeated by the simple process of selling the article at a cheaper price. So much for £14,000,000. If, however, it were decided to alter the law in regard to trade discounts, then, although you might surcharge the individual co-operators with their "divi." for the purpose of Income Tax, it would be found that in nearly every case they are below the Income Tax level, and nothing would come of it. It is calculated that from the whole process only £100,000 would be recovered, and to achieve that £100,000 it would be necessary to overturn the long-established system by which trade discounts are immune from Income Tax.

A sum of £14,000,000 taken from £21,000,000 leaves £7,000,000. That £7,000,000 can be accurately described as the societies' profits. Of this £7,000,000, they distribute something like £4,000,000 every year to their shareholders as interest on shares. When an ordinary company pays a dividend to its shareholders, Income Tax is deducted, as everyone knows, at the source, and the shareholder gets a lesser sum. In the case of co-operative societies, a different process prevails. So many of their shareholders are below the Income Tax level that it would be an infinitely more costly business to deduct the Income Tax at the source and then have all these small repayment claims from millions of people. Instead of that, the tax is not deducted at the source but individual shareholders in the co-operative societies are forced to include their profits in their Income Tax returns, if they pay Income Tax. If they do pay Income Tax the tax is recovered accordingly. So much for the 11.0 p.m. £4,000,000, which, taken from £7,000,000, leaves £3,000,000.

Now on the £3,000,000, or actually a little more than £3,000,000, which remain to be accounted for, Income Tax is charged at the standard rate of £650,000. As a matter of fact, the slightly different system by which co-operative societies are taxed, for reasons I have explained, yields, mainly under Schedule A, £550,000 a year. So that under the present system of taxation they pay within £100,000 of what the strict working of the ordinary law would exact from any other similar trading body. Now, in order to obtain this £100,000 by which the taxation paid by these societies falls short of the total, it would be necessary to impinge upon the principle of mutual trading which rules at the present time over a very wide sphere, and it would not be worth while to renounce that principle and to antagonise a very large body of citizens for a comparative small result. I have done my very best to test these figures and I do not think they could be changed. Therefore, I do not see what an inquiry could do. The Inland Revenue and the Government are quite impartial in this matter. They have no reason to conceal any fact whatever. One can, indeed, feel sympathy with the traders who find themselves oppressed by the immense collective power of these co-operative bodies which unite all the force of massed capital and whose shareholders do not pay Income Tax individually, because they are below the Income Tax level. Nevertheless, full and impartial administration of the law would only disclose a difference of £100,000.

I do not see why this great body of co-operators themselves do not come forward to make an endeavour to bridge this gap. I do not see why this should bring a laugh, because it is hardly worth while to have this criticism levelled at them that with all their immense wealth they are not contributing the standard rate of taxation to the revenue. It would be more in accordance with their dignity and prosperity if they were, in some way or other, by consultation or otherwise, to bring their taxation up to the exact level of ordinary trading concerns so that the Inland Revenue should be able to say that they took no part whatever in discriminating between different trading bodies in the country. I have tried to place before the Committee the outstanding point of this important question, and I hope that the Committee will see that the Government must decline to accept the proposal to set up an inquiry which could yield no result.

Mr. A. V. ALEXANDER: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be alarmed by the vigorous speech we have heard this evening. I thank him for his statement of the principles which the Government have decided to observe in regard to the co-operative societies. There were one or two things in the close of his speech to which, I am sure, he will expect me to take exception. It is a curious thing that a Chancellor of the Exchequer, standing in the House when the means of bringing revenue and expenditure by means of taxation is discussed, should invite a section of the community to make a voluntary contribution. That is rather a new method of raising direct taxation, and he will hardly expect that a body of five-and-a-quarter million people in this country, most of them of the working class type and most of them on the standard of life that can bear no more taxation, will welcome with enthusiasm the suggestion that they should make a voluntary contribution when successive Chancellors have reduced the Income Tax from 6s. to 4s. in the £.

[Mr. Alexander.]

I will also ask him to remember that, so far, he has submitted the estimated figures. There is a strong view in the co-operative movement that there was no such capital at all, and I would ask him to consider it for a moment or two. In the first place, in regard to the Inland Revenue figures, I want to point out that though the Member for Tamworth (Sir E. Iliffe) and the Member for Moseley (Mr. Hannon) have given great attention to the subject, their figures are not to be relied upon. All they do is to take a mass of figures and draw conclusions, whereas the Inland Revenue, upon whom the Chancellor relies, have this advantage that, as the result of the Corporation Profits Tax legislation of 1920-21, Somerset House has for two financial years all the balance sheets of all the societies in the country. They base their estimate on the actual details of trading balances which they have examined, and if you take the salaries to-day, we take far more under Schedule A than is estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has admitted clearly that if you attempted to assess under Schedule E at the source, you would find a great difficulty in regard to people who are below the tax limit. But, supposing the Chancellor, either by consent or by imposition, levied a sum of £100,000 or £200,000 of Income Tax, how could he refuse the right of any individual member of the movement who felt himself overtaxed to claim this rebate? In regard to the inquiry, the Taxation Committee of 1905 and the Royal Commission of 1919 said that private traders had made their case, and certainly the Revenue would not gain in any way by an assessment. That provision, I believe, still holds good. There are many things in the speech of the hon. Member for Tamworth and the hon. Member for Moseley that ought to be answered, but if the point is raised again, as they are serious points, I reserve the right to reply to them.

Sir W. PERRING: I am extremely disappointed with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As far as it has been possible to analyse the balance sheets of the co-operative societies, the conclusion has been come to that £100,000 was profit. It is well known that the turnover of the co-operative societies is now bordering on £300,000,000. I have in my hand the balance sheet of the London Co-operative Society, which represents only £5,000,000 out of that £300,000,000. It is interesting to note that in this last half-yearly balance sheet, called the Fourteenth Report, there is shown a profit of £250,000 in the half year, which means £500,000 on the whole year. Out of that sum they are only distributing in the half year £140,000. Having made provision for the interest on the capital, they anticipate a profit in the half-year of £68,000. If that is the anticipated profit shown on the balance sheet of the London Co-operative Society on a turnover of £5,000,000, that shows that the sum involved is out of all proportion to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there is only £100,000, spread over this large turnover in the country. I will proceed just a little further in the analysis of this £68,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER: I do not want to curtail the discussion, but it might help if I pointed out that those reserves are within the principle of mutuality outlined by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The profit is taxable profit, and the whole of the surplus that accrues is a surplus for mutual payment to members.

Sir W. PERRING: We challenge the principle of mutuality in this Debate. I desire to point out, in an endeavour to arrive at what are the anticipated profits, that on this very balance sheet there is a capital account of £1,600,000 for land, plant, and buildings, and during the period of the London Co-operative Society's activities they have reduced this sum by 33 per cent. I quite admit, from a financial point of view, that may be a very wise policy for the co-operative societies, but what I desire the Chancellor of the Exchequer to observe is that any ordinary private trader is not allowed, for the purposes of Income Tax, to write down his plant, land and buildings in that way. Every item that he writes down—his plant, buildings and stock—is brought into account for purposes of Income Tax, and if this policy is pursued for another 10 or 15 years, there is every indication that the increasing activities of the co-operative societies, with their swelling and increasing profits, will enable those societies ultimately to write off all their capital account. That might be all very well, but, speaking as a trader, and recognising that the primary purpose of the co-operative movement is to send every trader out of business, it is important to remember that the co-operative societies are allowed, under the present system of taxation, so to put to reserve in writing down their assets and using the additional capital for the development of their business, that they are building up a system which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be compelled to take into consideration. In his speech last June the right hon. Gentleman said that he desired to secure the taxes of the country with the minimum political disputation. That suggests that he does not want to disturb the members of the co-operative societies, on the ground that it would stir up a lot of trouble. If this system is developed until the turnover is doubled, and there is every indication that it will, then the right hon. Gentleman will have far greater difficulty in dealing with this problem in the future than he has to-day. We feel that an inquiry into the items to which I have referred would reveal the fact that the reserves and undistributed profits are largely in excess of the figure given the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the staff at the Treasury. He would recognise, if he analysed the figures—

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have given prolonged study to this very question, and have endeavoured to make sure that the figures were accurate.

Sir W. PERRING: I am delighted to hear that the right hon. Gentleman has examined these figures. The traders of the country are certainly not satisfied with the figures mentioned by the Chancellor, and assuming that it is only £100,000, which I challenge, the right hon. Gentleman has not been unmindful of sums less than that amount, and he is developing a system by which he desires to make those who have escaped pay their proper proportion of Income Tax.

This desire for increased revenue and the necessity to bring into the net all those who have escaped, should be extended to the members of the co-operative movement, and, having regard to the enormous burdens which the traders of the country have to bear, it is unfair that any section should be able to develop a system of trading without paying their quota to the revenue. In view of the exigencies of taxation, and the development of this movement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be compelled in the future in equity to all concerned to bring into our taxation these reserves and undistributed profits.

Sir HENRY BUCKINGHAM: I should like to follow my hon. Friend in the eloquent appeal he has made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but at this late hour I will not do so, as I have had the opportunity of expressing my views to him on a former occasion. My only object in rising is to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that the statutory allowances for repairs and maintenance claims will expire in April, 1928, unless Parliament otherwise determines, and I should like to know whether the Chancellor proposes to deal with this matter before next April. The Budget will not have been introduced by then, and an awkward situation may arise if by April of next year Parliament has not otherwise determined. These statutory allowances will automatically cease. I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will be good enough to take the matter into consideration in the meantime.

Mr. CHURCHILL: My hon. Friend has been good enough in connection with this Finance Bill to give me an opportunity of referring to a great many points, and I have profited by his action to look into them. I do not, however, recollect that this was one of the subjects which he suggested to me in any of our talks, nor, I think, has attention been drawn to it in any other way. This would appear to be a somewhat recondite and highly technical matter, and perhaps he will agree that should any statement upon it be necessary, it can be deferred until the Report stage is reached.

Sir H. BUCKINGHAM: I am only anxious that the matter should be placed on record.

Sir HILTON YOUNG: There is, I think, one observation to be made in reference to the unintelligibility of Income Tax legislation to which the Noble Lord the Member for Western Derbyshire (Marquess of Hartington) has called such well-deserved attention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that it is impossible in the present state of Income Tax law to deal with other than legal phraseology for the purposes of such legislation. If I may say so, without assumption, I think he is quite right. He said further that it is not impossible to interpret such terms in a more literary and intelligible form. I have no doubt that is done year by year by the able officials of the Inland Revenue but, he added, that the more intelligible form would be useless for the purposes of legislation. While that is no doubt true, the suggestion I have to make is that the more intelligible and literary form would be of great use to Members if given in a White Paper. I think it is universally admitted that Income Tax legislation has become utterly unintelligible to the ordinary person. For purposes of illustration, let me refer to Clause 26 of this Bill. The average citizen may read it through, right side foremost or back side foremost, and yet be totally unable to attach any meaning to it. It is little short of a public outrage that we should be called on to legislate about things that we cannot understand, and it would be to the advantage of the public, if it is possible to make them intelligible to the House, by giving us first aid in the form of a White Paper, that it should be done. There may be a question of the time not having arrived for such a precedent, but the suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

* * * * *

[For continuation of Proceedings, see Official Report, Friday, 1st July.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 30th June, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

FINANCE BILL.

Further considered in Committee.

Progress, 28th June.

[Continuation of Official Report, from Col. 730, Thursday, 30th June, 1927.]CLAUSE 18.—(Amendment as to date of payment of tax under Schedule A.)Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause stand part of the Bill.”

Sir JOHN MARRIOTT: This Clause, to which I wish to refer briefly, may not be one of the most important Clauses in the Bill, but it is one of the most characteristic, and it is one which, in my opinion, ought not to be added to the Bill without some words of explanation. I say it is one of the most characteristic Clauses of the Bill, and if I had to characterise this Bill in a sentence, I should describe it as a Bill for papering over the cracks. No one can question the existence of the cracks, they are large and gaping, in the potential revenue of the year. I imagine the Chancellor must have arrived at his decision to insert this Clause by some such argument as this. He said to himself, I imagine, “I cannot and I must not appear to increase taxation; I must not frighten the consumer of the necessities of life by adding to indirect taxation; I must not alarm the income tax payer; but additional taxation, by hook or by crook, I must have. I will get it honestly if I can, and otherwise if I cannot.”

He approached this problem with all his accustomed ingenuity. He designs, by camouflage, I take it, to conceal from the taxpayer the very deadly instrument of warfare by which he and his colleagues are going to be assailed. In this case we have one of the most ingenious of the many camouflages with which the Bill is adorned. This Clause proposes that Sub-section (2) of Section 157 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, a Section which provides that in the cases to which that Sub-section applies Income Tax shall be payable in two instalments, shall cease to have effect so far as it relates to tax chargeable under Schedule A:

“other than any tax so chargeable in respect of income which is, or is to be treated as, earned income.”

Most members of the Committee will recollect that under that Section 157 it was for the first time enacted that instead of Income Tax being payable in one instalment on or before the 1st January it should be payable in two equal instalments, the first on or before 1st January and the second on or before 1st July. This concession, for it was a concession, made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day applied not only to tax payable under Schedule A but to several other categories of Income and Property Tax. It applied to tax payable under Schedule B where it was charged in respect of lands occupied for husbandry only; and it was applicable to payments under Schedule D and Schedule E. But to this general concession made in the Act of 1918 there were two notable exceptions. The first was in the case of weekly wage-earners, whose tax was assessed as a rule half-yearly, and the other was in the case of railway companies, who paid under Schedule D by four quarterly instalments. The point that I want the Committee to observe is this: The concession, when it was made in 1918, was a concession granted practically to all payers of Income Tax, and was not then limited to payers under Schedule A alone. In this present Finance Bill, in order to make up the deficit to which I have alluded, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to take away the concession made under the Act of 1918 in regard to paying Income Tax in two half-yearly instalments, but to take it away from one class of taxpayers only, that is to say, those who are owners of land and owners of house property, whereas other taxpayers, who may be in an equally good or in many cases a far more favourable, position, are still left with the concession which was granted in 1918.

[Sir J. Marriott.]

I can easily believe that, in extenuation of the proposal made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be urged, and I believe it has been urged, that the concession in regard to payment under Schedule A in two equal half-yearly instalments was only introduced—and I imagine that this will be the argument of the Chancellor of Exchequer—at a moment when the standard rate of Income Tax stood at 5s. in the £, and when, therefore, it was not practicable to leave it to be paid in one sum, owing to the fact that many tenants would not be able to deduct the tax, as they are entitled to do, from the rent payable to the landlord. If, however, that had been the case, the concession I have named would have been made in 1918 only to payers of Income Tax under Schedule A, but, as I have already pointed out, it was a general concession made to all categories of Income Tax payers. Whatever the motive may have been when the concession was originally made in 1918, that concession is now to be withdrawn, and I suggest that the Clause as it stands is one which ought to be resisted on two grounds—firstly, on the ground that it is a manifest injustice to discriminate between one class of Income Tax payers and another, especially if you discriminate against those who are less able to pay; and, secondly, on the ground that it involves a very grave hardship to the particular class of taxpayers whom it will affect. It will involve hardship to them whether they are owners of agricultural property—and everyone knows their position to-day—or whether they are owners, particularly if they happen to be small owners, of small urban property.

As regards agricultural property, the position under the Bill of this year will be this: The landowner will have to find the whole of his tax under Schedule A for the year on 1st June. He will already have discharged the second half of his tax for the current year, that is to say, in July, 1927. In most cases agricultural rents are payable half yearly, at Michaelmas and Ladyday. Practically the whole of the rent payable at Michaelmas, 1927, will have gone in discharging the July instalment of this year and consequently the unfortunate landowner will have no funds at all out of which to pay his full year's Income Tax in January next. He will have either to borrow from his banker or run into debt in order to discharge his obligations to the Exchequer.

So much for the position of the agricultural landowner. I am going to add a word on behalf, not of the large landowner, not the great bloated capitalist, whom we are supposed particularly to represent, but the very large number of small owners of small property. Let us see the position in which they will be placed by this Bill. I will not go into particular illustrations. I would rather put the matter on this broad ground, that these owners of urban property are called upon to pay as Income Tax during the next twelve months, which is 50 per cent. in excess of the Income Tax they had to pay last year and 50 per cent. in excess of the Income Tax payable by any other class of Income Tax payers. I know the Chancellor of the Exchequer will do all he can—and he can do a great deal—by his ingenuity to camouflage this proposal, but no argument on his part can disguise the disagreeable fact that these unfortunate people, the landowner and the owner of urban property, will be called upon during the next twelve months—as a matter of fact during the next seven months—to pay 50 per cent. more Income Tax than they expected before the Budget was introduced. It is futile to attempt to comfort them with the assurance that this matter will be straightened out six months after the end of the world. I suggest that it should be straightened out before that time, and that is because they refuse that cold comfort the Chancellor suggested that I oppose the Clause.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: As far as I understand this Clause, it amounts to this, that those who in the opinion of hon. Member's opposite are guilty of the gross offence of owning heritable property are to be made to pay 18 months' taxation in 12 months. They are going to pay 50 per cent. more. They are to lend money to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by paying it six months ahead. How they are to borrow it from the banks, I do not know. Apparently, they will have to do it. I do think it is a very great hardship, and therefore I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to give us a better excuse for what he is doing than he gave to us in his Second Reading speech.

Mr. R. MORRISON: I desire very briefly, although I cannot do so with the same degree of eloquence, to support the case against this Clause, and I sincerely hope the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) and the hon. and learned Member for Argyll (Mr. Mcquisten) mean to press it. We shall know within a few moments whether they actually mean what they say, or whether they have only made speeches for the sake of speaking. If they are prepared to go into the Division Lobby, I am prepared to be one of the tellers. I say this in all seriousness, because it is a very serious matter. I suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that although there is no considerable amount of interest in this question at the present time, there will be a tremendous outcry about it next January and February, and it will lose thousands of votes to the Conservative party. I will tell the Committee how I think this is going to happen. [Interruption.] I do not usually indulge in political prophesy, but this is how it is going to occur. In most constituencies thousands of working-people have purchased their houses through the Small Dwellings Acquisition Act and through other schemes. They were called upon, as everybody knows, to put down from £50 upwards, and they have to pay the balance by instalments. The figures relating to persons who are buying their houses have been given in this House repeatedly by the Minister of Health, and they run into many thousands. The people who are doing this are respectable working people, most of whom have families, and it is because they have families that they experienced greater difficulties than other people in finding houses to rent. They have been compelled to buy their houses. Many of them have had to borrow money in order to enable them to make the necessary deposit, and the local authority or some enterprising builder has advanced the rest. The repayments these people, who are mostly of the artisan or working class, have to make, inclusive of rates, amount to from 24s. to 30s. per week. That money has to come from homes where the weekly income is £3, £3 10s., or £4 at the most. That is the instalment they have to pay under the Small Dwellings Acquisition Act. I should say that in my constituency there are 400 or 500 of these people, and I know that a great many people in the constituencies of other hon. Members are in a like position.

Mr. CHURCHILL: What is the scale of income of the class about which the hon. Member speaks?

Mr. MORRISON: The scale of income would be round about £200.

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is beneath the Income Tax limit.

Mr. MORRISON: I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that up to now, at any rate, though I have made endeavours on their behalf to get exemption from Schedule A, they have been compelled to pay it—even working men. I would sit down directly if the right hon. Gentleman would make a statement that the people who do not come under the ordinary Schedule for earned income are exempt from Schedule A. If he could do so this discussion would have been very useful. While the right hon. Gentleman is finding that information, I would only add that in having to pay the whole of the amount, which will amount to between £2 and £4 per annum, in one lump sum, it is going to cause a very great amount of distress to a number of people. It is going to cause them to fall into the hands of money-lenders or to fall behind with the instalments payable to the local authority. For all these reasons, I hope the hon. Gentleman who so eloquently presented the case against the Clause and the hon. Member who supported it will press it to a Division. I am sure every Member on this side of the House will gladly support them.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The hon. Member (Mr. Morrison) will be relieved to hear that no one who is below the Income Tax limit will be called upon to pay Schedule A, and the class of people he has described will be below the Income Tax limit. A married man with two children with £225 a year will be below the Income Tax limit, and can quite easily recover his Schedule A payment if it has been made. Therefore, the grievance of which the hon. Gentleman has been speaking has really been removed, so that any objection he has to voting for this Clause will fall with the grievance which he has expressed. I do not intend to go into the general question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) in a speech which, at one time, I was really afraid might not end until six months after the end of the world. I should like to say, however, that he made an excellent speech, and I was almost ready to wait so long. This is a very important Clause, for without this particular method of dealing with the difficulty we should undoubtedly have to face a substantial rise in the standard rate of the Income Tax. It is certain that next year we shall be in a better position, and therefore a method of this kind, the beneficial effects of which are only experienced for one year, is appropriate, and more appropriate to the present financial problem than the provision of a permanent tax. Although my hon. Friend has made a powerful speech, I have not, through the many channels open to me, been able to receive any serious body of complaint from any part of the country to this provision.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. MORRISON: Several of my colleagues agree with the statement I made that there are scores of artisans whose income is not sufficient for them to pay ordinary Income Tax, who are paying year by year Income Tax under Schedule A. Can I take it that if they are asked to pay any more they can get complete exemption?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Certainly. If, however, there be any doubt, the hon. Gentleman had better put me a question to which full publicity can be given.

Mr. SNOWDEN: What my hon. Friend refers to is the Income Tax upon the mortgage interest which must be paid by the person who receives the mortgage, and which can be deducted from the next payment of his interest. It is following the general practice of deduction, and so on.

Mr. CHURCHILL: You mean the tenant's deduction from the rent?

Mr. SNOWDEN: Not from the rent, but from the mortgage interest. The person who has bought his house, but has mortgage on it will have to pay—

Mr. CHURCHILL: But would recover?

Mr. SNOWDEN: And would recover, of course.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will issue instructions to the inspectors that claims should not be made from people whom they know quite well are not liable to pay. It is not so much that publicity on this matter is necessary among the rank and file of the people who are purchasing houses as that instructions should be given to the inspectors that they have no right to make these claims. I am not referring to the point made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden), who was referring to the mortgage interest. That is deducted or allowed for, and very rightly so. I am referring to the claims made by inspectors for what would be the rent if they were not paying the mortgage, and I am quite sure, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to notify the inspectors, they would carry out his instructions.

Mr. PETHICK-LAWRENCE: I should like to put one point to the Chancellor in regard to Schedule A and in respect to those people who are under the Income Tax exemption limit. It is perfectly true, of course, that if they are made to pay they can recover, but the question surely is whether they can be made to pay in the first instance, because if they can, and they can only recover after a time, that gives rise to difficulties which have been referred to, even though they have the right of subsequent recovery.

Mr. E. BROWN: I desire to call the Chancellor's attention to one small point. In trying to check the figures in the White Paper as to the £14,500,000 of extra revenue, in order to see how the total amount was made up, I found to my surprise that up to and including the year 1919-20 the yield of each Schedule A, B, C, D, and E was given separately in the abstract, but, for some reason that I have been unable to fathom, for each year since 1921 all of it is lumped together in one sum and only two divisions are given, namely, Super-tax and Income Tax. I call the Chancellor's attention to this, because it is a very great convenience to hon. Members who are trying to check the figures to have the amounts separately, as they were given before 1919.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 19 (Amendment of s. 20 of 12 and 13 Geo. 5, c. 17).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Major BIRCHALL: I wish to oppose this Clause for the following reason. No one is a greater master of the art of making people happy by legislation and taxes than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For instance, he puts a tax on imported goods and provides work for the people of this country, but in this particular Clause he falls from that high level, and the result of it will be that a very serious injury will be caused to a number of charities in this country. I am quite sure that most Members of the Committee fail to realize that this apparently innocent Clause is really a most injurious one. The language of it is typically officialese and practically unintelligible to the ordinary reader, but the effect of it, we are assured, will be to do real injury and damage to many of the most deserving charities of this country.

The thing works out in this way. Under the Finance Act of 1922—whether it was the intention or not does not matter at the moment—charities which are not subject to Income Tax have been enabled to reap very great benefits. This Clause abolishes these benefits. May I explain in a few words exactly what takes place. A man who desires to subscribe to a charity to the extent of £25 a year signs a deed under stamp, a definitely legal covenant or contract, to pay to that charity for not less than six and a half years the sum of £25 a year. He actually pays £20 to the charity, and sends it an officially marked form known as R 185, which shows that he has paid £5 in Income Tax. He thus pays £20 to the charity and £5 in Income Tax. The charity then presents that form at Somerset House, and the £5 is refunded. Although he subscribes £20, the charity benefits to the extent of £25. Under the Act the charities have increased their income by not less than 25 per cent. in all cases where the subscriber has been willing to sign a deed binding himself for not less than six and a half years. That process is to be stopped by this Clause, and the result upon the charities which have previously benefitted will be serious. What are these charities? Many of them are religious charities, with some of which I am connected. They are engaged in the building of churches, in religious work in foreign lands, and in payments to augment inadequate stipends. These charities have benefitted very largely under the Clause in the Act of 1922. Then there are charities connected with great works of social service which are admittedly for the benefit of the whole community. One of the largest beneficiaries is the League of Nations Union, which has a special income under this Clause of not less than £10,000 a year. A large number of subscribers have guaranteed to pay their subscriptions for not less than six and a-half years. The voluntary hospitals have the greatest difficulty in keeping up their income to meet increased charges and to maintain their efficiency. Their difficulty has been so great that the Government recently made them a grant of £500,000 in order to keep them from bankruptcy. These hospitals will be seriously affected by the absence of this Clause, and so will the great educational societies. I know quite intimately the condition of the great university of Leeds. They have a very large scheme under this Clause of the Act of 1922, whereby subscribers spread their subscriptions over a period of ten years. They have schemes for a building programme for the next ten years and are getting a very considerable income through the operation of the Clause. This is to be stopped. The Committee ought not to support the proposal in this Finance Bill without realising what they are doing. Charities have been exempted from Income Tax because they are regarded as objects beneficial to the State. Why, then, prevent this additional income going to them?

In his speech on the Financial Resolution, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury defended the present proposal on the ground that most of the agreements were in the nature of bogus agreements. There was no bad faith at all in regard to this agreement.

[Major Birchall.]

12 m. The agreement was come to quite openly with the full knowledge of all concerned. But the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, said that such agreements are not intended to be enforced, and that, if the subscriber fails to comply with it and to carry out his obligation, he will not be brought to Court to compel him to carry it out. I say emphatically that that is not so. There is every intention of having these agreements enforced and that they should carry the full consequences. So much is that so that there is actually at present a case before the Court to compel a subscriber to carry out the agreement he has made. Therefore, the main reason given by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury for the inclusion of this Clause, that the agreements are not intended to be enforced, is without foundation. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will even now assent to the withdrawal of this Clause and that he will realise that by doing so he will earn the gratitude of the country generally and give encouragement to charitable people to subscribe to these great and beneficent institutions.

Mr. SNOWDEN: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is always genial, and I hope this morning that he is generous as well. I want to make a very urgent appeal to him to withdraw this Clause. The hon. and gallant Member for North-East Leeds (Major Birchall) who has just spoken has, I think, put all the points against this Clause eloquently, and if the finances of the country were more flourishing than they are at the present time it would be quite impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to resist the urgent demands of all those interested in schools and other educational institutions and also the hospitals. The amount of money which is involved in this proposal is only, I believe, something like £150,000 a year. We are not asking for a new grant; we are not asking for more money, but merely for the withdrawal of this Clause. The point I want to make, and I am speaking it with real earnestness, is that in withdrawing this Clause the Chancellor of the Exchequer is losing nothing at all. I am quite sure, if he adopts this position, he will be able to use it as an instrument for resisting to some extent the increasing demands which will be made upon him by the educational institutions in this country and by our hospitals. I hope therefore, indeed I believe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot resist this very reasonable request, and I confidently look forward to what he is going to say.

Mr. ERNEST EVANS: I support the appeal that has been made and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will withdraw this Clause. The Clause itself, like the Finance Act of 1922 which it amends, is rather technical, but there is no doubt of its effect. The effects are far-reaching on educational institutions in this country and are very considerable on such institutions as the University of Wales and the National Library of Wales in which I am interested. The Chancellor of the Exchequer last year acted towards the Universities in a generous manner when he restored the grant, and this year, as the result of a deputation of which I was a member, he also met the educational institutions. I hope, in view of that, he will not refuse to accede to the request which we are now making on behalf of the educational institutions in regard to this Clause. I do not want to take up any time, because I know he is impressed by the importance of the matter. The Clause as it stands will involve a considerable hardship on the Universities. In the speech made by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury there seemed to be a misapprehension. He seemed to think that the charities were benefiting private institutions as opposed to private individuals. That is a mistake. That being so, I venture to join in the appeal which has been made that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should accede to our request.

Major HILLS: I want to join in the appeal that has been made. It is a very important matter indeed. I do not wish to speak, because I want to relieve the taxpayer, but I speak on behalf of the hospitals. Some legal way could be enforced in regard to the matter, and, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer has any doubt, let him insist on a special form of appeal, say, through the Public Trustee. It is the case that charitable gifts have been immensely increased by this system. I take, as a special example, what has happened in East Leeds. An immense fund has been raised for the University of Leeds and a further sum for the Cancer campaign. I can imagine no more splendid work than the Cancer campaign at Leeds, and large sums have been obtained more easily by this system of gifts. I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not want to do anything to hinder those great enterprises getting money or charities getting money. If he is satisfied that these are perfectly genuine transactions, that a man who pledges himself to give money would be obliged to give it, and that proceedings would be taken in a court of law if he did not give it, I hope that a large part of the objections of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be removed, and that he will see his way to agree to the deletion of the Clause.

Mr. CHURCHILL: In logic and in equity, undoubtedly the case for this Clause stands quite unassailed. There are no grounds in logic and equity for saying that any individual citizen, however much he may desire to do a charitable action, should do a portion of that action at the expense of the general taxpayer. Therefore, if we were to judge this question on grounds of logic and equity, there would be no reason for receding in any way from the arguments on which this Clause is based. But I acknowledge that sentiment plays its part, and sentiment ought to play its part, and, mixed with sentiment is undoubtedly the practical considerations which have been urged by the right hon. gentleman the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Snowden) that, but for these benefactions, there are charitable institutions of many kinds which otherwise would be drawing very near to the moment when they would make a demand upon the State. If the individual, by his benefactions deprives the State of a certain proportion of its revenue, at any rate he distributes a larger proportion, beyond what he would have contributed to the State, towards these worthy objects. In these circumstances, in view of the appeals which have been made in every part of the House, I desire to withdraw the Clause.

Mr. SNOWDEN: I am sure that I shall be expressing the gratitude which every hon. Member of the Committee feels when I say how delighted we are that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has seen his way to withdraw this Clause.

Mr. SCRYMGEOUR: In view of the long connection which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had with the City of Dundee, may I be allowed to say that his decision is very gratifying, and in consonance with the information which we had as to an application which he had conceded to the asylums of Scotland. Both are quite satisfactory.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Clauses 20 (Amendment as to relief from tax in respect of losses), 21 (Application of Section 29 of Finance Act, 1926, to certain cases), and 22 (Amendment as to exemption from Income Tax in respect of profits of trades carried on by charities), ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 23.—(Payment of Income Tax on certain copyright royalties by deduction.)

Captain MACMILLAN: I beg to move, in page 10, line 27, at the end to insert the words:

(5) In this section the expression "royalties or sums paid periodically" shall include only royalties or sums paid periodically in respect of sales of copyright material absorbed in the United Kingdom.

This Clause makes a non-resident owner of copyright material liable for Income Tax upon sums received as royalties in respect of the sales. Those who are engaged in the publishing trade are not quarrelling with the object of the Clause. It is quite clear that the sums which are received as royalties in respect of sales effected in the United Kingdom should be subject to Income Tax if the author or owner is resident abroad, but the argument seems to me to be strained when you say that those who reside abroad and draw profits for the sales of their works abroad should contribute through the Income Tax towards the general taxation of the country. It may not be within the knowledge of the Treasury that the publishing business in this country carry on their trade in many parts of the world; and what we are seeking to provide is that the sums payable to non-residents, or foreign authors, [Captain Macmillan.] should not be liable to English Income Tax, merely because of the fact that their works are published by English publishing firms. If an English publishing house is carrying on business in France, or India, or Egypt, and a native of one of these countries, by the mere fact that he is doing business with a firm whose headquarters are in London, makes himself liable to Income Tax in this country, the result would be to drive away the business for English publishing houses, which would mean a loss to the Treasury and the publishing business. At present an English business carrying on a large part of its work in foreign countries, the profits on the business abroad and in England are subject to English Income Tax. We want to ensure that while in respect of the sales in this country it is right, that Income Tax should be deducted for royalties paid to non-resident authors, there should not be brought about by this Clause a situation abroad which would reflect injuriously on the business carried on by such firms who have had the enterprise to carry their work into different parts of the world. The words which we propose may or may not be the correct legal phraseology to ensure this point. Indeed, we are not altogether certain, in the advice which we have received, whether such words are necessary at all and whether the Clause as drawn does not cover our point. I am sure it is not the intention of the Treasury to enact a Clause, the result of which would be to deprive English business firms of the opportunity of competing, in this respect, on equal terms with firms native to the countries where they are working. I hope the Government will accept the Amendment or else between now and the Report stage introduce other words which will make it quite clear that we are only seeking to tax non-resident authors in respect of the sums which they draw from sales of their works to the public of the United Kingdom.

It may be necessary to add that certain complications arise from the fact that in the case of many books by foreign authors, English publishers try to retain, where possible, the Dominions market as well as the United Kingdom market. For instance, many American books are sold to English publishers who handle them in the Canadian and Australian markets as well as in the English market. If the royalties in respect of sales made in Australia were made subject to English Income Tax—

Mr. COUPER: On a point of Order. The hon. and gallant Member is referring to some Income Tax which is unknown in this country. I understand this is British Income Tax, not "English" Income Tax.

Captain MACMILLAN: I am sorry if I have offended the hon. Member. If the mere fact of dealing with a British house made the author in that case liable to British Income Tax, the tax could easily be evaded by not giving the books in question to the British firms for marketing in the Dominions. That would be a loss both to the firms and to the Treasury.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir Douglas Hogg): My hon. and gallant Friend has accurately stated the intention of the Government in introducing this Clause. It is to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Income Tax to ensure that foreign authors who get royalties from the sale of their works in this country shall not escape the effective charge of Income Tax. It is certainly not the intention of the Government that, under the guise of a Clause to tax foreign authors' royalties in this country, we should do anything to discourage the printing and publishing in this country of foreign works which are going to be sold in the Dominions or abroad. We are very far from desiring to do so, but we are advised that it is doubtful whether or not that unhappy result would ensue from the Clause as drawn. There being that doubt, we cannot accept the actual words of the Amendment put forward, because, as my hon. Friend frankly said, they would not do, and, from the legal point of view, they would present difficulties. We are, however, willing to adopt the second alternative he put forward, that is, to introduce on Report Stage words which will be apt to secure the object he has explained to the Committee. I hope that on that assurance my hon. Friend will see his way to withdraw the Amendment.

Captain MACMILLAN: I wish to thank the Attorney-General for what he has said, and, on the assurance he has given, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

CLAUSE 24 (Amendment of Rule 21 of GENERAL RULES) ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 25.—(Relief in respect of losses on transactions profits of which would be chargeable under Case VI, Schedule D.)

Sir H. BUCKINGHAM: I beg to move, in page 12, line 5, to leave out the word "similar."

This Clause seeks to give effect to a purpose which was the subject of an Amendment which I put down last year. At that time the Government were good enough to say they would consider that matter, and I must thank them for the concession they have already made by inserting this Clause into the Bill. In my view, however, the concession does not go quite far enough. The whole object of the suggestion I made was that any casual loss in one year might be set off against a casual profit, that is, any casual loss which comes under the category described in Case VI should be set off against any casual profit which can be assessed under Case VI. In the Clause, however, only a casual loss of a "similar nature" can be set off against a casual profit. If a man makes a profit on, say, underwriting in any year he will be taxed on that profit, and if he makes a loss in the same year on something financial of the same character he will be able to set off the loss against the profit. I think any casual loss ought to be set off if it comes under the description given in Case VI, and therefore I am moving to leave out the word "similar."

Mr. GILLET: Would the Attorney-General kindly inform us what the word "similar" means? There was a case in the Courts recently dealing with a firm or individual in Ireland who bought a stock of linen in the early days of the War and made a very large profit, and became liable to taxation under Case VI. Would this provision in regard to setting off a loss apply only if that individual were to deal in linen, or would the word "similar" mean anything that came under Case VI?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Government have given consideration to the point which has been raised by my hon. Friend who moved this Amendment, and they are willing to accept it and to leave out the word "similar." Perhaps hon. Members opposite will not ask me to explain what it means at this stage. The only point to which I would like to call the attention of the Committee is this, that if we leave out the word in line 5 we shall have to leave it out in three other places, lines 10, 16 and 19. and we shall have to put in the words "under Case VI" after the word "assessed," in line 19. I will move these Amendments when the time comes.

Mr. GILLET: May I ask the Attorney-General if I am right in understanding in the case I mentioned that, as he has accepted the Amendment, any loss under the Schedule might be put against the profit?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Any loss which arose in a transaction which if it had resulted in a profit would have been taxed under Case VI will be set-off, after this Amendment, against profit that is taxable under Case VI.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: In Page 12, line 10, leave out the word "similar."

In line 16, leave out the word "similar."

In line 19, after the word "assessed," insert the words "under Case VI."

In line 19, leave out the word "similar."—[The Attorney-General.]

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 26.—(Relief in respect of losses in business set up after 6th April, 1923.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. E. BROWN: This seems to be a very important Clause, and I should like the Attorney-General to tell us if it is an alteration in the present law or a concession on some point put forward in debate.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This, as the hon. Member has anticipated, is designed to give effect to concessions promised in the course of the debate last year. The object of the Clause is to afford relief in the case of businesses which commenced after 6th April, 1923, where a loss was incurred in 1924 or 1925. The change in the basis of assessment from the three years' average to the preceding year prevents these losses from being registered as a liability, and they are outside the scope of the provisions for carrying forward of Clause 33, of the 1926 Act, because that applies to losses incurred in 1926.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

CLAUSE 27.—(Relief in respect of losses where business is transferred to a company.)

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I beg to move, in page 14, line 21, after the word "solely," to insert the words "or mainly." Last year I urged upon the Chancellor that he should give some consideration to cases where real continuity is preserved in a private business which for good reasons is turned into a company, and I was given the promise that something should be done in this Finance Bill, and Clause 27 represents the performance of that promise. I wish to express my grateful thanks for what has been done. I think, however, that there are respects in which the Clause is a little narrow, and accordingly I have put forward my Amendment. It might happen that some small consideration other than shares might be given. It might be of small importance. I might also mention another point. Where the shares are allotted, people should not be debarred from enjoying the same benefits.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This seems to us to be a reasonable Amendment, and I accept it on behalf of my right hon. Friend.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I beg to move, in page 14, line 24, after the word "whom," to insert the words "or to whose nominee or nominees."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: On behalf of my right hon. Friend, who is agreeable, I also accept this Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I beg to move, in page 15, line 22, at the end, to insert the words

"(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of section thirty-three of The Finance Act, 1926, where any individual is the proprietor of any trade or business and the interest or any part of the interest in that trade or business passes by a voluntary disposition, inter vivos, made by that individual, or under his will, or on his intestacy to the husband or the wife, or any ancestor or lineal descendant, of that individual any loss sustained in such business may be carried forward in like manner as if such individual had remained the beneficial owner thereof."

Two Amendments standing in my name have been accepted, and I hope my good fortune will be the same in the case of the present Amendment, which of course is a matter of great importance. I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Royal Commission on Taxation did suggest that something of the kind ought to be put down. Where a business remains in the family it does seem hard that losses should not be set off if the business is transferred to a company which belongs to the owner of the business. I hope the Government will give some consideration to this point and look into the matter further to see if something cannot be done.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am sorry my right hon. Friend backed his luck once too often. I am afraid we cannot accept this Amendment for this reason: The Clause is designed, as the hon. Member has pointed out, to ensure relief in cases where a business has passed from a private individual to a company and is really the same business carried on in the name of the company. But the same principle of granting relief does not apply when the business is passed from one person to a different person, as for instance from a father to his son as contemplated by my hon. Friend. Father and son are regarded for Income Tax purposes as entirely different persons, but, if you are going to assess Super-tax on the profits of the business, you do not aggregate the profits of father and son. You have the father taxed on his share and the son on his share. They are separate persons. So we do not think we can treat them as the same persons as others obtaining relief. Income Tax is essentially a personal tax and not a tax on business as in the case of Excess Profits Duty. It is a personal burden on the individual, and we do not think it right therefore to ask the Committee to accept a provision that enacts in a case like this that two persons shall be treated as one. If the son succeeds to a business which had originally a capital of £20,000 and the father has losses of £3,000 the son gains £17,000 instead of gaining £20,000.

It does not seem, therefore, fair that for Income Tax purposes he should be allowed to keep it for his own. For these reasons the Government cannot accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

CLAUSE 28.—(Amendment of Section 84 of Income Tax Act, 1918.)

Mr. GATES: I beg to move, in page 15, line 28, to leave out the word "may" and to insert instead thereof the word "shall."

Mr. CHURCHILL: I think it may save the time of the Committee if I say that the Government are prepared to accept this Amendment. It carries out our intention with regard to these appointments. I shall not be able to accept the next Amendment on the paper—in page 15, line 29, after the word "pleasure" to insert the words "with the benefits of the Superannuation Acts, 1834 to 1909"—because—

The CHAIRMAN: That is not in order.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Then I am relieved from arguing that matter by your ruling. Nor shall I be able to accept the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for the Moss Side Division (Mr. G. Hurst)—in page 15, line 30, after the word "remuneration" to insert the words

"not being less than the remuneration paid for the year ending the thirtieth day of April, 1927."

I could not accept that because it would suggest that the remuneration should remain unchanged in respect of any additional work. I am ready to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Abingdon (Major Glyn), which deals with the position of the collector. I am not attempting to argue these points, but I thought it would be more convenient for the Committee to know the intention of the Government at this point.

Mr. GATES: May I thank the right hon. Gentleman?

Amendment agreed to.

Major GLYN: I beg to move, in page 15, line 36, at end, to insert the words

(2) Where by virtue of section eighty of The Income Tax Act, 1918, the General Commissioners have power to appoint a collector for any area those Commissioners shall appoint a collector for that area to hold office during their will and pleasure, and sub-section (1) of that section shall have effect as if for the words "in the month of April in every year" there were substituted the words "within a month from the occurrence of a vacancy for a collector."

In view of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, I will not delay the Committee. I understand the Government accept the Amendment, and I therefore formally move.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Mr. DALTON: Now that we have reached this stage, I think it may be convenient to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much further he proposes to go. We have dealt with 20 Clauses and considerable progress has been made. I understand that the evasion group of Clauses are not to be taken. They deal with Super-tax, and Clause 34 also contains some technical points.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I am afraid I must ask the Committee to carry out the plan which we set in mind at the beginning of the day, which was not objected to by any of the leaders of the various parties concerned. It is quite true that we have now completed Clause 28. I propose now to move the postponement of the Clause dealing with the Super-tax and the evasion section in order that they may be brought on in good time on Monday, and to proceed with the other Clauses up to Clause 45, stopping there. I do not think that in these Clauses there is any controversial matter that will be raised. That leaves the evasion problem for Monday and the Road Fund, as large issues for that day, and we will keep one day further for the Debate on the Betting Duty.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

"Clause 29 postponed until after Clause 45.

"Clause 30 postponed until after postponed Clause 29.

"Clause 31 postponed until after postponed Clause 30.

"Clause 32 postponed until after postponed Clause 31.

"Clause 33 postponed until after postponed Clause 32.

"Clause 34 postponed until after postponed Clause 33."

Clauses 35 (Charge of Income Tax at standard rates and at higher rates in respect of income above certain amount), 36 (Provisions with respect to Income Tax chargeable by way of deduction), 37 (Substitution of reliefs by way of reduction of tax for reliefs by way of deductions from assessable income, &c.), 38, (Provisions with respect to making and determination of claims), ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CLAUSE 39.—(Provisions as to date of payment, assessment, &c., of Surtax).

Sir COOPER RAWSON: I beg to move, in page 26, line 13, at the end, to insert the words

"Provided that, if an individual liable to surtax under section thirty-five, paragraph (b), hereof died during the year of assessment, no surtax shall be assessed or charged in respect of such year of assessment, and if he die during the year next following the year of assessment a part only of this surtax shall be payable, proportionate to the part of the year next following the year of assessment as shall have elapsed before the date of death."

The object of the Amendment is to prevent injustice to the estates of deceased taxpayers of the consequences of this Act in connection with the change over from Super-tax to Surtax, and also to bring Surtax practice into the same line as case law with regard to Super-tax. The present practice is governed by Section 6 of the Income Tax of 1918, and, if a Super-taxpayer dies during any year for which Super-tax is chargeable, his estate is liable only for a proportion of the Super-tax up to the actual date of his death. As an illustration, if under the existing tax a Super-taxpayer is liable for £200 Super-tax payable under this Bill on 1st January, 1930, and he dies on 5th April, 1929, his estate pays nothing, but if he dies on 5th October, 1929, his estate pays one-half, or £100, according to when he dies.

Under this Bill, if he dies on the same date, and his estate is liable to the same amount, his estate is liable for the whole amount whether he dies on 5th April or any subsequent date. The only object of the Amendment is to bring the law with regard to Surtax into the same line as the law regarding Super-tax.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid it is not possible for the Government to accept the Amendment which has been moved by my hon. Friend. The position, the Committee will appreciate, is that by virtue of the charges proposed in the Finance Bill Super-tax disappears and another tax called Surtax takes its place. Surtax is only really an additional Income Tax, the levying of which is deferred for a certain period. Under the Clause nobody will pay Surtax for more or less years than he has a Surtax income. Everyone will pay Surtax on exactly the number of years for which he enjoys an income which renders him liable to Surtax. Under Super-tax, people paid the tax for a year less than they ought, for they paid it not in the year they first entered it, but the year after. Now we are changing the system. The Surtax, which is only a deferred amount of Income Tax, is going to be levied in every case for exactly the number of years for which a person is liable to pay it—for exactly the period during which the person surtaxed enjoys an income which entitles him to the Surtax. We could not accept the Amendment, the effect of which would be that people liable to the Surtax would pay less Surtax.

Sir FRANK MEYER: I am sorry the Government have not seen fit to accept this Amendment. I hope they will carefully consider it before the Report stage, because I do not think the Committee, or the country, has fully realised that under the guise of simplification, and making the Super-tax combine with the Income Tax into one tax, the Government is getting an extra year, just as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by shortening the brewers' credit, has got two months in the last two years, and under Schedule "A" in one year he is getting six months ahead. It will not be recovered until the Day of Judgment. Only people who have studied the question have realised that he is going to get an extra year's Super-tax. Whereas it has been one year in arrear, it is now brought forward and people will be mulcted to that extent. The estates of people who die shortly after the end of the financial year will have to pay the full year's tax. That seems to have been brought forward without the attention of the country being closely drawn to it. Between now and the Report stage the Government should consider whether they have been quite fair to the hard-pressed taxpayer.

Sir COOPER RAWSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider this matter between now and the Report stage, so that we can put before him new facts? Anybody who dies after this year suffers a great disadvantage. People who die before this Act are more fortunate. I do not see why anybody should have to pay extra death duty in consequence of this Act. I hope he will allow me to put before him further facts.

Mr. CHURCHILL: In the general scheme of simplification there are various aspects which must be considered together and balanced against each other. It happens in this particular aspect that there is a gain of revenue to the Exchequer, but in another aspect there is a counterbalancing loss. But, on the whole, I contemplate, in consequence of the scheme of simplification, that the burden on taxpayers as a whole should be virtually unchanged. In these circumstances I think it would be a great pity to make a change which would disturb this balance, and, although between now and the Report stage I would be willing to give my attention to any considerations which my hon. Friend may bring before me, I cannot hold out any hopes that I can satisfy his desire that I should surrender the gain of revenue which results from one part of the scheme while, at the same time, I should still have to give back to the taxpayers in respect of another part of the scheme a revenue which almost exactly equals that gain.

Mr. GILLET: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the statement of the hon. Member whom I understood to imply that everybody is going to be liable to pay an extra year. That was the point the hon. Member meant. I was under the impression that what happened was that the year's Super-tax was going to be put forward so as to be one year closer than it was originally, and that ultimately the number of years would be no different from what it was before. The hon. Member implies that it would mean paying an extra year, if not in a lifetime at any rate at the time of death. I think we ought to have the position stated quite clearly to-night.

Mr. DENNIS HERBERT: It appears now to be quite clear that it is the intention of the Government to impose a new tax. So far as I have been able to discover there is not in the Budget Resolutions any Financial Resolution on which to found this new tax. The particular reason why I ask the question of whether there is is this; that I think it has been generally supposed by the hon. Member who moved this Amendment, and many others, that we had discovered what was an obvious mistake. Now we find that it was the intention of the Government to impose this new tax. The Committee is taken completely by surprise, having had no warning through the Financial Resolutions, and it finds that it is the intention of the Government to impose a new tax.

I should like the Chancellor to say a word or two on that. I do not want, exactly at this stage of the proceedings, to raise the question in such a way as to cause serious delay, but I am not sure that I should not reserve my right until after the Chancellor has replied to refer the matter to you, Mr. Chairman, as to whether this Clause can be considered in this way without a Financial Resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. Member submits that question as a point or Order?

Mr. HERBERT: I was wishing to do so, but I was going to delay in the hope that the Chancellor might say a word on the subject.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I will, indeed, if only for the purpose of saving my hon. Friend the trouble of putting a question to the Chair, as to which I anticipate there can be only one answer. Perhaps it has escaped the attention of my hon. Friend that this part of the Bill does not come into operation this year, but only next year, and, therefore, an omnibus Resolution will be necessary before this set of provisions can acquire any validity and become effective, and, therefore, there will be no breach of that time-honoured and most invaluable element in our procedure, namely, the preceding of the imposition of taxes by passing a special Resolution. The Resolution will have to be passed next year before this tax can become operative.

Mr. HERBERT: May I suggest very respectfully to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should refresh his memory as to the exact wording of these valuable Standing Orders of the House? There are two of them, Nos. 66 and 67, which are very much in the same language. No. 66 says:

"This House will receive no petition for any sum relating to public service," etc. No. 67 says:

"This House will not proceed upon any petition, motion, or bill, for granting any money," etc. Under these circumstances, I suggest that what the Standing Orders require is not a Financial Resolution before something becomes operative, but a Financial Resolution before this House will proceed to receive a petition or proposals, and that the proposals for new taxation should not be entered upon without a Financial Resolution precedent.

The CHAIRMAN: If this were a new point, it might cause me some difficulty, but it has been laid down by at least one ruling in the past that, if a tax be not operative in the year in which it is proposed, a Clause can be accepted to take effect in the following financial year, if a Resolution to that effect be brought forward in that year which gives vitality to what up to that point was an academic proposition. What the House is asked now to decide is that a particular proposition can come into effect in a future year, but only if in the following year an omnibus Resolution giving authority is brought forward and carried. I think a former ruling covered that, and I do not feel compelled without notice to say anything as to former Rulings.

Mr. HERBERT: I do not wish to delay the proceedings by a dispute in regard to the Ruling you have just given, but I do ask the Committee to consider the point for one moment.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we had better get rid of the Amendment. If the hon. Member wishes to say anything further, it should be on the Motion "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Amendment negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. HERBERT: Before we part with this Clause, I would like to say a word on the aspect of the question of a Clause dealing with a new tax or new charge without a Financial Resolution preceding it. I think this is an example of the usefulness of the Standing Orders of the House if interpreted as I suggest they should be—namely, that no Bill dealing with a new tax should be considered or entertained by the House until after it has had warning and given previous consideration to a Financial Resolution. This House has always treated with the very greatest respect the Rulings given from the Chair either in Committee or in the House, but no one who has ever occupied the Chair would, I believe, have ventured to do otherwise than to admit that even the greatest of our Speakers or Chairmen has given only one Ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member may argue that a Clause of this sort should not be brought forward without a Resolution, but he cannot argue against what is now the practice of the House and authorised by previous Rulings. He may argue that this Clause is not one of the nature that should be brought forward in one Session and given validity by Resolution in the next, but I do not think that this is an occasion on which he can argue the whole constitutional question involved. He may argue as to this particular Clause but not on the general question, and he cannot controvert former Rulings.

Mr. HERBERT: I bow to that, and I will only remind the House that this does appear to be a case where it is unfortunate that the Committee did not have previous warning by a Financial Resolution, with the result that the Committee has been surprised in discovering that, instead of being a mistake in the drafting of the Clause, the Government have intended to propose for a future year a new tax of which Parliament has had no previous warning.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I really must take notice of the complaint. So far from the Committee not having the usual warning of any new tax being proposed, they are having more than a year's warning. They are having all the warning given by what has taken place now. They will have the whole year to profit by that. They will have all the warning of the Financial Resolution next year, and all the other warnings which my hon. Friend will, no doubt, bring forward.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir FREDERICK HALL: With regard to the question of Super-tax being collected a year after it is earned, are we to be in the position eventually, in order to make up the leeway, of having two years' Super-tax collected in one year?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Only if you are dead.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

CLAUSE 40.—(Power to require returns of income from all sources.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. E. BROWN: Are there any new powers being taken under this Clause? I should like to have a word, if new powers are being taken under it.

Mr. CHURCHILL: There are no new powers.

Mr. GILLETT: What do the words "shall be extended" mean? I have heard it suggested that in future the details given for preparation of Income Tax, instead of, as at present, being that income from investments comes to so much, will, under the powers being obtained here, have to include particulars in regard to investments. I understand that this is to give greater powers to the Income Tax Commissioners.

Mr. CHURCHILL: It makes no difference whatever. The only object of this Clause is, not to expand the powers, but to enable the system of one man one return to be adopted, and to provide the necessary machinery to give effect to that important simplification. We are not in any way altering the existing powers to obtain the return of income from all sources which are possessed by the Income Tax authorities, but are only regrouping and redispersing of them in such a way as to facilitate the proceedings.

Question, "That Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clauses 41 (Special provisions as to returns in connection with sur-tax, etc.), 42 (Basis of assessment for Schedule B, etc.), 43 (Minor amendments), and 44 (Construction and commencement of Part III and repeals) ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 45 (Amount of New Sinking Fund (1923) for 1926-27).

The CHAIRMAN: The Amendments in the name of the hon. Member for Leicester West (Mr. Pethick-Lawrence)—in page 34, line 32, to leave out the words, "as respects the current financial year"; and in line 34, to leave out the words, "as respects that year"—would increase the charge and are therefore out of order. With regard to the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. H. Williams)—in page 34, line 35, at the end, to insert the words,

"The National Debt Commissioners shall hypothecate for the purpose of paying interest on national savings certificates which may be encashed after the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight, so much of the Sinking Fund as shall be equal to the excess of the interest accruing in respect of national savings certificates during the year ending on the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight, over the amount which shall have actually been paid in interest on the encashment of national savings certificates during that year."

I confess that I am not at all clear as to whether that does not increase the charge also. If the hon. Member wishes to move it, perhaps he will state what is the effect of it.

Mr. SMITHERS: Was it not part of the understanding that we should only go as far as the end of Clause 44?

HON. MEMBERS: Clause 45.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.—
[Mr. Churchill.]

Committee reported Progress; to sit again upon Monday next (4th July).

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

It being after half-past Eleven of the Clock upon Thursday evening, Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Orders.

Adjourned at a Quarter after One o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 1st July, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

The House met at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Wallasey Corporation Bill [Lords] (by Order),

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next, at a quarter-past Eight of the clock.

West Cheshire Water Board Bill [Lords] (by Order),

Read a Second time, and committed.

Mexborough and Swinton Tramways Company (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill,

Southend-on-Sea Corporation (Trolley Vehicles) Provisional Order Bill,

Read the Third time, and passed.

Gravesend, Rosherville and Northfleet Tramways (Amendment) Provisional Order Bill,

As amended, considered; to be read the Third time upon Monday next.

Reorganisation of Offices (Scotland) Bill.

Petition of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, for amendment; to lie upon the Table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Colonel GRANT MORDEN: On reading the OFFICIAL REPORT of 26th May, I find I am reported to have said, during the Debate on Russo-British relations, that in a certain event the pay of the Opposition from a Foreign Government would stop. On looking at the matter, I find that I made a wholesale reflection upon Members of the Opposition which, after consideration, I frankly and fairly admit cannot be justified, and I have no hesitation in withdrawing it.

No. 91

Mr. MACKINDER: I have to say that, having heard the hon. Member's statement, I want to be just as frank and fair to Members of all parties. I made outside the House a statement which reflected upon the hon. Member for Brentford and Chiswick (Colonel Morden). That statement I ask permission to withdraw unreservedly.

EAST INDIA (BUDGET).

Address ordered for "Return of the Budget of the Governor-General of India in Council for 1927-28."—[Earl Winter- ton.]

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

POST OFFICE (TYPISTS).

Mr. AMMON asked the Postmaster-General what is the number of temporary staff employed in headquarters' offices, provincial engineering, stores, surveyors', district managers', and postmasters' offices, respectively, in each of the following grades: Grade 1 shorthand typists, Grade 2 shorthand typists, Grade 1 copying typists, and Grade 2 copying typists; and the average length of service of the shorthand typists and copying typists concerned?

Viscount WOLMER: It is not possible without extensive inquiry either to give the number of temporary staff concerned in the form desired by the hon. Member or to state their average length of service. The total numbers of such staff are, however, as follows:—

		Shorthand
		Typists.	Typists..
Grade I	...	27	70
Grade II	...	29	14
		—	—
		56	93
		—	—

Equals total 149.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH (TYPISTS).

Sir W. de FRECE asked the Minister of Health what is the number of temporary staff employed in London headquarter offices and provincial offices, respectively, apart from the Scottish and Welsh Boards of Health, and in the National Insurance Audit Department, respectively, in each of the following grades: Grade 1 shorthand typists, Grade 2 shorthand typists, Grade 1 copying typists, and Grade 2 copying typists; and the average length of service of the shorthand typists and copying typists concerned?

B

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The number of temporary shorthand typists and copying typists employed in the London head-quarter offices and provincial offices of my Department (apart from the Welsh Board of Health) and the average length of service of the officers concerned is as follows:

London Offices:

Shorthand typists, Grade I ...	21
Shorthand typists, Grade II ...	5
Average length of service 3 years
7 months.
Copying typists, Grade I ...	46
Copying typists, Grade II ...	31
Average length of service 3 years
2 months.

Provincial Offices:

Shorthand typists, Grade I ...	3
Average length of service 1 year
4 months.

As regards the National Insurance Audit Department, I would refer the hon.

Member to my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

ROYAL DOCKYARDS (EMPLOYEES).

Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty the number of men in employment in each of the Royal Dockyards for each quarter since January, 1926?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The figure for April, 1927, to supplement those contained in the statement given in the reply to a question by the hon. Member on the 18th February last are:

Portsmouth ...	11,645
Devonport ...	10,854
Chatham ...	8,442
Sheerness ...	2,127
Pembroke Dock ...	47
Rosyth ...	197

Mr. HORE-BELISHA asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will give the figures showing the total number of men employed in Devonport Dockyard in each of the months from January, 1926, to May, 1927, showing established men and hired men, respectively?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The numbers of workpeople employed in the Vote 8 Departments of Devonport Dockyard were as follow on the dates shown:

						Established.	Hired.	Total.
1926.
30th January	3,247	7,838	11,085
27th February	3,291	7,835	11,126
27th March	3,420	7,804	11,224
24th April	3,505	7,799	11,304
29th May	3,514	7,815	11,329
26th June	3,512	7,802	11,314
31st July	3,509	7,804	11,313
28th August	3,499	7,785	11,284
25th September	3,490	7,849	11,339
30th October	3,478	7,701	11,179
27th November	3,466	7,636	11,102
25th December	3,462	7,627	11,089
1927.
29th January	3,448	7,602	11,050
26th February	3,437	7,741	11,178
26th March	3,422	7,581	11,003
30th April	3,399	7,116	10,515
28th May	3,377	7,198	10,575

These figures do not include employes in the Works, Naval Ordnance and other Departments provided for otherwise than in Vote 8 of the Navy Estimates, and are therefore in correspondence with those given in reply to a question by the hon. Member on 4th February, 1926 (OFFICIAL REPORT, col. 326).

—
WAR CASUALTIES (NUMBER UNDER TREATMENT).

Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Pensions how many wounded men are still undergoing treatment as a result of the late War?

Major TRYON: The number of men suffering from wounds or injuries, as distinct from other classes of disability who may be undergoing treatment, are not separately recorded, but I may say that at the end of May last, 5,000 officers and men were in receipt of surgical treatment of one kind or another.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MONEYLENDERS BILL.

As amended (in the Standing Committee) considered.

Mr. SPEAKER: I select first the Amendment which stands second on the Notice Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for East Rhondda (Lieut.-Colonel Watts-Morgan).

CLAUSE 1.—(Licences to be taken out by moneylenders.)

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I beg to move, in page 2, line 9, at the end, to insert the words

“() where the total amount of the duties payable by a moneylender exceeds one hundred pounds the Commissioners of Customs and Excise shall remit any excess over that sum or, if the duty has been paid, repay such excess.”

In the Standing Committee I argued that the provisions of the Clause as it stood were unreasonable in relation to large corporate companies. When a company was formed with a large number of branches I said there should be a maximum placed on the total amount of duty it had to pay. I do not propose to weary the House with the same set of arguments that I used in Committee, but I am entitled to point out that pawnbrokers are dealt with in a very much fairer and more reasonable way than are moneylenders. There are insinuations being passed around that I hold a brief for the moneylenders. I am speaking individually and for myself alone, and I do not desire that my Party should be considered in any way responsible for the remarks that I make. Any statement I make I make entirely because I was asked to be a member of the Select Committee of both Houses which conducted an investigation into this subject—a very early investigation, it is true, and not a very complete and detailed one. I wish to make that explanation. If there is any Member of the House who thinks that I hold a brief for the moneylenders, I would assure him that there is no foundation for it. I shall have something further to say on that subject later.

My sole point in moving this Amendment is that I want the spirit of fairness and impartiality to be exercised towards all people who are in any way connected with the moneylending business in this country. The pawnbroker will get his licence, and he will be able to trade as a moneylender for £7 10s. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) has attempted to reduce the licence duty of the moneylender from £15 to £10 by putting on the Paper an Amendment to that effect. Even had that Amendment been carried the moneylender would have been called upon to pay £2 10s. more than the pawnbroker, although trading under similar conditions. Even with the £100 which I propose as the maximum duty payable by a moneylender, he will be able to get only six licences, while the pawnbroker will be able to get 12 licences for the same sum. Cases could be cited and examples given where the same practice as I seek to establish is already in operation. The legislation with regard to joint stock companies and other companies could be cited. I hope that the promoters of the Bill will be prepared to do something in the direction of the proposal of my Amendment.

Mr. HARNEY: I beg to second the Amendment.

There is another Amendment of mine further down to make the total duty payable £50 instead of £100. I have been a Member of the Standing Committee that considered this Bill, and I am concerned only to get a workable Measure. The Bill has been greatly altered in Committee, but there are a few things remaining to be done and this is one of them. As the Bill stood originally, if there were three partners with 10 branches they had to pay for thirty licences at £15 each. That was £450 for one firm. There was a certain advance made to meet our views, and it was this. The promoters said that if there were partners with a number of branches, licence duty would be charged only in respect of the number of branches. In other words, if there were three partners with 10 branches, instead of their paying for 30 licence duties they would have to pay for only 10 licence duties. That was a concession. But the fact remains that such a firm would have to pay £150 for the 10 branches. There is a difference between the branches of a moneylender's business and the branches of a pawnbroker's business. The pawnbroker carries on an independent business at each of his branches; they are so many separate businesses, and he pays a licence for each. On the other hand the moneylender does the whole of his business from the central office; it is the central office that finds the money and lends it, but the branches are convenient places to which clients can go.

In these circumstances it is only fair that some limitation should be put upon the amount of duty that has to be paid. It has been stated by the Proposer of the Amendment that pawnbrokers are in a more favourable position. Of course they are. I am not saying a word against pawnbrokers, but I am none the less in favour of this limitation. I do not know whether it would be convenient for me now to say a word on the first Amendment on the Paper, which has been passed over but is really involved in this Amendment. It was a proposal that the licence duty should be reduced from £15 to £10. That would still leave the duty payable by the moneylender £2 10s. higher than the duty paid by the pawnbroker. If there are ten branches, they represent a payment of £100 a year which is a very fair amount to ask anybody to pay for carrying on an admittedly legal business. This Bill presumes that money-lending is a perfectly legitimate business, as, of course, it is. It is a part of the commercial activities of the world. In another part of the Bill it is insisted that moneylenders must be persons of good character so that here you have persons of good character carrying on a legitimate business to meet the requirements of the public, and in the circumstances I submit a license duty of £10 is quite sufficient, with a total maximum either of £100 or as I suggest, £50.

Mr. BURMAN: The promoters of the Bill do not feel that they can accept this Amendment. The figure of £15 is a compromise figure. At the Joint Select Committee which originally considered this question, a figure of £15 was accepted and, when the Bill came to be drafted, the figure of £15 applied to every member of a partnership firm in addition to every address at which the partnership carried on business. It was found, on working the matter out, that this was really oppressive and, by another compromise, it was agreed that the amount of £15 should only apply to the addresses, no matter how many partners there might be in the firm. There was a further concession made with regard to pawnbrokers. The pawnbrokers' licence is £7 10s., but if he desired to take out a moneylender's licence, as practically every pawnbroker must do if he deals in sums above £10, he then would have had to pay an additional £15. A concession was made in this respect—that he should only be required to pay half the amount of the moneylender's fee, so that for £15 he could get both his pawnbroker's licence and his moneylender's licence. The promoters consider that it would be inadvisable to depart from the compromise arranged in the Joint Select Committee and debated at great length in the Committee on the Bill. The proposal to reduce the fee from £15 to £10 was then defeated, and I hope it will be defeated on this occasion. The pawnbroker has to pay £7 10s. in respect of each address at which he carries on business. The publican pays a licence duty for every public-house which he owns and an ad valorem duty, in addition, and I do not think it can be considered unfair to moneylenders that they should pay on each branch at which they conduct business. Surely it would scarcely be worth the moneylender's while to open a branch unless he could afford to pay this licence duty in respect of it. Under the Amendment, a moneylender, for £100, would get seven licences, and then as many more as he wanted. That would seem to be unreasonable and unfair.

Mr. SCURR: This Amendment ought not to be accepted. As the hon. Member who has last spoken pointed out, every publican who has more than one business has to pay license duty on each business in addition to other duties, while the effect of the Amendment would be that a moneylender could set up a business in every town and only pay £100. I take it that moneylenders are business men and only set up a branch where they expect to get business. If they could obtain all the business they desired by having only one establishment, they would only have one establishment; and the fact that they consider it necessary to have branches indicates that those branches are going to attract clients.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope the promoters will resist the Amendment which would fix the revenue derived from this body of people at a maximum of £100. As the last speaker has said, a moneylender for that sum could have a branch in every town and in every thickly populated district in every town.

Mr. WELLS: I would also point out that if this Amendment were carried it would involve unfair competition as against the small moneylender who has only one establishment.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS - MORGAN: Having regard to the remarks of the promoters I beg leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CLAUSE 2.—(Certificate required for grant of Moneylender's Excise licence.)

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the Amendments to Clause 2, I should like to know if the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) has any choice to make of those standing in his name. I do not know how far they hang together, but I shall select whatever one he wishes to move as covering his point.

Mr. HARNEY: I can deal with all these Amendments in a composite manner.

Mr. SPEAKER: Moving the first one on the Paper?

Mr. HARNEY: I will, if I may, move the first one and I will connect it with the others.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well.

Mr. HARNEY: I beg to move, in page 3, line 23, to leave out from the word "the," in line 23, to the end of line 26, and to insert instead thereof the words,

"county court judge for the division in which the moneylenders' business is to be carried on."

This Clause makes it necessary for every moneylender to take out a certificate, and every certificate is to be the basis of a licence. It will therefore be seen that if there were three partners, each would have to take out a certificate, and, if there were 10 branches, a certificate would have to be taken out in each branch. These certificates would be taken out in different places at different times and before different Benches of magistrates, and, in considering whether a certificate is to be granted or not, the tribunal has to decide whether there is satisfactory evidence that the applicant is of good character, whether there is, on the other hand, satisfactory evidence that he is not a fit and proper person, and, finally, whether he has complied with the various rules.

These are questions that really open up a latitude for the exercise of a good deal of preconception and prejudice. What is good character? Is it good moral character, is it good commercial character, is it not being a rowdy person? Different benches will take different views on all these questions, and it is in the interests of uniformity that a county court judge should grant the certificate in the first instance, and that every certificate afterwards required should be obtained from the same county court judge. But the Amendment does not go so far as that. It goes only so far as saying that the certificate ought to be granted by a county court judge. The advantage is that the decisions of a county court judge become authorities that bind other county court judges. They are men who have had the same training and the same ways of appraising evidence, and before such tribunals what is good character, what is a fit person, what is compliance with the various rules and requirements would soon become crystallised into well understood propositions, and it would, therefore, bring about uniformity.

If you leave the matter, as it is now, to the magistrates, you may have a bench of magistrates in one district saying they are not satisfied that an applicant is of good character, because of the views they have on the question of character, whereas a bench in another district may take an entirely opposite view. Again, at one time when a man applies for a certificate he may have one lot of magistrates, with one set of views, and at another time, in the same district, when he applies for another certificate, he may go before another bench, with different views, and the whole thing would result in chaos, quite apart from the fact that it is well known that these are very frequently to be found on lay benches men who are rather subject to prejudice and preconception. The moneylender, in my opinion, has been a very much maligned person, but that is neither here nor there. I think a great number of things are attributed to him that are very unjustly so attributed and there is, therefore, in my view, a great deal to be said for my Amendment to substitute a county court judge for a petty sessional court.

Mr. MARDY JONES: I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: This proposal is one to transfer the granting of a certificate of good character to a moneylender from the petty sessional court to the county court. I submit that that alteration would be very difficult to carry out. For one thing, the county courts have no facilities for this kind of work, and, moreover, they are unsuitable in a variety of other respects. The granting of certificates of good character for many years was done by the petty sessional courts under the Act of 1872, but subsequently, by an amending Act, a part of these duties was transferred to the district and borough councils, so that now they are partly granted by the district and borough councils and partly by the petty sessional courts. It seems to me that, as the magistrates are very accustomed to this kind of work, and constantly have it before them, and have all the necessary facilities, it would be a great mistake to impose duties of a novel character on the county courts, who have had no previous experience of them.

It has been found from experience that anyone who makes an application for a licence would rather go before a bench of magistrates than before a popularly elected body, where men change every year, it may be, and where political partisanship might arise, whereas, in the case of the petty sessional courts, that would not be the case. Therefore, I submit that the best policy would be to give to the petty sessional courts this power of granting certificates of good character to moneylenders, especially when we bear in mind that by the control and assistance of the police, they are enabled to accumulate a mass of evidence with regard to applicants which it would be quite impossible for the county courts to have. Therefore, I hope the House will not accept the Amendment.

Mr. HARNEY: On a point of Order. What I have moved is that the County Court Judge should take the place of the magistrate, for this reason, that one of the things that would have to be decided would be whether there was satisfactory evidence of a person being of good character. That point is dealt with in one of the subsequent Amendments in my name to this Clause, and I wish to ascertain whether, when we are dealing with these omnibus Amendments, I shall have an opportunity, in case the first Amendment is lost, of saying something on the two subsidiary Amendments.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the hon. and learned Member in his speech moving the first Amendment would cover the other Amendments on this Clause, and I was not proposing to call upon the subsequent Amendments in his name.

Mr. HARNEY: Would it be permissible for me to deal with them now?

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest this, that the hon. and learned Member would have a right to reply to the discussion on this Amendment, as this is a Bill that has been taken in Committee upstairs, and he might, in his reply, take the opportunity of referring to the other Amendments?

Mr. DENNISON: This point seems not to have been dealt with either by the Select Committee or upstairs, and it appears to me that there is some sound sense in it, because, whether or not we like it, the fact has been accepted that the profession of moneylender, if you call it a profession, is a very important profession, particularly to those who borrow and do not want to pay back. But, generally speaking, there is a considerable amount of prejudice against the moneylender, and petty sessional courts and benches of magistrates are not always impartial, as some of us know. The promoter of the Bill says that the benches are free from political bias, but I am not going to accept that view. Hon. Members on this side know perfectly well that on many occasions we have had to express our views here about the political composition and the prejudices of many of the benches up and down the country, so that I think there is something to be said for this Amendment, and that it would be much better to transfer this duty to a County Court Judge, who obviously, in these particular cases, would be above suspicion from the point of view of local prejudices, and might bring to bear his experience as a lawyer on the evidence that might be submitted by a superintendent of police or a police constable as to the character of an applicant for a certificate. I happen to be a magistrate of a bench; in fact, I have been a magistrate of two benches in my short life. I can say that the individuals I have met on the magisterial bench are excellent persons socially, but most of the people who compose our magisterial benches, even in these days, have been appointed by the party which may be in power for the time being, and an examination of the magisterial benches will show that they are packed to-day with people of a particular colour and belonging to a particular class of the community. Many of the magisterial benches are drawn from tradespeople, and so on, some of whom have had to have recourse to moneylenders, who, I understand, at times treat their clients very badly.

[Mr. Dennison.]

This Amendment deserves further consideration, and I regret very much that the promoter of the Bill did not wait to hear some other Members speak on it, before giving his decision, because I appreciate the difficulty of giving way now. But I do ask him and those associated with him to examine this point, because it was never discussed in Committee upstairs. I wish I had had the foresight and intelligence when the Bill was upstairs to bring the Amendment forward. I should like to hear some of the legal Members on the Front Bench opposite give their views on this Amendment.

Mr. SCURR: I very much regret that, although I am in agreement with a number of statements made by my hon. Friend the Member for King's Norton (Mr. Dennison), I cannot draw the same conclusions. As far as we are concerned with this case, we are not dealing with a question of law. If it were a question of law, I should be one of the first to say that such a matter should not be referred to a Petty Sessional Court, but here we are dealing with a question of character. Everyone who has been a member of a bench of magistrates knows the great care which is taken in the investigation of the characters of persons who apply for public house licences. There is the police evidence, and there are all kinds of other evidence. I have sat on a bench of that kind, and I know the great care taken to be absolutely fair. But I have known cases where there have been licences granted which I, personally, would not have granted, and where the balance has all the time been weighted in favour of the applicant.

We have to discuss not only this Amendment, which would transfer the granting of certificates from the Petty Sessional Court to the County Court Judge, but also the other Amendments in the name of the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney). The hon. and learned Member desires to strike out paragraph (a) of Sub-section (6) and to substitute the words "a certificate signed by three responsible householders." I submit that that Amendment would really be playing with the whole question. After all, it is always possible to get certificates of good character from responsible householders. Every householder is responsible. Every one of us, I think, has sufficient friends to secure at least three to testify as to good character. When a person is going to carry on a business of this kind, his character ought to be examined; he ought not to be afraid of coming before a public tribunal the same as other people with regard to their business. For these reasons, I oppose the Amendment.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Commodore Douglas King): The hon. Member for King's Norton (Mr. Dennison) regretted that he had not longer time in which to study this Amendment.

Mr. DENNISON: I said that the matter was not discussed upstairs in Committee; that was my point.

Commodore KING: I was only going to remark that, of course, the promoters of the Bill, the Government and other Members of the House have only had the opportunity of seeing this Amendment on the Order Paper this morning, but I think there are very obvious objections to it. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney), I think, overlooked the fact that, except in the London area, if the duties were transferred to the County Court, they would only be sitting about once in three months, and, therefore, there would not be the ready access to the authority that you have under the Bill.

Mr. MARDY JONES: Does that apply to London or to the Provinces?

Commodore KING: I said to the Provinces.

Mr. JONES: Only once in three months?

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: Is that correct? In all the districts with which we are acquainted, the county courts meet monthly.

Commodore KING: It varies in different parts, but, whatever the period may be, there is not the ready access to county courts that you have under the Bill to petty sessional courts. Another point of importance is that the magistrates already deal with the granting of pawnbrokers' licences, and, therefore, it is undesirable that the licensing should be divided, and that you should have one authority granting licences to moneylenders and another authority granting licences to pawnbrokers. Again, the petty sessional courts are in very close touch with the police, whereas the county courts are not. Being in close touch with the police, it is very much easier for the magistrates to obtain evidence of character than it would be for the county courts. Shortly, for these reasons, I hope the House will oppose this Amendment, as I think the present arrangement in the Bill is far better.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I sincerely trust that the hon. and learned Member will see his way to withdraw the Amendment, now that it has been discussed. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has given us an explanation of the Amendment, but I would try to induce the Home Secretary, who is with us for the first time on this Bill, to give us some information as to his attitude towards the Amendment. He is very eloquent outside the House, and I have read his speeches with great delight, especially his speech of last evening, but I do think we ought to have his musical voice exercised in this House. Though I am not going to press him to enlighten us further on this Amendment, because the hon. and gallant Gentleman has done very well in explaining the position, I trust that the Home Secretary, who did not show his face in the Committee upstairs, except on one occasion when he came in order to make a quorum, and then departed as swiftly as he arrived, will later give us the benefit of his advice. He is the chief of the Home Office, the Department which will have to administer this Bill, and I think it would be courteous if, at a later stage, he were to assist us in dealing with the intricacies of this problem. Some part of the eloquence he displays outside this House ought to be enjoyed by Members in the House.

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir William Joynson-Hicks): May I thank the hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Rhys Davies) for his kind references to myself? He must not think I have been neglecting my duty because I did not attend this particular Committee. I have had the privilege of the assistance of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Paddington (Commodore King), who has conducted this Bill through the Committee with conspicuous ability, as I am sure all hon. Members will agree. I have had reports from time to time as to the progress of the Bill, and I have been quite satisfied with the work which my hon. and gallant Friend was doing. I had to attend other Committees, but I have taken a close interest in this Bill, and I have the privilege of being here to-day.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I rise to say that I cannot support this Amendment. The position of pawnbrokers has been referred to as analogous to that of moneylenders in regard to these certificates. From a long experience in these matters I wish to say that the granting of certificates by petty sessional courts has proved very satisfactory indeed in the case of pawnbrokers. There is easy access to such courts, whereas in the provinces a county court judge may come to a town only once in three months. It is to the advantage of an applicant that he should get a quick hearing and a speedy decision. In my opinion the promoters of the Bill have dealt very fairly indeed with moneylenders in regard to the conditions under which these certificates will be granted. Before a certificate can be granted to a pawnbroker an application has to be put in 24 days before the date of hearing. For 28 days the applicant's name and address and the nature of his application are posted on the church or chapel doors of the parish in which he resides, so that everybody may see the application, and any person has an opportunity of entering an objection to the granting of the license. Further, the applicant has to give satisfactory evidence as to character, and has to show that his place of business, and any adjacent place, is not frequented by thieves or persons of bad character. Conditions have been made much more easy for moneylenders, and in the interests of moneylenders themselves this Amendment ought not to be pressed. Speaking, as I said before, from actual experience, I am certain that one gets far more consideration from a bench of magistrates. They know the local circumstances, and so does the chief of police, who can give evidence. It will be more to the advantage of moneylenders to apply to the magistrates for certificates than to apply to county court judges.

[Mr. Womersley.]

Mr. THURTLÉ: I rise to support the opposition to this Amendment. I listened with some impatience to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) in moving it. He implied that petty sessional courts were chock full of prejudices and free conceptions. I hold no brief for the magistrates who sit in the ordinary police courts, but I do not think they are quite such a bundle of prejudices as he tried to make out. In order to establish his point he suggested, by implication, that county court judges were above all human frailties, and without any prejudices or preconceptions whatsoever. I have had some little experience of county court judges. Some of them may be estimable persons, but I have seen judgments given by them which have been chock full of the most bitter prejudices. I am certain they are just as human as magistrates, and would be just as likely to allow their own prejudices and preconceptions to enter into questions of this sort.

I do not think there is the least reason why we should accept this Amendment, nor the other Amendments to which the hon. and learned Member was referring at the same time. The Amendment dealing with the question of satisfactory evidence might lead to very unfortunate results. If we eliminate the words "satisfactory evidence," as the hon. and learned Member desires, and insert instead the words "three responsible householders," we shall be taking away the one safeguard there is as to character. As an hon. Member has pointed out, it is possible for any man, even the most disreputable man in the district—[Hon. MEMBERS: "Members of Parliament"]—yes, Members of Parliament, and others even more doubtful even than Members of Parliament, to find three responsible householders who will say his character is satisfactory. I do not know what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant by "responsible householders." He did not give us any definition of the word "responsible."

Mr. HARNEY: It is the usual phrase.

Mr. THURTLÉ: We are supposed to have a responsible Government at the present time, but I very much doubt whether any of us on this side of the House would accept that adjective as applied to the present Government. Anyhow, it seems to me there is no real point in this Amendment and no real grievance to be removed, because I notice that further on in the Clause provision is made for dealing with a case where a person feels aggrieved. If a petty sessional court refuses to grant a certificate the applicant may appeal to the court of quarter sessions in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. That is provided for in sub-section (7) of this Clause. That provision safeguards the right of people who apply for these certificates, and, therefore, I think all of us ought to resist this Amendment.

Mr. HARNEY: I have no desire to persist in an Amendment which has not some chance of being carried. My object in putting down these amendments was not to be obstructive, but to try to improve the Bill. I was not very much impressed by the argument that magistrates are more ready of access, because I do not see why you require readiness of access. Off and on, they can be found certainly for one half of every month, and there is no great hurry about it. I was more impressed by the argument that was used about pawnbrokers. It would, perhaps, be a little anomalous that a pawnbroker should go to the magistrates for a certificate of character, while the moneylender should go to the county court judge, but I would like to point out, as bearing upon the subsidiary part of these Amendments, that that distinction between pawnbrokers and moneylenders really arises from the very quotation that was made by the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Womersley), to the effect that, before a pawnbroker can obtain a certificate, he has to post up his application on the church door, and some inquiry has to be made as to whether the place in respect of which he is applying is a resort of thieves, or whether he is familiar with thieves. The House will see at once that a pawnbroker, although a highly respectable man, has to carry on his business just at a spot for which receivers of stolen goods would make a bee-line. He cannot help that, but it is so. If there were no pawnbrokers' establishments, receivers of stolen goods, or thieves themselves, would not know where to go with their spoil. Therefore, it is very essential that a person carrying on business in such an establishment as that of a pawnbroker should be a person of the very highest character. A moneylender, however, has no establishment to which thieves or persons of that kind can resort. He does not carry on business at a place over which it is necessary that the police should have a surveillance; he merely carries on the business of moneylending, just as a banker does, although he charges a higher rate of interest.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I would like to ask the hon. and learned Member whether he is aware of the fact that for sums over £10 a moneylender can take security just as the pawnbroker can—either stolen goods or goods belonging to the borrower.

Mr. HARNEY: What I was pointing out, not at all adversely to the pawnbroker, was that, on principle, there is a difference in the case of a person who carries on business in an establishment that is abused by thieves and receivers of stolen goods. It is no fault of the pawnbroker, but that is the nature of the establishment, and, therefore, it is essential that such an establishment should be carefully guarded by having in control of it a person who is undoubtedly of the highest integrity, as I am glad to say most of them are. In the case of the moneylender, there is no such need for this safeguard. No one resorts to his establishment except persons wanting a loan of money. No thief would go there; no person of bad character would go there; they would have nothing to gain by going there. However, as regards the general Amendment, I see that there is no chance of its being carried, and, therefore, I am not going to waste time over it, but, as regards the subsidiary Amendments, I would ask the promoter of the Bill whether he could not see his way to leave out Sub-section (6, a) altogether, because, after all, Sub-section (6, b) gives what is wanted. Paragraph (a) says that the person applying for a certificate must give affirmative evidence of good character. Paragraph (b) says that he is not to get the certificate if anyone is able to give evidence that he is not a fit and proper person, and, surely, that is quite sufficient. After all, why should a man who applies for a licence, or a certificate on which to obtain a licence, to carry on what is avowedly a legitimate business, be forced to go to court and prove in advance that he is a person of good character? Is it not quite sufficient that he should get his certificate unless someone is able to come forward and say that he is not a man of good character? I think it would be quite sufficient if paragraph (a) were struck out, leaving paragraph (b).

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and learned Member press this Amendment?

Mr. HARNEY: I should like to hear from the promoter of the Bill whether there is any chance of striking out paragraph (a).

Mr. BURMAN: I am sorry not to be able to oblige the hon. and learned Member. We consider that both of these paragraphs are necessary. The one is the positive and the other is the negative.

Mr. HARNEY: In the circumstances, I beg leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the pleasure of the House that the Amendment be withdrawn?

Mr. THURTLÉ: This Amendment, I understand, has been duly moved and seconded. May we not insist upon its going to a Division?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, if the hon. Member objects to its being withdrawn.

Mr. THURTL: Yes, Sir, I object to its being withdrawn.

Amendment negatived.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I beg to move, in page 5, line 24, to leave out the words "may, if it thinks fit," and to insert instead thereof the word "shall."

I hope that, after all the eulogy we have had as to the efficiency and the good services rendered by benches of magistrates, this Amendment will be accepted.

Otherwise, the position would be that, where a money-lender's licence had been taken away and his business stopped, and where the conviction was quashed on appeal, the moneylender would have no recompense whatever in respect of any stoppage of his business in the meantime. To my mind, his business should not be stopped until it is definitely decided that his licence is to be taken away. Seldom have I seen the iron hand shielded so ingeniously as it is in this Clause. It is full of hatred, contempt, and everything else. I have already said, both in the Standing Committee and in the Select Committee, that there are bad money-lenders—I have had some experience of them; and there are also very bad borrowers. Why should the moneylenders be singled out—

Mr. MACQUISTEN: As if they were landlords!

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: No; you take good care on that side of the House to protect the landlord. If you gave the moneylender half the justice and equity with regard to carrying on his legitimate business that you give the landlord, it would be all right, but my quarrel is that you single him out more than any other trader.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: The one lends houses and the other money.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: If the hon. and learned Member will put his objection in an intelligible form I will deal with it. I desire to compress what I have to say into as short a time as possible, but I want to ask the promoters of the Bill to look at the matter in this light, that, even in the case of the worst forms of crime—even up to the degree of murder—the sentence is not put into operation if an appeal is lodged—

Mr. GROTRIAN: You could not hang a man who might be acquitted on appeal.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I dare say not, but my argument is that I want to make it a direct—I do not know exactly what the word is; my difficulty is that I have to think in Welsh and speak in English, and the proper word does not readily come to my lips. [Interruption.] I dare say that would put me in a further fog still. The hon. Member for Argyll (Mr. Macquisten) has gone out, so he cannot help me out of the difficulty. The magistrates may regard it as a direction to them to consider and, if they think fit, not suspend the work of the moneylender if an appeal has been lodged. I hope this will meet with a better fate than my other Amendment. It is a very small one, but it will do something to show that there is no desire to single out these people for special treatment.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to Second the Amendment.

I feel it is only justice to any person who may be deprived of some right, or perhaps feel that some injustice has been put upon him, that he should have an opportunity of appeal. That is only fair. Whether he is a moneylender, a borrower or an ordinary Member of Parliament or whatever he may be, he ought to have an opportunity of appeal, particularly from a lower Court. The case for the Amendment is considerably strengthened by the refusal of the House to agree that the County Court Judge should be the person who should deal with the licence. If the promoters are not prepared to accept the Amendment I hope they will give reasons for their refusal. Up to now we have had very few reasons why they could not accept this, that and the other. They have made general statements, about which they have submitted very little evidence indeed. I associate myself with the Amendment in order to give hon. Gentlemen an opportunity, if they cannot accept it, of showing their reason.

Mr. OLIVER: I had not the advantage of being on the Committee of this Bill, but unless there are some better reasons than those brought forward by the last two speakers, I hope the Clause will be allowed to stay as it is. To accept the Amendment would be to destroy the discretion that is vested in the magistrates and compel them to do something they are not compelled to do in any other case so far as I know. In some cases the magistrate has certain powers, and exercise them. In others he has certain discretions, and exercises them. But, in this case, if the Amendment is accepted the discretion would be taken away from him. In a very bad case it would be very wrong not to suspend a moneylender's licence simply because he had a right of appeal, and unless there are some very good reasons to the contrary I hope the Amendment will be resisted.

Mr. THURTELL: I hope we are going to hear from the promoters what their view is on this point. They seem rather reluctant to let the House know where they stand on the matter. I support my hon. Friend in resisting it. It seems to me the court would not decide to suspend a certificate unless it had very good reason for doing so. We may assume that suspension means that in the view of the court the business has been conducted in an improper and illegal fashion. If that is so, there seems to be no good reason why it should be allowed to continue in that fashion for an indefinite period of time. I am not a lawyer, and I do not pretend to know very much about how much time is taken in getting through an appeal of this kind, but we hear a lot about the law's delays, and there is no telling how long a period will elapse between the order of the court and the hearing of the appeal, but it might be several months, and if the business is conducted in an improper and illegal fashion, that seems highly undesirable in the public interest. The Clause provides that the Court may exercise its discretion and may, if it thinks fit, allow the business to be carried on. That is quite an adequate safeguard, and it seems to me we certainly ought to resist the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: I hope the House will not agree to the Amendment. Under similar conditions, a pawnbroker who is refused a certificate has no right of appeal and the Court has no discretion to allow him to continue his business. It is no hardship that this matter is left to the discretion of the Court. If you take it away they will be compelled to allow the moneylender to continue his business though there may be a serious conviction.

Mr. MARDY JONES: I am not quite satisfied with the explanation of the promoters. They seem to attach a great deal of importance to the discretionary power of the magistrates. Personally I would prefer to see the County Court Judge come into this matter. I am not satisfied that magistrates are strong in these cases. It seems to me that if a case has been sufficiently made out, the granting of a right of appeal should be compulsory instead of optional.

Mr. GROTRIAN: It seems to me that there is very great force in this Amendment. It is somewhat unfair to carry out a sentence upon a man before the litigation is finally concluded. It is somewhat unusual, because in this case you may destroy a man's business between the time of conviction and his licence being taken away, and the appeal. It is all very well, if he is successful in his appeal, to give him back his business, but you have damaged it very severely in the meantime, and the man is innocent if he succeeds in his appeal. Comparison has been made with the taking away of a man's motor licence. I do not see that the cases are parallel at all. Merely to take away a man's licence, does not hurt him very much, but here you are taking away his business, and, after that, you hand it back to him, because you have found him to be innocent. As to the length of time before an appeal can be taken, it is an appeal to Quarter Sessions and Quarter Sessions are held quarterly. Therefore, an appeal cannot be outstanding for more than three months, and, in all probability, in most cases, would be outstanding for a very much less period. I think there is great force in this Amendment, and I shall support it.

Mr. ERNEST BROWN: As one strongly in favour of this Bill, I think there is very great force in this Amendment, and I should like to hear a great deal more argument from the other side before I decide to vote against it. A good many Members of the House are rather surprised to hear some of the Members above the Gangway expressing such views about magistrates, in view of what has been said in recent weeks in this House about those same bodies in another connection. I have got myself thoroughly mixed up as to the views hon. Members above the Gangway take concerning magistrates, but it seems to me that, if a bench of magistrates gives a decision against a moneylender who then wants to appeal, it is certainly very hard that his business should be closed down before the final appeal is settled. There is very great force in this Amendment, and I should like to hear more about it. We regard this Bill as a Measure to deal with the devil, but there is a proverb that even the devil should have his due, and this Amendment does tend to give even the devil his due.

[Mr. E. Brown.]

The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. W. Watson): It is quite familiar in practice and under Statute in case of either offences or crimes that after a right of appeal is given a deferring of the sentence should operate in some way or other. I think it is equally familiar that in and because of lesser crimes or offences a discretion as to what is to happen pending an appeal is given to the inferior court that gives the sentence. In the case of the more serious crimes, the sentence comes into operation at once, but you are entitled to go to the Court of Appeal to get relief such as liberation from prison pending appeal. Undoubtedly, the present class of case falls under the minor class of cases, certainly so far as Scotland is concerned. [An Hon. Member: "What about England?"] I shall be very surprised if it is any different in England, and certainly the instance given of the motor car applies to both and is a parallel instance. No instance has been stated where the sentence automatically is deferred without any discretion in the Court of Appeal or inferior court. It is quite different in civil matters, but I am talking of cases of offences or crime. One of the reasons for that undoubtedly is that it is advisable to give a discretion in such matters to prevent frivolous appeals. There may be, of course, a very bad case where a licence is refused quite rightly and an appeal is obviously hopeless, but the man will appeal in spite of that, and, having under this Amendment, if it be accepted, the right to carry on his business, he will carry on that appeal as long as he can.

The only point that remains to be dealt with is whether this discretion is, in practice or experience, likely to be fairly exercised. The words "if they think fit," I should think, make it obvious, even to the most obtuse magistrate that to shut down a man when he is going to appeal is bound, in most cases, to have a very serious effect upon his business. I think for the most part they undoubtedly would act in that way, and they would not prejudice a man if he had any reasonable grounds of appeal by causing the suspension of the licence at once. On the other hand, there may be cases where an evil is going on which it is the purpose of the proceedings to stop, an evil which is affecting the community generally or particular persons, and which ought to be stopped at once. Are you going to exclude the court from a right in cases of that kind from saying, "No, we shall not suspend the cancellation of this certificate pending appeal." Undoubtedly, that is the exceptional case. For these reasons, the Government are against the acceptance of this Amendment. They believe the provision in the Clause is right and fair, always bearing in mind—and it is not an unimportant point—that the pawnbroker gets no right of appeal at all. It is in favour of moneylenders, and it is quite proper that we should allow it to be administered under the ordinary safeguards and discretions.

Mr. MARDY JONES: It is very interesting to hear from the Front Bench for the first time an original statement—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has already spoken on this Amendment.

Mr. JONES: Am I not in order in drawing the attention of the House to the absence of the Solicitor-General, who ought to be in his place to interpret these legal points?

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Harney!

Mr. HARNEY: I would like to make a few observations in reply to the very clear—

Mr. SPEAKER: I see from my Paper that the hon. and learned Member has also spoken.

Mr. HARNEY: Not on this Amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Was it on the last Amendment?

Mr. HARNEY: Yes. I would like to make a few observations in reply to the very clear statement made by the Lord Advocate. It certainly is so, that when a right of appeal is given the period between the first judgment and the final conclusion of the appeal has to be dealt with in some way as regards the operation of the suspension. In civil cases, what is done in this. A discretion is given to withhold the operation of an appeal. That is called a stay of execution. My experience is, that when a Judge gives a judgment he is very loth to exercise that discretion in favour of the person. In most cases persons have to go to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal generally allows the status quo to be preserved on money being paid into court. There is a distinction drawn in the quasi-criminal cases between the severe ones and the lighter ones. I do not think there is any principle governing the distinction between major and minor offences. I think it is entirely a matter of degree. The rule undoubtedly is this, that where, in a criminal judgment, there is anything that really very largely affects a man's liberty or right of action, he is permitted to carry on as if the judgment were in his favour until the final result, namely, the Court of Appeal. In fines such as fines in connection with motor cars, undoubtedly the discretion is left to the magistrate. In this case, what we have to consider is, having regard to the effect of the magistrate's judgment, ought we the House of Commons, say, "This is one of those cases where the operation ought to be suspended until the final and conclusive decision has been given"? In my opinion, it is just one of those cases, because what is done is most serious to the man. The man's livelihood in that class of business depends upon his possession of the certificate.

The withdrawal of the certificate by the judge or the magistrate means that his business is stopped. Every week or month that passes, his goodwill is passing away, and ultimately there may come a judgment restoring something which has died in the interval. That ought to be guarded against. Of course, there are possible abuses, and we have to weigh one thing against the other. One possible abuse may be that there may be a case where the certificate was perfectly properly taken away and an appeal was hopeless, but where the person concerned says: "I will appeal, and I shall get a couple of months grace until the appeal has been heard." Compared with the number of cases there may be of that kind, there will be an infinitely greater number where the hardship would fall on the man who may ultimately succeed in his appeal. On the balance, I submit that it is fair to bring this class of case into conformity with what the Lord Advocate rightly tells us is the rule in regard to sentences or decrees of a really serious character.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I was in favour of this Amendment until I heard two arguments against it. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) would have led the Committee to believe that in motor car cases there is no penalty at all on the person whose licence is cancelled, that all that happens is that the licence is taken away, but the man's livelihood is not taken away. I always understood that there are men who earn their livelihood by driving motor cars, and if you take away the licence you take away the man's livelihood. Consequently, that argument falls to the ground. The motor car licence comes into the same category as the licence about which we are talking. A further argument which makes me think I ought not to support this Amendment, is that the hon. and gallant Member who moved the Amendment said that all he was doing was to substitute the word "may" for the word "shall." That is not what he is doing. He is proposing to remove the words

"may, if it thinks fit."

If the result of his Amendment would be to provide that

"The Court shall, if it thinks fit."

I might support him, but that is not his Amendment. If we carry the Amendment, the position would be that the court would be bound, however bad a case may be, however definite the conviction may be, to allow the business to be carried on, in spite of the fact that the case is as clear as daylight that a conviction has ensued. I should have thought that if a conviction had ensued in a case of this kind, the man could not carry on his business, because it would have gone. When this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament and a conviction has ensued under it, the man's business will have finished, in spite of any appeal. I do not know as much about this kind of business as other hon. Members.

[Mr. Rhys Davies.]

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: You know a bit about the Home Office.

Mr. DAVIES: I know very little about the intricacy of either borrowing or lending, but I should have thought that in a business of this kind, when a money-lender was convicted in a court of law, and a report of the proceedings appeared in the press, that his business would have been damaged for a long time to come, in spite of the fact that he had an appeal pending. For the reasons which I have given, I shall vote against the Amendment.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: The last speaker expressed what may be said against this Amendment. Frivolous appeals, or appeals merely for delay should be discouraged. With respect to the question of appeals, I remember on one occasion being briefed by a man who was prosecuted and convicted with respect to milk adulteration. He instructed me to intimate an appeal in court. I asked him: "Why are you making an appeal? You have not a dog's chance if you do appeal." After leaving the court I stated the grounds against his succeeding in the appeal, and he replied, "Never mind, it will get into the newspapers, and when people see that I am appealing, and the appeal does not come on for perhaps six months, we will drop it, and the offence will be forgotten." I felt that my leg had been pulled in the matter, and I would not have intimated the appeal had I known why it was being done. An Amendment of the Clause in these words might meet the case with which the Committee seeks to deal:

"The Court shall, pending an appeal, unless cause be shown to the contrary, defer operation of the order."

That would show that the Court must have some reason for taking away the certificate. There must be some good cause shown.

I do not wish to show special favour to moneylenders. I know that they have no friends. No man who lends money has friends. It is said that the man who lends money loses his friends. It is the same with a landowner who lends a house to a man for a rent, which is another form of money lending. Both these classes of "lenders" are unpopular members of the community. The moneylender ought to get justice, however unpopular he may be, and it seems to me that this provision would operate harshly unless the Court has the power pending an appeal to defer operations unless it has reasons for not doing so. It would be open for the prosecution to say to the Court: "This is a very bad case, and for that reason the licence should be suspended." Some such provision as I suggest would probably meet the case better than the words in the Bill.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Rhys Davies) when he said that he had been neither a borrower nor a lender. I am not ashamed to say that I have been both. It is a remarkable thing that a Member of this House can say truthfully that he has never been a lender of money. My experience is that when people come to you to ask for charity they also ask you to lend them half a crown. The hon. Member argued that if the certificate happens to have been suspended, the man cannot carry on business, and that the business must necessarily cease. There is a considerable difference between the business of a moneylender and other businesses which may be closed down by order of the Court. In the case of the moneylender, the business does not consist merely in lending money. The money has to be received back. What is to happen in regard to a man whose certificate has been suspended, if he cannot continue to carry on business of any kind and receive back the money which is justly due to him from the people to whom he has lent it? His office ought to be open to receive back the money. If the magistrate had the discretion to be able to say that pending the appeal no further business of lending money should take place, I would agree; but if we say that he shall not carry on any business at all—it will be found that it would be interpreted in that way—the man will be in the position that he cannot receive back the money that is owing to him. That would be very unfair.

We have had learned opinions given this morning. The Lord Advocate has given his opinion, and the hon. and learned Member for South-West Hull (Mr. Grottrian), who is the Recorder of Scarborough, and has had considerable experience as regards appeals at Quarter Sessions, has given his opinion. Then we had an expression of opinion from the hon. and learned Member for South

Shields (Mr. Harney), and as a layman I am going to submit that the weight of argument from the legal side is in favour of the Amendment. If you take into consideration the practical difficulties which will arise if you close down a man's business altogether I think the promoters of the Bill should accept it. It is not a vital point to them, but it is to the man who may have his certificate suspended, and during the time he is making an appeal his business is entirely closed.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The House divided: Ayes, 134; Noes, 29.

Division No. 235.]

AYES.

[12.38 p.m.]

Acland-Troyte, Lieut.-Colonel
Alexander, A. V. (Sheffield, Hillsbro')
Alexander, E. E. (Leyton)
Ammon, Charles George
Barker, G. (Monmouth, Abertillery)
Bird, Sir R. B. (Wolverhampton, W.)
Bowyer, Capt. G. E. W.
Brassey, Sir Leonard
Brooke, Brigadier-General C. R. I.
Froun-Lindsay, Major H.
Brown, Brig.-Gen. H. C. (Berks, Newb'y)
Buchanan, G.
Campbell, E. T.
Cautley, Sir Henry S.
Cayzer, Sir C. (Chester, City)
Charteris, Brigadier-General J.
Clayton, G. C.
Cobb, Sir Cyril
Cochrane, Commander Hon. A. D.
Colman, N. C. D.
Cooper, A. Duff
Couper, J. B.
Crookshank, Cpt. H. (Lindsey, Gainsbro)
Davies, Rhys John (Westhoughton)
Davies, Dr. Vernon
Day, Colonel Harry
Eden, Captain Anthony
Edmondson, Major A. J.
Edwards, C. (Monmouth, Bedwellty)
Ellis, R. G.
Elveden, Viscount
Erskine, Lord (Somerset, Weston-s.-M.)
Everard, W. Lindsay
Falle, Sir Bertram G.
Fermoy, Lord
Fraser, Captain Ian
Fremantle, Lieut.-Colonel Francis E.
Garro-Jones, Captain G. M.
Gibbins, Joseph
Gibbs, Col. Rt. Hon. George Abraham
Glyn, Major R. G. C.
Goff, Sir Park
Grattan-Doyle, Sir N.
Greenwood, A. (Nelson and Colne)
Grenfell, D. R. (Glamorgan)
Gretton, Colonel Rt. Hon. John

Gunston, Captain D. W.
Hacking, Captain Douglas H.
Hall, G. H. (Merthyr Tydvil)
Hall, Capt. W. D'A. (Brecon & Rad.)
Hannon, Patrick Joseph Henry
Harvey, Major S. E. (Devon, Totnes)
Headlam, Lieut.-Colonel C. M.
Henderson, T. (Glasgow)
Heneage, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur P.
Hennessy, Major Sir G. R. J.
Holt, Captain H. P.
Hope, Capt. A. O. J. (Warw'k, Nun.)
Hudson, J. H. (Huddersfield)
Hudson, R. S. (Cumb'l'nd, Whiteh'n)
Hume, Sir G. H.
Hutchinson, G.A. Clark (Mid'l'n & P'b'l's)
Jacob, A. E.
Jenkins, W. (Glamorgan, Neath)
John, William (Rhondda, West)
Jones, Morgan (Caerphilly)
Joynson-Hicks, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Kennedy, T.
King, Commodore Henry Douglas
Knox, Sir Alfred
Lawrence, Susan
Loder, J. de V.
Luce, Major-Gen. Sir Richard Harman
Lumley, L. R.
MacIntyre, Ian
McLean, Major A.
Marriott, Sir J. A. R.
Merriman, F. B.
Monsell, Eyres, Com. Rt. Hon. B. M.
Moore, Lieut.-Colonel T. C. R. (Ayr)
Nelson, Sir Frank
Newton, Sir D. G. C. (Cambridge)
Nicholson, Col. Rt. Hon. W. G. (P'trs'ld.)
O'Neill, Major Rt. Hon. Hugh
Oliver, George Harold
Paling, W.
Parkinson, John Allen (Wigan)
Penny, Frederick George
Perring, Sir William George
Pethick-Lawrence, F. W.
Peto, G. (Somerset, Frome)
Pownall, Sir Assheton

Raine, Sir Walter
Ramsden, E.
Rice, Sir Frederick
Richardson, Sir P. W. (Sur'y, Ch'ts'y)
Rose, Frank H.
Sandeman, N. Stewart
Sanders, Sir Robert A.
Sandon, Lord
Savery, S. S.
Scurr, John
Shepperson, E. W.
Shiels, Dr. Drummond
Simms, Dr. John M. (Co. Down)
Sitch, Charles H.
Skelfton, A. N.
Smith, Ben (Bermondsey, Rotherhithe)
Smith-Carington, Neville W.
Somerville, A. A. (Windsor)
Spender-Clay, Colonel H.
Spoor, Rt. Hon. Benjamin Charles
Sprot, Sir Alexander
Stanley, Lord (Fylde)
Steel, Major Samuel Strang
Stephen, Campbell
Streatfield, Captain S. R.
Stuart, Crichton, Lord C.
Thompson, Luke (Sunderland)
Thomson, F. C. (Aberdeen, South)
Thurtle, Ernest
Tinker, John Joseph
Vaughan-Morgan, Col. K. P.
Warner, Brigadier-General W. W.
Watson, Rt. Hon. W. (Carlisle)
Welloock, Wilfred
Westwood, J.
Wheler, Major Sir Granville C. H.
White, Lieut.-Col. Sir G. Dairymple
Williams, Herbert G. (Reading)
Windsor, Walter
Windsor-Clive, Lieut.-Colonel George
Wise, Sir Fredric
Yerburgh, Major Robert D. T.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—

Mr. Burman and Mr. Wells.

NOES.

Batey, Joseph
Bromley, J.
Brown, Ernest (Leith)
Compton, Joseph

Crooke, J. Smedley (Deritend)
Dennison, R.
Dunnico, H.
Grottrian, H. Brent

Groves, T.
Grundy, T. W.
Hall, F. (York, W.R., Normanton)
Harney, E. A.

Hartshorn, Rt. Hon. Vernon
 Hayes, John Henry
 Hirst, G. H.
 Hirst, W. (Bradford, South)
 Jones, T. I. Mardy (Pontypridd)
 Kelly, W. T.
 Macquisten, F. A.

Morrison, R. C. (Tottenham, N.)
 Naylor, T. E.
 Robinson, W. C. (Yorks, W.R., Elland)
 Snell, Harry
 Stamford, T. W.
 Thorne, W. (West Ham, Plaistow)
 Townend, A. E.

Varley, Frank B.
 Viant, S. P.
 Wright, W.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
 Lieut.-Col. Watts-Morgan and Mr.
 Womersley.

CLAUSE 3.—(Names to be stated on documents.)

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I beg to move, in page 6, line 1, to leave out Sub-section (1).

I realise that I am travelling against adversity, and I shall put my case very shortly as I have already ventilated the point in Committee. This is another instance of prejudice being introduced with a good deal of effect. My Amendment is one of principle—

Mr. GROVES: Not interest?

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I am not talking of capital, but of the principle with regard to the actions that may arise from anything done in this House. Why should moneylenders be treated differently from any other trade? It is well known that companies registered before 1916 are not compelled to publish these particulars. No other company incorporated before then has to show the particulars mentioned in the Sub-section which I seek to delete, and I do not see why different treatment should be meted out, unless it is to create prejudice against the moneylending company. It will not cost the promoters anything to agree to this Amendment, and thus to rid this Bill of some of the cargo with which they have overloaded it. They have introduced matters which have not been before the Select Committee and which have not been discussed very fully upstairs. I could give some very nasty instances on that point. One of my objections to the triple set of these Bills is that so much of them is due to the ignorant spite caused by Noble Lords in another place stepping down from their high judicial position because of personal prejudice in order to frame a Measure. I want to rid this Measure of spite and personal prejudice. The Government ought to have taken the matter in hand themselves and conducted an inquiry and given us a fair Bill. The bulk of moneylenders are respectable and are trying to carry on an honest trade. If the Measure was tempered with more of the milk of human kindness, and if more justice and equity were put into it, it would get on very much better.

Mr. HARNEY: I beg to second the Amendment. I agree with the general remarks made by the hon. Member. I have never been able to see why a business that must be regarded as legal should be treated with that kind of vindictiveness which certainly characterised this Bill in its early stages. As to the Amendment, hon. Members will remember that by an Act passed in 1917 certain companies were called upon to publish certain particulars. That Act said that companies should not be asked to give those particulars if they were already in existence, and that it should only apply to companies formed afterwards. This Bill says that the provisions of that Act shall apply with the necessary modifications to every moneylending company, even though they were formed before 1916. Why make an absurd exception? In the case of ordinary companies you say that they shall only be required to give these particulars if they were formed after the Act comes into operation. That is perfectly right and proper, but it is not fair that ten years later you should come along and say that it shall apply retrospectively to moneylending companies.

Mr. BURMAN: This particular Amendment of the Companies Acts dealing with company directors was passed during the War, and it required all companies registered after its passing to publish certain particulars, including the names of the directors of the company. It was a very simple Measure passed in order that persons who dealt with the companies might know whether they were dealing with British subjects or with foreigners. Every company established after the date of the passing of the Act had to give those particulars, but a company registered before 1917 was not required to give them as it was assumed to be conducted by British subjects. It is proposed now that that exemption with regard to companies registered before 1917 should not apply to moneylending firms. Shortly, it amounts to this, that in future every firm of moneylenders registered under the Companies Acts, either privately or publicly, will have to publish the names of their directors, and people will then be able to know with whom they are dealing.

Mr. HARNEY: I have no objection to their being compelled to give particulars. My objection was because you are making a fish of one and fowl of another. Parliament has said that it will not be retrospective for companies generally, but this Bill makes it retrospective for one class of company.

Mr. BURMAN: I ask the House to support me in opposing this Amendment in order that these companies may be called upon to give the names of their directors. Surely there is no hardship in that.

Mr. THURTELL: I hope this Amendment will not be accepted. I have noticed we have had a lawyer speaking in support of it, and it was said during the last discussion that the weight of legal argument was on the side of the moneylenders. As I listened to the discussion this morning, it occurred to me that, if the weight of legal argument is on the side of the moneylenders, it might not be unconnected with the fact that the weight of money is also on their side. It has been said, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." The fact that there is a great financial interest behind this moneylending business may not be unconnected with the ardent support given by lawyers in this House to the moneylending interests. We ought to do everything possible to make it difficult for disreputable moneylending firms to carry on business. Those who are carrying on an honest straightforward business will not be afraid to proclaim to the world what their real names are, and I think there is no justification at all for this Amendment.

Mr. NAYLOR: I supported my hon. and gallant Friend in his last Amendment, but I am afraid that I cannot support him in this one. I was to some extent disappointed in the arguments adduced in favour of the Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman on the Liberal benches asked that we should not make fish of one kind of company and fowl of another. Now I do not want to suggest any other kind of company is of a fishy nature or that the moneylending business is necessary fowl, but one must realise that the moneylending business is not exactly the same kind of commercial business as is carried on by an ordinary company engaged in commerce, and, that being the case, the House ought not to support the Amendment.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like to support my hon. and gallant Friend, because it is extremely unfair to make fish of one and flesh of another, but, if that rule were applied, we should find that the Amendment would make fish of one and flesh of another as far as new companies and old companies are concerned. It would draw a distinction in the matter of names between the new company and the old company which would be very prejudicial to the new company. It will be unfair to make the new companies do something which the old companies were not required to do.

Amendment negatived.

CLAUSE 4.—(Prohibition of money-lending circulars, etc.)

Major GLYN: I beg to move, in page 7, line 20, after the word "circulation," to insert the words "or by means of any poster or placard."

I am the first Member on this side of the House to move an Amendment on this Bill, but I do attach great importance to this Amendment because, when I introduced a Bill on this subject last year, I had the advantage of having it considered by a Joint Committee, and we unanimously came to the conclusion to remove the possibility of the individual appeal by the moneylender or those connected with a money-lending company to private persons. Money-lending is a legal profession undoubtedly, and you must allow moneylenders some means of advertising their vocation. It was agreed at that time that they ought to be allowed to insert advertisements in the newspapers, because that would not be a personal appeal to any young man or woman who might be taken in by a circular. But then it was said that by doing so we should make it possible for moneylenders to buy a large number of newspapers, to mark their advertisements, and to send them broadcast to individuals, just as they do with circulars.

[Major Glyn.]

To mark a newspaper and send it broadcast would be acting against the law. I would draw attention to the Amendment in the name of the Financial Secretary to the War Office which is next on the Paper, to leave out certain words in the same Clause. I think the moneylender ought to be allowed to have a placard outside his establishment to proclaim his vocation, since the profession of money-lending is legal, but I have the strongest possible objection to having placards advertising moneylenders all over the streets and inviting people to borrow money. That may be the result of this Bill becoming law as it stands. There are, of course, a very large number of moneylenders who carry on their business in a highly proper manner and like other people they are suffering for the sins of those who do not carry on their business honestly. Those are the people who would advertise in this way and destroy the purpose of the Bill. I hope that this Amendment will receive the general assent of the House, because I think it is highly important that we should make it perfectly clear that the promoters of the Bill desire to remove that direct appeal to individuals by circulars or other means. At Charing Cross Railway Station the other day I met a sandwich man carrying a placard on the top of which were these words

"Why not come to my firm and have all your financial worries cured?"

From the evidence we have had before us I do not think anyone wants his financial worries cured in such a manner. If you allow the Bill to stand as it is now we are not going to do very much good. We do not want to boost up any other trade or profession by this Bill, but we are out to try to do our best, while giving perfectly fair treatment to moneylenders, to remove temptation from those who are likely to be taken in by the appeals of dishonest moneylenders because a fool and his money are soon parted. We have to get rid of touting on behalf of these dishonest moneylenders who are causing a great deal of suffering and misery.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: I beg to second the Amendment.

A previous speaker commented on the number of lawyers who spoke on behalf of the money-lending fraternity. I have no personal acquaintance with them but I know about them professionally. My professional knowledge is con-

1.0 p.m. fined to the receipt of a large number of their circulars since I became a Member of Parliament. They seem to think that as soon as a man is elected to this House he will be likely to be in need of money. I do not approve either of their touting or of their advertising, and I think we should restrict this aspect of their business as much as possible. I confess I am greatly disappointed with the Bill as it stands. It misses out one of the most essential provisions, if foolish borrowers are to be protected. There ought to have been a provision, such as I adumbrated when a Moneylenders Bill was introduced by another hon. Member last year—I mean a provision against moneylenders taking written statements or declarations from intending borrowers.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: Will the hon. and learned Member explain what part of the Amendment he is dealing with now?

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Captain FitzRoy): The hon. and learned Member's arguments are considerably wide of the Amendment but on this Amendment the House can discuss the whole of Clause 4.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: It is the practice of certain of the evil type of moneylenders to send their clients to another moneylender, who, very often, is the representative of the first moneylender. They tell him that they have no more money to lend, but believe that their friend has. But they enjoin him not in any circumstances to tell the new lender that he either knows the first lender, or that he owes him any money. When he goes to the second moneylender, the second moneylender will say that he does not suppose that the wretched borrower, whom we will call Mr. Snooks, owes anything to any other moneylender. When he recalls what he has been told by the first one, he confirms this statement, and he is then asked to sign a statement to that effect, as it will be needed to raise the money for him. The wretched borrower signs, and then he is in the toils, and, when the crash comes, he is threatened with criminal proceedings for obtaining money by false pretences. He then goes to his widowed mother or his clergyman father, and weeps that he is in danger of being sent to gaol, whereupon they, terrified by the prospect of such an exposure, pawn all that they have in order to pay the debt. They are too ashamed to consult even the family solicitor, or tell anyone about it. The borrower knows, and his next-of-kin know, that he has signed a lie. The moneylenders knew that it was a lie, and deliberately set the booby-trap for him, intending to use it as I have described.

Mr. BUCHANAN: If that is so, is it not a form of blackmail, and therefore the moneylender who does it can be prosecuted if he dares to use such a declaration?

Mr. MACQUISTEN: I am inclined to agree with the hon. Member, but the point is that it never gets to the length of a criminal prosecution. The wretched borrower knows that he has told a lie and he is in terror. I have had a moneylender come to me and say, "Your client signed this." I replied, "On whom are you trying that?" And I told him that I would have him in the Fiscal's hands if he was not careful. I put the blackmail on the other foot. Some of the lower grade moneylenders have a clearing house for dealing with these matters. One of them will say to a would-be borrower, "I am tired of lending you money. Go to Mr. So-and-so. He has a lot of money to lend; but do not tell him you owe money to me."

Mr. DENNISON: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman dealing with the whole of the Bill or with this particular Amendment?

Mr. MACQUISTEN: I am dealing with this Clause. The hon. Gentleman should not be quite so sensitive about it. I wish to ask my hon. Friends who are promoting this Bill whether they could not get such an Amendment as I have indicated, to deal with declarations, used in another place? It is the root of the whole difficulty. It is a form of blackmail that is used for collecting money from a man's next-of-kin. There is a difference between the banker and the moneylender. The banker lends you money when you have some, but the moneylender lends it when you have none. It is to prevent the next-of-kin of the unfortunate borrower being punished by the use of this kind of declaration that I wish to see the matter dealt with, if possible, in another place. With the Amendment as far as it goes, I have every sympathy.

Mr. BURMAN: In the Bill as originally introduced by me circulars, posters and placards were all prohibited, but advertisements were allowed in newspapers under certain restrictions. The matter was thoroughly discussed in Committee, and under pressure I agreed to remove placards and posters from the prohibition. Of course, advertisements in newspapers and posters and placards do not constitute a personal affront in the same way as the circular which reaches you by post in the morning. You are not bound to read advertisements in newspapers or posters on the walls or placards on the hoardings. Therefore I do not regard this as a vital element in the Bill. At the same time there are others who think that posters and placards should be prohibited, and if the House desires the Clause to be restored as it was when the Bill came before the House for Second Reading, I have no objection.

Mr. HARNEY: I understand that we can deal generally with the whole Clause on this Amendment. There are two Amendments on the Paper in my name. One is to insert, after the word "placard," the words "or by means of a circular or business card." I do not agree entirely with the strong views expressed by another hon. Member about these circulars generally. I confess that I have not been able to see much distinction between the scented envelopes of the moneylenders and the very elaborate things sent out by tea dealers and sugar dealers and cigar merchants and wine merchants. I throw them all into the wastepaper basket, and I am annoyed by the one no more than by the other. If I were on the lookout for wine, I should take the wine circular, but I am well supplied already. I do not think there is any just ground of complaint against these circulars being sent out by tradesmen. If they do not interest you, you throw them on one side. But we have had to bow to the storm of prejudice against such circulars. It is provided in the Bill that the only way money-lenders can make themselves known to the public is by some document or other that will give their name, their address, their telegraphic address and their telephone number, and stating the fact that they lend money. That is all that they are allowed to do.

[Mr. Harney.]

The purpose of all these Amendments is to ascertain in what way they ought to do that very limited thing. No one wants them to do more. There have been three suggested methods. One is that they ought to be allowed to do it by a business card. The other is that they ought to be allowed to do it by placard or poster. The third is that they ought to be allowed to do it through the medium of the public press. Before the Select Committee, Lord Darling, the President, referring to Lord Phillimore, said:

"I think the Noble and learned Lord will find there is no difficulty for a moneylender to start his business. He may send out business cards. There is a provision as to that and as to putting advertisements in the newspapers."

The Bill as drafted excludes the business card, and allows the advertisement, and, as to the poster and placard, I think there was some misunderstanding. I have here what the hon. Member for Duddeston (Mr. Burman) said in Committee:

"The Bill as it stands permits a poster or placard outside the registered premises but prohibits them generally on hoardings. The chief reason why circulars have been prohibited is because they are a great annoyance and vexation to the public, but I do not think that reason applies to the same extent with regard to the poster or placard which is a legitimate method of advertising the business, and the promoters will raise no objection to the acceptance of the Amendment."—[OFFICIAL REPORT. Standing Committee A., 5th April, 1927; col. 77.]

That was an Amendment dealing with the use of placards generally. The Bill does not carry out that proposition, because a poster or placard can only be exhibited at the authorised address, so that as the Bill stands, the only way in which a man who is carrying on this legitimate business—who must be of good character, and who is restricted in a score of other ways—can make himself known to the public, is by a placard outside his premises or by putting an advertisement in the newspaper. These are two very inadequate methods. Once you recognise that his business is legitimate and is properly safeguarded, every channel in ordinary commercial and business usage should be open to him for making himself known. You shut him out from anything in the nature of an invitation, anything like a tout, anything like a puff. Everybody else—the wine merchant, and the tobacco merchant—may tout and puff and humbug us, sending out rosy descriptions of their wares, but the moneylender can do nothing but state "This is my address, this is my telephone number, and the business I do is that of lending money." When you limit him in that way, you ought to open every window to him for making those facts known.

I draw the attention of the House to two or three reasons why the particular method selected, namely that of advertising in a newspaper, is a bad one, and one likely to defeat the very purpose which the promoters have in view. At present, a great deal of money is spent by moneylenders in sending out circulars. They are now told they cannot expend that money on circulars, but they can expend it in the Press. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent a person inserting the few particulars which are allowed as a full-page advertisement on the front of the "Daily Mail." Fancy the front page of the "Daily Mail" with such an announcement as this: "John Jones—or Snooks, or whatever it may be. My telephone number is —, my telegraphic address is —. I lend money to all comers." Do you think that in such a case a newspaper proprietor could not in the first place put up the prices and in the second place say to the moneylender, "My friend, if you send a good fat half-page or full-page advertisement, I will give you a puff in my leaderettes"? The result will be that instead of the circular which falls quietly into the postal receptacle, which is opened quietly at the breakfast table, and thrown quietly into the waste-paper basket, you will have flashing advertisements in the public Press, and insidious puffs which cannot be given in the circulars but which can be given through a third party in the Press. The wise course is to adopt Lord Darling's advice, and allow these gentlemen to send out their business cards. Prevent them if you like from doing what other business men can do, namely, using puffs, but since you limit them to a mere announcement of their existence, let them make that existence known in the ordinary business way by card, instead of forcing them into the public Press. To force them into the Press will defeat the object which the promoters have in view and will be unfair to the small printers in the country who will be cut out of the profit which is to be made by printing these circulars, while the rich monopoly newspapers will benefit.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: We have reached what is probably one of the most important Clauses of the Bill. I think I am right in saying that had it not been for the moneylenders' circulars, which were sent out so openly to everybody, this Bill might never have been brought forward. I do not know why the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) should complain about the proposal of the Amendment to impose these restrictions. Having listened to the Debates on this subject for some weeks, I confess that if I had my way, I would place the moneylender, for purposes of advertisement, in the same category as the lawyer. I would not allow any advertisement of any kind which invited anybody to borrow money.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: On a point of Order. Is this something new which is being sprung upon us? There is surely nothing in law to prevent a doctor or a legal man advertising in his own way. This is trying to put the camel through the eye of the needle—bringing forward these spurious arguments.

Mr. DAVIES: It would have to be a big needle. I do not know whether there are any restrictions in law on the legal profession in this respect, or whether it is by custom, or by regulation, but they do not advertise.

Mr. HARNEY: It is due to our modesty.

Mr. DAVIES: At any rate, in the legal profession and the medical profession there is no advertisement. If you want a good lawyer, or a bad lawyer, you have to search for him. The same rule, I am informed, applies to the Stock Exchange. I do not see, therefore, why the hon. and learned Member should complain about the advertisements of moneylenders being restricted. There is an Amendment to be moved later, on behalf of the Home Office, which will prohibit any placards at the place of business of the moneylender. That is a further restriction, and I welcome it. Cases appear in the Press every day, showing the terribly tragic consequences which arise from this business of moneylending. Later on, I shall have something to say on the general principle of moneylending. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields during the Committee stage, and also to-day, has several times expressed the view that moneylending is like any other business. I decline to accept that view. Moneylending is a business apart. If I have £100 to lend and a man comes to me and borrows that £100, that man is in bondage to me until he has repaid that sum. Consequently, I say that lending money is an entirely different business from an ordinary transaction, and—

Mr. WOMERSLEY: What about if he gets credit for goods; is he not in bondage then?

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: That is Home Office honesty.

Mr. DAVIES: I am sure my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Rhondda (Lieut.-Colonel Watts-Morgan) does not want me to enter into combat with him. I should prefer an argument with hon. Members opposite, but these two Amendments on Clause 4, in my view, are very necessary, and any Amendment whatsoever that would restrict this business within very definite limits would be welcome, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GROVES: I also am in favour of both these Amendments. I have been opposed to the moneylending business all my life, because I believe its ramifications are inimical to the general population. I would like to submit to the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) that in his speech just now he said that the quiet dropping of these circulars into a postal receptacle was no greater danger than the sending of wine circulars and so on, but according to the Bill the moneylenders will not be allowed to send out these circulars.

Mr. HARNEY: I pointed that out.

Mr. GROVES: I welcome that part of the Bill too, that in future they will not be allowed to send us, as they do now almost weekly, in what the hon. and learned Member rightly described as scented envelopes, circulars very ingeniously worded. I am not speaking for myself, because I have never been in the clutches of the moneylenders, having always learned to say, "No, thank you" to that kind of inducement.

[Mr. Groves.]

Mr. HARNEY: You can only send the name and address now, and I was dealing with the point as to whether it was better that that, and that only, should be done through the post or through a newspaper.

Mr. GROVES: I think the ingenious circulars sent out to all and sundry—

Mr. HARNEY: They cannot be ingenious, because only the name and address are allowed.

Mr. GROVES: I welcome provisions tightening up the possibilities of these people, because of my experience of the horror, the harshness, and the insidiousness of the circulars sent out by them. It is easy to see that these circulars are intended not only for the unwary but for people who are really in the moment of need, and I submit that anything that we can do to prevent their distribution we should do. While it is not a legal restriction that prevents lawyers or doctors from advertising, but is a part of the custom of those professions, they have discovered it to be profitable to maintain a select security, and anything that we can do to put moneylenders in a similar position will be a step in the right direction. I submit that there is no need for people who have money to lend or to give to have either puffs from newspapers or these nicely worded circulars sent out. I am very astounded that there should be people in this country running about with the desire to lend money, and it suggests itself to me that, of course, the motive is that of extorting a very high rate of interest for the money lent. I am sorry that in this Bill we could not have dealt with the widespread credit system in this country under which people are invited to get goods, not coin.

If moneylenders want to be treated, as the hon. and learned Member for South Shields suggested, as on an equal footing with other industries, they might themselves open places in London and exhibit their goods, just as the people who sell wines in Holborn illustrate their brands in shop windows. I am sure they would not want any circulars if they exhibited ordinary sovereigns for loan. Let them openly take offices in London and not send circulars to poor people in the country or send poor people along the Strand, carrying placards. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields would, I suppose, say that people who are strong enough would pass them by and not be affected, but he knows as well as I do that in this land to-day there are many clever and insidious ways in which people of cupidity are capable of impressing, not their wares, but their ideas on the common people, and I believe that the use of these artifices has for many years affected, not only the poor artisan people, but many of the middle-class people also, until they have got into the hands of moneylenders and found themselves, in the end, bankrupt. I am sure that any Amendment restricting the possibilities of these people advertising their trade is a step in the right direction, and I hope that both the Amendments to this Clause will be accepted.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I hope I did not hear aright the hon. Member for Duddleston (Mr. Burman) say that he was prepared to accept the Amendment, having regard to what transpired in Committee upstairs. There is so little interest exhibited in this Bill on the benches on both sides of the House that we are now left simply, with one or two exceptions to those who have devoted a good deal of time, both in the Select Committee and in the Committee upstairs, to this Measure. I want to enter my protest, after the discussion which we had upstairs, at the readiness which is displayed to accept this Amendment. I am confining myself at the moment to the phrase which we succeeded in having included in the Bill in Committee allowing the moneylenders at least this amount of grace and fair play, that they may exhibit on their own premises the same kind of placard that they would be allowed to put into a newspaper under this Clause. I now understand that the hon. Member for Duddleston is going to give way, remove that concession which he made in Committee, and accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon (Major Glynn) and also that of the hon. and gallant Member representing the Government.

Mr. BURMAN: The original Bill prohibited placards on hoardings, but permitted them on the business premises of moneylenders. Under pressure in Committee, I gave way and permitted posters and placards on hoardings, but now that an Amendment has been moved to restore that prohibition to the Bill, I naturally desire that it should be restored, though I agree that moneylenders should be allowed, on their own premises, to show that they are doing business there.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I understand that the hon. Member is going to accept the Amendment which will prohibit that taking place. Do not let us have any monkeying about the business at all.

Commodore KING: I was going to explain, after the remarks of the hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Rhys Davies)—

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I am not giving way to the hon. and gallant Member.

Commodore KING: If the hon. and gallant Member will allow me, I was going to explain that if this Amendment is carried, mine, in line 26, to leave out from the word "aforesaid" to the word "if" in line 28, will not be moved.

Lieut. - Colonel WATTS - MORGAN: That means exactly the same thing.

Commodore KING: I think I can make it plain. On an Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Member for East Rhondda (Lieut.-Colonel Watts-Morgan) in Committee, these words, which it is now proposed to insert, were omitted. From the point of view of the Government, they did not mind whether they were in or out, and, under pressure, the promoters of the Bill accepted the deletion of these words. A question was put in Committee to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General whether, if those words were omitted, it would not be necessary to delete the words lower down as is proposed in an Amendment standing in my name on the Amendment Paper now before the House. Through some mistake, as hon. Members will see if they look at the OFFICIAL REPORT of the second day's proceedings in Standing Committee, it was reported that these words which I now seek to delete were, in fact, deleted in Committee, but in the official record that does not appear, and my Amendment is merely to carry out the intention expressed by the Committee upstairs. But if this Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend be carried, there will be no need for my Amendment to be moved, because it is only complementary to the Amendment which was made in Committee.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I am very much obliged for the explanation, and it does carry out what we agreed upon upstairs with regard to that matter.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: May I ask whether, if this Amendment be carried, a moneylender cannot have a brass plate with his name on his door, or a painted sign to indicate that he is doing business on certain premises?

Commodore KING: The proviso to Sub-section (2) says:

"Provided that an advertisement . . . may be published . . . by means of a poster or placard exhibited at any authorised address of the moneylender."

Those words will still remain. I do not seek to remove them.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: Will not the position be this? If we accept the first Amendment, the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member opposite is not to be moved, and the moneylender will be precluded from using placards and posters in general, but will be allowed posters and placards on his place of business?

Commodore KING: Yes.

Mr. HARNEY: I would like to ask whether the promoters and the Government have definitely made up their minds to resist my Amendment relating to business cards? Will they not reconsider the sending out of a business card?

Commodore KING: No; we could not do that.

Mr. DENNISON: I agree with my hon. Friend that this is, perhaps, the most important Clause in the Bill. I am glad, also, that there is a general consensus of opinion in the House to accept the Amendment to prohibit general placarding by posters and so on, because I think that is a most objectionable form of advertisement. It is a serious proposition for a Scotsman to see a man with a board on his back with the words, "Do you want money?" I am very glad that that form of advertisement is to be cut out. Nothing has been said about Sub-section (3) of this Clause dealing with the question of touting. If there was one thing against which the Committee upstairs, and particularly the Select Committee, of which I had the honour of being a member, set their face, it was touting on behalf of the moneylending business, and I think on examination it will be found that Sub-section (3) of this Clause is very tight indeed. But I would ask whether or not, between now and the time when the Bill reaches another place, some provision could not be added to deal with dud firms, that is, firms who start with no money at all, who may be registered at Somerset House with about £3 capital, and advertise themselves as prepared to lend anything from £5 to £5,000 on note of hand? That is worth inquiring into.

[Mr. Dennison.]

I do not think there is anything in the Bill to deal with that form of abuse in a profession which, after all, is a necessary commercial business to-day, whether it is regrettable or not, and it is carried on in many cases at a high standard. We know it is abused. There are unscrupulous moneylenders, just as there are unscrupulous borrowers. Only this week we have seen a report of proceedings regarding the bankruptcy of a noble lord, a member of the other House, who has been bankrupt three times. He attributes his downfall to having got into the hands of moneylenders. He did not go to moneylenders of his own volition, but because he was being pressed by other people to get money, which he merely handed over to tradespeople or other people who were pressing him hard. I know of a tenant of a public house belonging to a brewery company, of which an hon. Member of this House happens to be a director, and the tenant was being pressed so severely for his accounts that he had to go to a moneylender to get the money to hand over to the brewery company. Let us be quite frank. Let us examine this thing in all its bearings without prejudice. It is extremely difficult to deal with this matter without being liable to be understood as taking the side of the moneylender against the borrower, and I make this confession, that when I was appointed a member of the Select Committee of 1925, frankly I went on to that Committee unconsciously with a tremendous amount of prejudice against the moneylender, but, in the course of the proceedings, having heard the evidence and the whole position examined, I certainly modified my view. I came across sufficient evidence to satisfy me that, alongside the unscrupulous moneylender, there was equally the unscrupulous borrower. This Bill does not deal with the whole contract involved in a moneylending transaction. Nothing is said about the unscrupulous borrower. Instead of being called a Moneylenders Bill, it ought to be called a borrowers' Bill, a borrowers' charter.

But I want to get back to the point that in Committee upstairs we had a very keen debate on the whole of this Clause, occupying four days. We had a very patient chairman, the same chairman who is the subject of censure by certain hon. Members. He had a good deal of patience with the promoters of the Bill. I would not like to say he was 100 per cent. patient with us, though I would be the last to pay him anything but a compliment. There was the keenest discussion and the keenest division on this Clause. On this question of placards, posters and circulars the majority was only 8. I do not know how many Members there were on the Committee who might be regarded as promoters of the Bill, but there were a good many supporters of the Government. Really this is not a private Members' Bill. It is a Tory Bill. The Government have tried to make out that this is a private Members' Bill, but they have not deluded me into that belief, because I have spent far too much time over this Bill, to the neglect, I am afraid, of some other matters.

I want the House to examine this question of circulars free from prejudice. In 1925, when the Select Committee investigated the question and examined numerous witnesses on the question of circulars, there was no objection to the issue of circulars as such but—and this is the kernel of the question—the objection was concerned with the nature of the circulars and the language in which they were couched, the deceptive language, in many cases. The feeling was that the circular to be sent through the post should be in a limited and prescribed form, that the circular should not tell lies and deceive those who received them. This view is borne out by a statement by Lord Darling in another place. Lord Darling was asked by Lord Phillimore whether the recommendation made by the Select Committee as to circulars sent through the post would preclude the sending of an ordinary business circular or business card. Lord Darling, who was Chairman of the Select Committee, was quite definite on the point. He said it did not preclude a moneylender sending out an ordinary business card in the prescribed form, that is, in the form of the advertisements which moneylenders can send to the newspapers.

This is a difficult question to deal with, because one is liable to be misunderstood and to be accused of being in the hands of moneylenders if one argues in favour of this concession. As other Members have made statements about themselves, perhaps it is necessary for me to say that I am not in the hands of the moneylenders and that I hold no brief for them. I have never borrowed, not because I did not need money, but because I thought it was a very bad habit, and because I could not afford to borrow, being too poor to pay back. Also, I certainly could not lend money. If I had had money to lend, perhaps I should have found some difficulty in parting with it, being a Scotsman.

MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Mr. Hope): I do not see what this has to do with the question of circulars.

MR. DENNISON: I thought we were permitted to discuss the whole of this Clause.

MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: Yes, the Clause, but not the Bill or the personal affairs of a Member.

MR. DENNISON: I am much obliged. I come here to be corrected. What I want to do is to make clear to those Members who were not on the Select Committee or on the Standing Committee that the form of intimation which a moneylender is to be allowed to make to the public was dealt with very specifically. He is to be allowed to advertise only his name, his business address, his telephone number and his telegraphic address. If it is right to allow a man to let the public know through the newspapers that he is carrying on this profession, surely it cannot be wrong to allow him to send the same information privately to an individual through the post. I have not been able to understand what objection there could be to it, unless it were a sentimental objection. I do not see what logical argument could be advanced against it. If the promoters of the Bill will not agree to that, they ought to be frank with us and say they want to make this business illegal and to stop it. It is not fair to accept this business, as we all do, as a necessary commercial proposition and then to preclude those who carry it on from letting the public know about it; and as we have taken steps to check the abuses of which moneylenders may have been guilty in the past through issuing misleading circulars, I think we shall be going too far if we stop circulars altogether.

With the Clause as a whole I am in general agreement. I think it is a sound proposition. I think we are all unanimous about preventing touting. While I cannot always associate myself with the hon. Member who is moving this Amendment, after my experience on the Select Committee and on the Standing Committee, and after close reflection on the matter, I can say that I wholeheartedly support his proposal, though I am only speaking for myself and not for other members of the Labour party or for the Tory party. I know there are some members of the Tory party who agree with me, and it is the first time I have ever found myself in combination with hon. Members opposite, but some of them are right on this occasion.

MR. STEPHEN: The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for King's Norton (Mr. Dennison) with regard to circulars have left me quite cold. He says that the form of the circular is the only cause of complaint. I go further, and say that the fact that the circular is sent at all is a cause of complaint. I will tell my hon. Friend one reason, other than a sentimental reason, why I say that. When a circular of this kind is sent by a moneylender to an individual, it may help to destroy the credit of the individual to whom it is sent. He has not asked the moneylender to send it, but it comes to him as if he were in financial difficulties, and, consequently tends to destroy his credit. With regard to the form, I have here one of the circulars that are sent out by a moneylender in Glasgow. It was sent to one of my constituents, who has sent it on to me, and I think it is well that the House should know the kind of thing that is sent out. It reads as follows:

[Mr. Stephen.]

"I was pleased to see through the Press of the safe arrival of your little son, and trust most sincerely that you are both making satisfactory progress. How pleased and relieved you must be to feel that the little might is a boy—" the House will note the spelling "might" for "mite"—

"and that he is strong and well. Please accept my heartiest congratulations and good wishes. At the time when you are rejoicing over the arrival, you may also be pleased to know that, if you are in financial difficulties, I am prepared to grant any sum from £3 upwards to you and your little son."

This is the sort of thing with regard to which a plea is made that permission should be given to these people to send out circulars.

Mr. DENNISON: On a point of Order. I made it quite clear that I was opposed, as was the Select Committee, to the sending out of misleading circulars of this type.

Mr. STEPHEN: This circular has been sent to me by a constituent of mine, and it is on the notepaper of the moneylender himself. Some of my colleagues have seen it. My hon. Friend the Member for King's Norton says that he made it perfectly clear that he objected to the form of many of these circulars, but I say again that, while it is true that he did say that the form was the objectionable thing, I say that it is more than the form. These circulars may do the people to whom they are sent a great deal of damage, and I am surprised that anyone can defend such a practice at all. It is suggested that they might be allowed simply to send a business card. This might be taken as a business card. A definite form might be laid down for such circulars, but, even if a circular were in the form laid down in the Act, there would still be the possibility of damage to the credit of the individual. I do not want to do anything that will hinder the passing of this Bill, but I did think that this precious circular was worth bringing to the attention of the House during the discussion on this matter. No people suffer more from moneylenders than the poor people in the cities who get into their hands, and, under the form of procedure in connection with a promissory note, they are practically helpless in the hands of the moneylender unless they get legal assistance. They are not in a position to get legal assistance, and, consequently, they are in the toils. I hope that this Bill will pass to-day.

Amendment agreed to.

CLAUSE 5.—(Form of moneylenders' contracts.)

Amendment made: In page 8, line 25, after the word "delivered," insert the words "or sent."—[Mr. Dennison.]

Mr. SOMERVILLE: I beg to move, in page 8, line 25, to leave out the words "within seven days," and to insert instead thereof the words "at the time."

In the unfortunate absence of the other supporters of this Amendment, it falls to me to move it. The fact that the other supporters of the Amendment

2.0 p.m. are lawyers affords some reason for believing that it rests on a sound legal foundation. The object is that the carrying out of the transaction should follow the ordinary course of business, and that, at the time the contract is made, both the borrower and the lender should have a signed copy of the agreement. The Bill as it stands provides that the agreement shall be handed over with seven days, but it seems safer, and more in accordance with the ordinary course of business, that the agreement should be handed over at the moment when it is made and signed. One can easily imagine that an untrustworthy lender, dealing with a weak or credulous borrower, might take advantage of the interval to attempt to tamper with the agreement, and introduce terms more favourable to himself. I hope that my hon. Friend in charge of the Bill will accept the Amendment.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: I beg to second the Amendment.

This Amendment proposes that the note or memorandum containing the terms of the contract shall be signed and delivered to the borrower at the time, and, in accordance with the provisions of this Clause, it will have to contain a statement of the rate per cent. per annum of interest charged; and the circular referred to in Clause 4 has also to show, in somewhat similar terms, the rate per cent. per annum. The drafting of the Bill has been such as to ensure, as far as possible, that the borrower knows exactly what is the rate per cent. per annum charged, and the suggestion of this Amendment is that the agreement containing this and the other particulars shall be handed over at the time it is made, instead of waiting for seven days.

Commodore KING: These words that it is now sought to introduce were deleted in Committee. The Bill, as originally drafted, had these words, "at the time," but after careful consideration the words "within seven days" were substituted. The point raised by the Amendment is that the borrower should know at the time the exact conditions of the contract into which he is entering. If the loan is at a fixed rate of interest he is aware of that when the contract is entered into, because he and everyone to be charged under the contract has personally to sign the contract. Where the loan is not at a stated rate of interest it is already laid down that before the contract is signed the actual rate per cent. per annum involved in the repayment has to be given to the borrower in writing. Therefore his position is well assured. The reason for giving seven days is that many of these transactions are carried out through the post, and while the contract itself may be completed by the signing of the document by all persons who are going to be charged, it seems reasonable that a few days may be allowed for the sending of the copy of the agreement to the borrower, he being, at the time when he enters into the contract, in full knowledge as to what the terms are. After the discussion we had upstairs, I think it is better to leave the Bill as it stands.

Amendment negatived.

CLAUSE 6.—(Prohibition of compound interest and provision as to defaults.)

Commodore KING: I beg to move, in page 9, line 15, at the end, to insert the words

"and any interest so charged shall not be reckoned for the purposes of this Act as part of the interest charged in respect of the loan."

This is with regard to the payment of interest in regard to amounts already due for principal or interest. It is laid down that interest on such overdue amounts may be charged at simple interest. Under Clause 14, where the definition of "interest" occurs, it would obviously not be fair that this simple interest on the over-due amount should be reckoned as interest for the purpose of ascertaining the permanent rate of interest. It would not be fair to reckon this simple interest for the purpose of reckoning the rate of interest on the loan itself.

Amendment agreed to.

CLAUSE 8.—(Provisions as to bankruptcy proceedings for moneylender's loans.)

Mr. HARNEY: I beg to move, in page 10, line 21, to leave out the words "five per cent. per annum," and to insert instead thereof the words "the rate provided for in the original contract."

The object of the Clause is to prevent a very great injustice being done to moneylenders. The Clause as it stands says that in bankruptcy not only for the purpose of dividend but for the purpose of voting at meetings and compositions and schemes of arrangement a moneylender shall, as regards that portion of his claim which is made up of interest, be treated as if the interest is only 5 per cent. after all the other creditors have been satisfied to the full, and then he may come back for the balance. The effect of that is that in the case of the insolvency of his debtor the moneylender shall be treated as if every remedy then opened, namely, for the purpose of receiving dividend for the purpose of voting on a scheme of arrangement, for the purpose of voting for a composition, for everything he could do to get his money back, as if the interest was 5 per cent. and not the full amount.

Take a concrete case. The moneylender makes a bargain. He says, "I will give you £100 if you will promise to give me £148—48 per cent. is the maximum interest under this Bill. There is a bargain. Curtailed in every conceivable way, the moneylender who makes that bargain has to be a man of good character, he has to get a certificate, he has to pay a certain licence fee, he has to make returns, he has to go through an elaborate system of accountancy, and even the 48 per cent. can be cut down if the Judge thinks it is unreasonable. So here you have a man who must be of good character, who is absolutely limited as to the amount of interest he can charge, and who is restricted in every possible way. Having made a perfectly legal bargain under all these adverse circumstances, he ought to have the remedies of the ordinary creditor. This Clause has not been put into the Bill for the purpose of mitigating the evils of moneylending, and it has nothing to do with circulars or with the moneylender getting the borrower into his net. All that has been done by the time this Clause is in operation. It has nothing at all to do with benefiting the borrower, and that is a point I wish to stress. In the circumstances with which we are now dealing, the borrower is out of the picture.

[Mr. Harney.]

You are creating a preference between one creditor and other creditors. Why? Because one of them happens to be a moneylender and the others are not moneylenders. I confess that I do not see very much difference between moneylenders who take advantage of persons in impecunious circumstances and other traders who also take advantage of them by putting up the price because they know the chances of getting payment are doubtful. When any young man goes to his tailor and says "Oh well, you know, I will not be able to pay you for perhaps six or eight months," the tailor makes him pay 60 or 70 per cent. more for his suit. Therefore, I think the tailor or dressmaker, or whoever it may be, is in exactly the same position as the moneylender.

This Clause sprang up in this way. In 1890, the Bankruptcy Act had a provision that where persons were putting in claims for dividends, if the claim included a claim for interest, i.e., interest upon a debt, only 5 per cent. of that interest would be allowed until all the other creditors had been paid. It was not aimed at moneylenders at all. It came to be considered by the official receivers as meaning not interest on a debt but interest in a debt. So what they did was this. They cut down the interest that the moneylender, like any other creditor, might charge on account of arrears of payments. It was thus that they brought forward this extraordinary anomaly. Take a dressmaker who expends £100 upon buying dresses. She disposes of the £100 worth of dresses to customers for £150. £50 is her gross profit. If a debtor of that dressmaker goes into bankruptcy, the dressmaker is allowed to prove for £150, but she is cut down if she charges interest on the non-payment of that £150. Now take the case of the moneylender. The moneylender has £100, and he says "I will give you that £100 in sovereigns if you will promise to give me within a certain time £150. The £150 received by the dressmaker is capital plus profit, and the £150 due to the moneylender is capital plus profit, but the profit of the moneylender is called interest, and, therefore, the official receivers can cut that interest down. That is a great injustice, and it has operated on a great many occasions against moneylenders. We do not want to alter that. We cannot alter it in this Bill. This Bill goes a great deal further than that. So far from remedying injustice to the moneylender it is going to do a further injustice to them, because not merely will the moneylender differ from the dressmaker, bootmaker, grocer or wine merchant, but he will have his profit cut down to 5 per cent. Thus, for all practical purposes, he will be put into a position as though his original bargain was 5 per cent. instead of 48 per cent. as is provided for in the Bill. I say that this is unjust, unfair and unequal treatment.

I think the House ought to vote in favour of this Amendment on purely logical and just grounds. It does not touch the evils of moneylending, and therefore why should a moneylender who has made his bargain subject to all these restrictions and is able to say, "This is a perfectly legal bargain," be deprived of all benefit except 5 per cent. I do not see any justification whatever for that. It was said in Committee that the only grounds upon which this proposal was put forward was that moneylenders might charge exorbitant interest, that they might pile up their claim by putting on interest. It was also asserted that in the case of bankruptcy they might use the method of piling up their claim for the purpose of defeating the other creditors and preventing a composition or arrangements, and compelling the publicity of bankruptcy proceedings, and in that way force a man to pay something. Any lawyer in this House knows perfectly well that not one, but thousands of cases arise every year where ordinary creditors say: "That fellow will pay sooner than go into the Bankruptcy Court." It is not only moneylenders who say this, but other creditors. As a matter of fact, this Clause does not prevent that in the slightest degree. The way to prevent this is to make a provision that the moneylender shall not be allowed to push a debtor into bankruptcy. This Clause says that his voting powers shall be limited. He will not have the privilege, for instance, of saying, "Well, I think that man should really have paid 11s. in the £," although other creditors might think that 9s. in the £ was sufficient. This man's voting power is cut down. Why should he not have full voting powers like other creditors?

It may be said it is unreasonable to ask that the law as it stands under the Bankruptcy Act of 1890, and afterwards confirmed by the Act of 1904, should remain unaltered. But the law operates unjustly and unequally at the present time by reason of the renderings that have been given to certain words in the Act of 1890, when there was no Moneylenders Act. I should like to see an Amendment brought in to set the law right and to remedy the injustice which has been done all these years to moneylenders. Certainly, to aggravate the position, as this Bill does, is wholly without any justification. In 1890, or even ten years later, I could have understood people saying: "We must stop these bloodsuckers—that is what the majority of people would call them, but I would not—these vampires, from rushing people into bankruptcy, and putting forward exorbitant interest for the purpose of being able to outvote the other creditors." I could understand that being said in those days, because there was no restriction then as to the character of the moneylender and no limitation as to interest. In those days they might be men of infamous character, and their interest might be 300, 400 or 500 per cent. We have now before us a Bill which says that they must be men of good character and that they cannot charge exorbitant interest. They cannot, for all practical purposes, go above 48 per cent., and they cannot even go up to that if the Court thinks that they have acted unreasonably. They must be licensed. At this time, when you hedge round a particular class of tradesman, the moneylender, with safeguards which are not applied to any other tradesman, to say that if a man becomes insolvent the moneylender, of all creditors, must be deprived of the rights which the law provides for other people, is most unfair.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I beg to second the Amendment.

Commodore KING: Put shortly, I gather that the complaint of the hon. and learned Member is that moneylenders have been treated for the purpose of voting on composition on the same basis as they stand at present in regard to voting for the purpose of dividend. He complained of the harshness under the Bankruptcy Act of their being treated on the basis of an allowance of only 5 per cent. interest.

Mr. HARNEY: I said that under the Bankruptcy Act they are limited to 5 per cent., but only for the purpose of dividend. That is bad enough, but under this Bill they are also limited to 5 per cent. also for the purpose of composition schemes of arrangement and voting generally, as well as dividend.

Commodore KING: That is what I understood. The hon. and learned Member said that we could not alter the Bankruptcy Act, but that we ought not to carry the principle of Bankruptcy Act to its logical conclusion in connection with this Bill and treat the moneylender for the purpose of voting in respect of compositions and arrangements as they are treated under the Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of dividend. The moneylender would still have the opportunity of obtaining any further interest that might be due to him that the estate in bankruptcy might permit, after the other creditors have been paid.

Mr. HARNEY: How often does that happen?

Commodore KING: He has that right. The provision in this Bill is merely to protect the interest and provisions of other creditors. The moneylender is limited to 5 per cent. for the purpose of composition. It would be very wrong if the moneylender were to be allowed to rank for the whole of his interest, perhaps an exorbitant interest of 40 per cent., 50 per cent., or 60 per cent.—

Mr. HARNEY: Forty-eight per cent.

Commodore KING: Forty-eight per cent. is only a guide; it is not a limit. It would be very unfair to the other creditors if, whatever the rate of interest they charged, they were allowed to vote and to have a voice to the whole of the amount, as against other creditors who are limited to 5 per cent.

Mr. HARNEY: The other creditors get their full interest in the form of profits, which in one case are called interest profits.

Commodore KING: I am speaking of the provision under the Bankruptcy Act which allows only 5 per cent. to be added to the capital sum by way of interest. The promoters of the Bill and the Government consider that it is only fair to the other creditors that moneylenders should be limited to 5 per cent. for the purpose of voting for composition as they are also limited to 5 per cent. for the purpose of dividend.

Amendment negatived.

CLAUSE 9.—(Amendments of 63 and 64 Vict. c. 51, s. 1.)

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: I beg to move, in page 11, line 33, to leave out the words "of a moneylender," and to insert instead thereof the words "in respect of money lent after the commencement of this Act."

We have here an instance of the retrospective effect of this legislation. I cannot say what will be the effect of the Clause if it passes in the way in which it now stands, because nowhere in the Bill is there any mention made of what is to happen in the event of a licence being endorsed in consequence of the re-opening of a transaction made long before the passing of this Act.

Mr. HARNEY: On a point of Order. Has my Amendment in page 11, line 32, at the end, to insert the words:

"Provided that in respect of money lent, when the contract provides for repayment by weekly instalments, a sum not exceeding the rate of twelve per cent. per annum shall be allowed to be charged to cover the costs of collection"— been passed over? I thought that was the most important Amendment on the Paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. I have not selected that Amendment.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: If the endorsement can be adduced as a reason for refusing the certificate, it will be most unjust that transactions entered into by all the parties concerned can be re-opened in the way this Clause permits. Just because a Judge does not happen to think the same as a moneylender as to what is a proper amount of interest to be charged, the moneylender has to run the risk of losing his licence in any proceedings on a case which has been re-opened. If this is the intention of the Bill it will be very unfair to the moneylender, because he cannot know the mind of the Judge. It amounts almost to blackmail in all cases which may be re-opened by the borrower. I have realised from the beginning that this is a borrowers' Bill not a moneylenders' Bill. Hon. Members may look upon money-lending as a sin, but there are other ways of taking people's money which are just as bad. Both should be avoided. It must also be remembered that the moneylender enters into this transaction on the representations of the borrower. This retrospective effect in the Bill will be very injurious. It is dishonest, and it is introduced here with an amount of vengeance which reminds one of the middle ages. The moneylender has no right of appeal. I hope the promoters will accept the Amendment.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: I do not think there is any serious grievance here. Under the Moneylenders Act 1900, a transaction can be re-opened on the ground that it is harsh and unconscionable, and if when the transaction is re-opened and comes before the Court and it is proved against the moneylender that it is harsh and unconscionable surely it is fair that a record should be made of that transaction on the certificate. It is a record of the fact that he did something dishonest or unsatisfactory before this Bill was passed, and as the transaction is not re-opened under this Bill but under the Act of 1900, I do not think we are doing the moneylenders any injustice.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: He may lose his licence.

Mr. BURMAN: I quite agree that follows. If he is proved to have been guilty of harsh and unconscionable conduct there is no reason why that should not be recorded on the certificate.

Lieut.-Colonel WATTS-MORGAN: It is agreed that it will be unfair for a moneylender to lose his licence for a retrospective action. I am asking that the 1900 Act shall be continued and that a moneylender shall not lose his licence under this Bill.

Mr. BURMAN: He must take the consequences.

Mr. J. BAKER: We are passing a new Bill; I hope it gets through and becomes law, but I do not wish it to be unfair. A moneylender did something years ago which he was quite entitled to do. We are now altering the law and saying that something he did some time ago is now wrong. The promoters of the Bill propose to punish him for doing a thing which was not wrong when it was done.

Mr. BURMAN: Oh, no.

Mr. BAKER: It was perfectly legal when it was done. I do not think this House should pass retrospective punishment in the form of new legislation. Hon. Members who sat on the Committee upstairs agreed that this provision is unfair although the majority of the Committee considered otherwise. I want to enter my protest against passing legislation which will have the effect of inflicting retrospective punishment upon men for acts which are declared by the Bill to be wrong but which were perfectly legal when they were done.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no love for the moneylender, but I can see that some injustice may be done by the Clause if it is passed in its present form. It would be extremely unfair to penalise a money-lender for something which occurred years ago, if that transaction is reopened after this Bill becomes law, and that he should have his licence endorsed with that particular offence. That is wrong. I think we should start from the time the Bill comes into operation and any offence which a moneylender permits after the passing of this Bill should be endorsed on his licence.

The LORD ADVOCATE: It is rather important to appreciate exactly the situation which arises. There is a transaction which, under Section 1 of the 1900 Act, may be brought into Court and may be characterised as harsh and unconscionable by the Court. It may be a transaction of 10 or 12 years ago, but it is perfectly open to the moneylender, who may have repented of his ways and does no longer trade on harsh and unconscionable lines, to himself reopen the transaction. There is no need for the matter to come into Court at all. It is only on his refusal to reopen the transaction, on his insisting on sticking to a harsh and unconscionable transaction, that the matter comes into Court at all. That seems to me to characterise and affect his present method of trading. It does directly affect his present methods of trading if it is brought into Court. If he has changed his methods it will not be harsh and unconscionable. That is the whole basis of the argument. If he insists on sticking to that harsh and unconscionable transaction, then it is a relevant factor to consider whether he is a man who should be allowed to get a certificate at the present time. For that reason the Bill is not unjust and is one which will carry out the object which everyone has in view.

Mr. HARNEY: The Lord Advocate, by reason of his clear statement, points the injustice of this Clause. What the Government have in view this. After this Act is passed, if a moneylender is brought into Court a Judge may say to him, "Long before this Act was passed you made a bargain which then you were allowed to make, though we now say it is harsh and unconscionable." It is a transaction which was made under the 1900 Act. The Act did not limit at all the amount of interest, and the transaction made under that Act was one, so far as he knew, in accordance with the law. Now the Judge is to be empowered to say, "Produce your certificate, and we will endorse on it that you were a bad boy, not since the Act told you to be a good boy, but years before." You now have an Act of Parliament which says a moneylender must have a certificate and that certificate shall be used to carry an endorsement as to how he conducted himself since he got that certificate. This Clause says you can put on the back of that certificate what you regard as misconduct, not since he got the certificate, but long before it. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I may be wrong, but here are the words—

[Mr. Harney.]

"Where a Court re-opens a transaction of a moneylender under the said Section 1 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900"— it is agreed that the Court can re-open in 1928 a transaction which took place 10 or 15 years ago—

"the Court may require the moneylender to produce any certificate granted to him in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

The moneylender is bound to produce the certificate granted under this Act. What can be put on the back of the certificate? The Judge—

"may cause such particulars as the Court thinks desirable to be endorsed on any such certificate," i.e., as arises out of the proceedings regarding a transaction which has been re-opened and which happened years ago.

Mr. G. JONES: For what was wrong under the 1900 Act?

Mr. HARNEY: That may be, but what I am pointing out is you are now laying down a new Clause. Henceforth, moneylenders shall have a certificate, and the fact of that certificate shall be a record of how they conducted themselves since they got their certificate. This Clause enables you to put on the back how they conducted themselves before it.

Miss LAWRENCE: I cannot help thinking that there is an extraordinary confusion of ideas in the minds of those who oppose the Clause. The persons who grant the certificate are bound to take evidence of good conduct and the endorsement of the Judge is part of the material for forming a judgment which is placed at the disposal of the licensing authority. All the evidence of competent witnesses is relevant, and, when you say it is retrospective, you might just as well claim that any species of bad conduct that a moneylender committed before in years past should not count when the licensing authority is considering whether he is a person of good conduct. What hon. Members are asking, logically, is that there should be a wiping out of every offence that a moneylender may have committed during his life, so that he may, from the moment this Act is passed, appear before any licensing authority in a perfectly clean sheet. I desire to say, speaking generally, that the difficulty of all licensing authorities is always that of obtaining sufficient and reliable evidence, and that there are many cases where there is such a divorce between the Court and the licensing authorities that very important and reliable evidence is not obtainable. For instance, there are the provisions of the Act for the protection of infants, where one authority is charged with the oversight of such infants and the coroner is charged with holding a special inquiry in case the child dies, but where there is no obligatory communication of any kind between the Court and the registrar. I say that is wrong in itself. These licensing authorities ought to be in possession of the fullest possible information. The endorsement of the Judge on the certificate is not in the nature of a judgment, but of information which can be taken into due consideration when the question of character comes up. If you admit testimony as to a man's personal character during a long and blameless life before the licensing authority, equally it is right to admit evidence with regard to any misdemeanours. I hope, therefore, that the House will dismiss this proposal.

Mr. THURLE: The hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) said that this Clause was punishing the moneylenders for some offence committed before this Act comes into force. I submit that what it is intended to punish him for is not offences committed after the Act, but for having failed to make restitution for them. At any time after he committed an offence it would have been open to him to have said, "This bargain was harsh and unconscionable, and I have no wish to stand by it." If after the Act comes into force, he still stands by that bad act and bargain, it is in effect repeating the crime, and to that extent I think we are perfectly entitled to punish him. If I may put it very briefly, in scriptural language, we may say to the moneylender in such a case that if he will repent he shall be saved, but if he fails to repent we are entitled to damn him on his certificate.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the 'Clause,'" put, and agreed to.

CLAUSE 13.—(Special provisions as to Pawnbroker's Loans.)

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I beg to move to leave out the Clause.

I will be very brief in moving the deletion of this Clause. In the first place, those of us who have taken an interest in this Measure fail to understand why Clause 13 was inserted at all. The first point I want to make is that the Clause in fact does not belong to the Bill and has no connection with it, as the Bill would be complete without it. I think the hon. Gentlemen who are responsible for the Measure have succumbed to some pressure in connection with this Clause, though we have failed to find where it came from. Having said the Clause does not belong to the Bill, I ask what does the Clause do? We object to this Clause because it provides for the pawnbroker what it fails to provide for the moneylender, and in that connection it is grossly unfair. I would like to remind the Committee of what the pawnbroker can secure when he lends money. First of all he can secure 20 per cent. interest and make a charge for the preparation of the documents relating to the loan, not exceeding the sum of 1s. for every £10 lent. More than that, he can also get a charge equal to the actual amount of the Stamp Duty paid by him upon any such document. There are three things, but it does not stop there, for see what else he gets. As a matter of fact, if it went very much further, I do not think there would be anything of the loan left, but it provides that the pawnbroker shall not be deemed to have failed to comply with the foregoing conditions by reason of his having, in good faith and in accordance with the terms of the contract for the loan, made a reasonable charge for the storage or the care of any pledge. Again, towards the end of the Clause it appears to me there is another provision for him to make a further charge, so that it seems a pawnbroker can make five, if not six, charges from the person who borrows money from him. That is not the case with an ordinary moneylender, and for the two main reasons which I have given I move that the Clause be deleted, because it does not belong to the Bill, which would be complete without it, and because it allows a pawnbroker to make several charges which the moneylender is not allowed to make.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to Second the Amendment.

I and those associated with me in this Amendment would like to know the reason why this Clause was introduced at all, and why there is this difference in the treatment meted out to the moneylender in the ordinary course of business and to the pawnbroker. As my hon. Friend has pointed out, the pawnbroker is allowed under this Clause to make five different charges on the person who pledges something with him and receives a loan from him. A question that was much debated in Committee was that we should not allow any loophole for the moneylender to get any additional charges beyond what was regarded as reasonable interest, and that we should prevent any interest being charged which was harsh and unconscionable. Now here in the first sub-section of this Clause the pawnbroker is entitled to charge 20 per cent. per annum in respect of the loan or on the pledge. In most cases, as the pawnbrokers themselves will agree, they do not give any more than two-thirds of the value of the pledge as a loan. The next thing they are entitled to charge is 1s. for every £10 lent, and also, where documents are prepared, the value of the stamp put on the document. I cannot see what extra work is involved on the part of a pawnbroker to make out a document for £10 or £20. In addition to these two items, he is entitled to make a reasonable charge for the storage or care of any pledge. What is "a reasonable charge"? What would be reasonable to the pawnbroker, might not be reasonable to the pawner. In this case the pawnbroker is taking the place of the moneylender whom you have dealt with rather harshly, but whether or not you are dealing harshly with him, he is called upon under this Bill as it stands to pay any charges arising out of a mortgage or a bill of sale.

[Mr. Dennison.]

This Clause was introduced on the last day of the Committee's sittings and we had no opportunity of considering it. If it is allowed to stand, I intend to move the Amendment standing in my name later on with the object of improving its wording with regard to what

3.0 p.m. is a reasonable charge. When we come to Sub-section (2) of this Clause we find that not only is the pawnbroker entitled to make all these charges which have been mentioned, but he is entitled to deduct from the amount he has loaned to the pawner all these charges upon which he is equally entitled to charge interest, because they are to be regarded as part of the principal. I do not think it was ever the intention that that should be so. I think the law should be altered in the interest of the community generally, because, when you are dealing with pawnbrokers and pawners, you are dealing with the poorest section of the community. The pawnbroker has been, and I think is to-day regarded in many cases, as the poor man's banker, but there are many cases also where the pawnbroker is as unscrupulous as the moneylender. I hope, when the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Womersley) gets up, he will throw some light on the reasons why this Clause has been introduced. The moneylender had no one to speak for him in this House. At any rate, they have no direct representatives here as Members of Parliament. We should like to have some enlightenment regarding this Clause, so that we may either withdraw these Amendments or press the Amendment for the deletion of this Clause to a division.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: The hon. Member for King's Norton (Mr. Dennison) referred to the fact that moneylenders had no direct representation in this House, and, if he means by that that the pawnbrokers have appointed anybody to represent them in this House, he is greatly mistaken. I hope he did not mean that.

Mr. DENNISON: Oh, no.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I am very glad to hear that, because I think it would be a reflection on some hon. Members of this House. The question was asked why there should be any exception made with regard to pawnbrokers from the general provisions of this Bill. I will state the reasons why as briefly as possible. In the first place, pawnbrokers have been restricted under the Pawnbrokers Act of 1872 as to the amount they can charge for interest and the tickets and other things, on loans up to the amount of £10. The Act of 1872 was passed to deal with amounts up to £10. Beyond that the pawnbroker, like every other person, is simply subject to the common law of the land; he can lend money on any terms he likes, he can charge what he likes, and do exactly as he likes, provided the borrower is prepared to agree. When the Moneylenders Act was passed in 1900 it was not intended that pawnbrokers should be included in it at all, but in the Courts it was laid down that pawnbrokers were included in it, and as the fee charged for registration was a guinea and the registration period was three years, the pawnbrokers did not regard it as worth their while to fight the matter in the Courts, simply because of their having to pay that small fee; and the other payments under the Moneylenders Act of 1900 were no hardship at all to the pawnbrokers as they were already conducting their business on the lines laid down by that Act.

I suggest that the reason why the pawnbrokers are entitled to this Clause, is that they are prepared to allow their interest to be restricted to 20 per cent. If the moneylenders were prepared to come forward and say the same thing, I should say "Give them any other little advantages you can." But they will do nothing of the kind; they know that 20 per cent. is not sufficient for their particular purpose, and they want a much higher rate of interest. The question has been raised as to security. It has been pointed out that a pawnbroker can afford to lend at 20 per cent. because he gets security. Because the Pawnbrokers Act did not apply to amounts over £10 a great majority of the moneylenders of this country are to-day acting as pawnbrokers for sums over £10. They are demanding security. I know they say in their circulars "We will send you back notes on return," and so on, but my experience is that a big majority of them are asking for security. They are entitled to do so in the same way as the pawnbroker under the present Acts of Parliament. Many of these men have actually got large warehouses in our large towns, where they store goods that they take in as pawnbrokers, simply because the Act cannot affect them if the transaction is over £10. So they are getting security and charging a much higher rate of interest than 20 per cent. A question was raised as to why they should be able to charge for documents. This provision is simply copied from the Pawnbrokers Act. A further question was asked about charging the Stamp Duty. This Duty goes to the Government and not to the pawnbroker. There was a further question as to the charge for storage.

Mr. DENNISON: I am not objecting to the charging, but I am objecting to the Clause permitting what is described merely as a "reasonable charge."

Mr. WOMERSLEY: The hon. Member has an Amendment to deal with that point, and if it is called I assume we can discuss it. I would ask Mr. Speaker to tell us whether it would be in Order to discuss that question of a reasonable charge on this Amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be in Order because the present Amendment is to leave out the whole Clause.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: Let me return to the question of storage. It is laid down clearly in the regulations here that no charge can be made for an article that is capable of being sent through the Post Office, but a charge is allowable for very bulky articles. What are the articles that are usually deposited with the pawnbroker by the lender for a loan over £10? In many cases the article is a piano which has to be stored in a building where it will not deteriorate. It must be kept in a building properly constructed for the purpose, and properly heated, and a certain amount of expenditure is incurred in providing that storage. This Clause will allow a reasonable charge in that respect, according to the class of the article, and I submit that is a fair proposal considering the fact that the pawnbroker is only going to charge 20 per cent. There is another feature about these pawnbroking transactions which is possibly unknown to many hon. Members. The Pawnbrokers Act lays it down clearly that any article pledged for an amount over £2 cannot be sold at the expiration of the term of the contract except by public auction and that any surplus accruing over and above the amount lent and the interest on it, shall be handed over to the pledger on application.

The point raised by the hon. Member for King's Norton that the pawnbroker only lends two-thirds of the value and is bound to gain every time cannot be maintained under the law as it stands. They are restricted to receiving the amount of the loan and the interest, and, as I have shown, any surplus accruing from the sale of the article must be handed over to those who have pledged the article. I submit this Clause is a reasonable one and is fair to a body of traders who have proved themselves to be men of the highest integrity and have carried on their business for the benefit of the community. In some parts of the country attempts have been made to restrict and in some cases to do without this type of trader, but those attempts have proved dismal failures. As the hon. Member for King's Norton said, the pawnbroker is the poor man's banker, and members of that body conduct their business on strictly legal lines. This Clause was accepted by the promoters of the Bill, after consultation with the authorities of the Home Office, and it should be allowed to remain in the Bill.

Mr. BURMAN: It has been suggested by the hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Rhys Davies) that we have been unduly favourable to the pawnbrokers in framing this Clause. I may point out that this Clause was introduced by Lord Haldane in another place in 1925 and the present promoters are not responsible for it. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Womersley) has dealt very fully with this matter, and he is always very capable when he comes to speak of pawnbrokers. He has fully explained the position to the House and I do not wish to take up further time. There are subsequent suggestions for the slight modification of some of the provisions which are thought to be a little too favourable to the pawnbrokers, and we are quite willing to accept certain of these, if the Opposition will allow us to have this Clause as it stands.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: In view of the explanation given by the hon. Member, I feel inclined to withdraw my opposition to the Clause. On the understanding that the hon. Member will accept three, at any rate, of the ensuing Amendments, I am prepared to withdraw this Amendment.

[Mr. Rhys Davies.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to move, in page 14, line 30, after the word "pawner" to insert the words "within seven days."

The object of this Amendment is to bring this provision into conformity with the rest of the Bill. The words "within seven days" are precisely the words which appear in relation to moneylenders in this connection.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: This is a very reasonable Amendment, and I accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DENNISON: May I move the Amendment standing on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for East Rhondda (Lieut.-Colonel Watts-Morgan)—in page 14, line 30, after the word "memorandum" to insert the words, "signed personally by every party to be charged?"

Mr. SPEAKER: I was not proposing to select that Amendment.

Mr. DENNISON: My name ought to have been attached to it, because I regard it as important.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think I can allow that Amendment.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to move, in page 15, line 3, to leave out the words "for every ten pounds lent."

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: This also is a very fair Amendment, with which the promoters can agree.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to move, in page 15, line 11, to leave out the word "reasonable."

This Amendment, in conjunction with the one on the Paper immediately following—in line 11, after the word "charge," to insert the words, "not exceeding the amount expended by him"—is to make it quite clear what the pawnbroker is entitled to charge the pawner. As has already been stated by the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Womersley), the pawnbrokers are a highly respectable section of the community, and in my younger days, I remember, I used to earn pocket money by going to and from the pawnbroker's shop. If these amendments are agreed to it will be quite clear that a pawnbroker is not entitled to charge anything more than the actual amount expended by him.

Mr. J. BAKER: I beg to second the Amendment.

Commodore KING: This Amendment and the next really need to be read together. It will be realised that it is rather difficult to ascertain the amount expended by a pawnbroker in storing articles on his own premises. Take the case of an article that is frequently pawned, namely, a piano. It would be difficult to say what expense had been incurred by a pawnbroker in storing such an article on his own premises, and the word "reasonable" that is in the Clause would meet such a difficulty. The word "reasonable" is a term well known to the courts, and I am sure that in actual practice there would be no difficulty whatever in ascertaining what amount was reasonable for a pawnbroker to charge for such storage. I, therefore, hope the hon. Member will agree to the wording of the Clause as it stands.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: It has been rightly pointed out that there would be a great difficulty in deciding what the amount actually expended by the pawnbroker had been in certain cases. Take the case of a piano stored in a room properly prepared for storing such articles. It may be that a pawnbroker has only two pianos in pledge in a building costing him 10s. a week rent, and I take it that, if the Amendment were agreed to, that pawnbroker would be entitled to divide the 10s. a week rent between the two owners of the pianos and charge them 5s. each. The pawnbroker is going to be in a much worse position than in the Clause as at present. I think to leave in the word "reasonable" is a fair thing. It may be argued that there may be pawnbrokers like other traders, who are not reasonable, but it is for the Court to decide, and there is laid down in this Bill something which has never been laid down before, that a transaction can be reopened. Therefore, if the pawnbroker is so foolish as to charge an unreasonable amount, he lays himself open to the transaction being reopened by the Court, and possibly lose far more than he would otherwise gain.

Mr. J. BAKER rose—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DENNISON: I beg to move, in page 15, line 22, to leave out the words "five shillings," and to insert instead thereof the words "one shilling."

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I beg to second the Amendment.

Mr. BURMAN: I think this is a very reasonable Amendment, and, on behalf of the promoters, I should be very glad to see it accepted by the House.

Mr. WOMERSLEY: I had hoped that the promoters would have been prepared to accept a figure something less than 5s. and something more than 1s. as a compromise. This is a point where the difference comes in between the pawnbroker and the moneylender. In addition to other expenses, the pawnbroker has to keep a specially prepared book, and a rather costly one, in which entries have to be made. He has to make a search on behalf of the customer in the sale book of the auctioneer, who must sign the book to certify that the price has been secured. The pawnbroker will have to go to all that trouble, employ a man, and so on, and I submit that he ought to be entitled to a fee of 2s. 6d.

Amendment agreed to.

CLAUSE 14.—(Interpretation, etc.)

Commodore KING: I beg to move, in page 16, line 22, after the word "contract," to insert the words

"(other than simple interest charged in accordance with the proviso to section six of this Act)."

Hon. Members will realise that this Amendment is complementary to and partially consequential on the Amendment moved on Clause 6 which the House has already accepted. It would be quite unfair to include simple interest on overdue amounts in the total amount in calculating the rate of interest for purposes of this Act.

Amendment agreed to.

CLAUSE 16.—(Application to Scotland.)

The LORD ADVOCATE: I beg to move, in page 17, to leave out the words from the first word "to," in line 7 to the word "and," in line 11.

This is purely a drafting Amendment. In consequence of an alteration made in Committee, any reference to Section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, has disappeared from the Bill, and therefore it is necessary to take out these words.

Amendment agreed to.

The LORD ADVOCATE: I beg to move, in page 17, line 12, to leave out the words "that Act," and to insert instead thereof the words "the said Act of 1913."

This is also a drafting Amendment, to make it clear that the reference is to the Bankruptcy Act of 1913.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WELLS: I beg to move, "That the Bill be now read the Third time."

This and similar Bills have been before Parliament for some time, and this subject has received very full consideration. The question has been considered by a Select Committee, and Bills on the subject have on more than one occasion passed through all stages in the other House. I do not think any hon. Member can say this Bill has been hurried, or that it is vindictive, nor do I think anyone can call it grandmotherly. The main features of the Bill divide themselves into three. One is the granting of certificates to moneylenders and the licensing of moneylenders. The second is the prohibition of circulars. The third is, if I may put it in this way, the limitation of interest. It may be thought that a Bill on those lines might have been a very much simpler one, but on going into the matter we found that we had to accept advice from different departments, and the Bill is much more complete than it was expected it would have to be. The Bill will place some limitations on the business of moneylending, and it gives far more consideration to the borrower than the borrower has ever had before. It is said that a fool and his money are soon parted. Some people think that borrowing is wrong in any circumstances, but we cannot change human nature and we do not seek to do so. This Bill is not nearly so stringent as the Pawnbrokers Bill of 1872, but, in spite of that Bill, in which everything was laid down by rules and regulations, that business has flourished, and pawnbrokers to-day have a very high reputation. We hope that this Bill will follow on similar lines. We do not attempt to prevent the borrowing or lending of money; we cannot restrain the foolish and the ignorant; but we do say that, if a man is going to borrow money, he should know what the conditions of his borrowing are going to be, and, knowing them, if he likes to go on with the transaction it is open to him to do so. To my mind this Bill is a comprehensive Measure of social reform, and it is an honest attempt to relieve what has been a public scandal. I would like to offer the thanks of the promoters of the Bill to all those Members of the Opposition and other Members of the House who have helped us through with it, and we all hope that it will very soon become the law of the land.

[Mr. Wells.]

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: I beg to second the Motion.

I desire to support the Third Reading, as I have supported the Bill through all its stages. I think that the hon. Gentlemen who are responsible for the Measure are to be congratulated on their courage, for it required a great deal of courage, not only to bring such a Measure before the House, but to pilot it through all its stages. I agree that some Measure for dealing with this problem is very necessary. Without wearying the House with details of harrowing cases, I should like to mention one which hon. Members will have seen in the Press quite recently, and which I think is a classic example of what is transpiring from day to day in the Courts of the land. It is a case in which a woman who had borrowed £3 had paid 5s. a week as interest on the £3 for 52 weeks, and still she owed the £3. If one case of that kind can come into Court, what number of cases must there be that never emerge into the light of day? I will give just one other reason why I support this Bill. I have made no secret of the fact that I wanted a very much stronger Measure than this, and I am hoping that this is only a beginning in the tightening up of legislation in connection with the lending of money.

I am far from satisfied with the Bill as it stands, and, as I have said, I wanted a very much more stringent Measure to deal with the problem. For instance, I do not think we ought to allow a rate of interest of even 48 per cent. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that that rate of interest will be allowed under this Bill. Some hon. Members wanted to make it 60 per cent., but, surely, 48 per cent. is a very high rate of interest on a loan, and, even now, the moneylender need not confine himself to 48 per cent. If he can prove that even 100 per cent. is not harsh and unconscionable, he can call for 100 per cent. on the money that he lends. In any case, however, the figure in the Bill is a guide to the Judges in the Courts as to what they may regard as a fair and reasonable rate of interest. I must—just between brackets as it were—say that I was very sorry that the Home Secretary never helped us in our deliberations. He just did one thing, and I think that this ought to be recorded in the annals of the House. He did come into the Committee on one day to make up a quorum, and I thought that that was really a very undignified thing for the Home Secretary to do.

Sir WILLIAM JOYNSON-HICKS: I am very sorry to have to correct my hon. Friend, who is usually so accurate. It was not in the case of the Moneylenders Bill that I came in to make up a quorum. It was in the case of another Bill dealing with seditious teaching, when I found the hon. Gentleman and his friends hiding in the Lobbies so as not to form a quorum. I then went in to form a quorum, and then the hon. Member and his colleagues trooped in and took part in the discussion.

Mr. DAVIES: Whatever error I may have committed, I have succeeded in my object, which was to get the Home Secretary on to his feet at all, because he has been very silent on this Bill—too silent for my purpose. He is very eloquent outside the House of Commons and I think we are entitled to have some of that eloquence even on a Bill of this kind. The House has made it clear at any rate that we shall not be troubled, once this Bill becomes an Act, with these circulars any more. That in my view is a very important point indeed, because it was an incentive to some persons to secure money when in fact they should never have borrowed at all, and from that point of view I think this will be a very useful Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney), who has taken a very great interest in it, would argue that the moneylending business fell into the ordinary category of commercial transactions. I want to dispute that, and I am very pleased to have the backers of the Measure on my side on that score. I have never regarded money lending as in the same category as selling ordinary commodities. It falls into an entirely different category, and if I had my way the moneylender would not be allowed even to put an advertisement in a newspaper or on a placard. I should put it in the same category as the legal and medical professions. They do not advertise their wares. You never see an advertisement by an hon. and learned Member of this House that he is willing to give you advice at 6s. 8d. a time, and in any case you would not get it at 6s. 8d. even if he advertised it. There have been differences on small details in all Parties but I feel sure that every Member of the House wanted to do something to deal with the evil that arises from moneylending on the scale on which it has been carried on in the past and I want, for what it is worth, to give my blessing to the Bill and I trust it will pass through the other House without any Amendment whatsoever.

Sir HENRY CAUTLEY: I think this is an excellent Bill. My only regret is that the Home Office, either by mistake or by obstinacy, have lessened its efficiency by some 25 per cent. by not accepting an Amendment on Clause 5. Anyone who has practised in the Law Courts and seen the working of moneylenders tactics and the way their business is conducted will know that one of the greatest abuses is the principle they adopt of preventing the borrower knowing the terms of his contract until they have got him bound.

This Amendment would have taken a very powerful step by requiring a copy of the contract to be given him at the time he signed it, so that he should know the terms on which he was borrowing. The Clause provides that he shall have the terms of the contract sent to him seven days after he signs it. What is the good of that? I will not go further into it. I was not able to be here at the time the Amendment was called, but five out of the six names down to it are lawyers who were on the Committee. I would ask the Home Secretary—I did not see much of him in the Committee—to consider this point very carefully and see whether he cannot, in the interest of 25 per cent. of efficiency for this Bill, alter this in another place. From my experience in the Law Courts years ago when I did this sort of work, I can assure him that it is really of vital importance to increase the efficiency of the Bill in this particular and I would ask the Home Office particularly to consider it.

Mr. CRAWFORD: Personally, I think that this Measure is one of the most useful things that Parliament has done. I have been hoping year after year that some measure of this sort would find its way to the Statute Book. Therefore, so far as we on these benches are concerned, like Members below the Gangway, we give our blessing to the Bill, for what it is worth, and offer our congratulations to the promoters for carrying it through. That is quite sincere. I would like to support what has been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Grinstead (Sir H. Cautley). I do not suppose there are many Members of this House who have not from time to time had brought to their notice the consequences of the action of the moneylenders. I know of one case, and so far as I know the conditions are still existing, of a man occupying a responsible position, not in a Government office, but a responsible position in a local authority, who has been, I believe, for nearly 10 years now, living a terrible life, scarcely ever being able to sleep at night. Everything he had has been pledged to pay back a loan borrowed from a moneylender, and, from first to last, he has not really known what are his liabilities. From the beginning he did not know what he was entering into, and for 10 years he has been suffering this kind of life. Two years ago, when he approached me, I begged him to allow the matter to go to Court, and I said that I would get responsible Members of this House to go to the authority concerned in order to see that no bad consequences followed through the publicity of his affairs. So great was his fear of what might happen to him with regard to his employment and his family that he refused to allow me to take any steps whatever, and he is still in that condition. That man for nearly 10 years, from first to last, has never known what the total sum of his liabilities were. I do not know whether there are legal or technical difficulties in the way, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will see whether some such provision as the hon. and learned Member has suggested cannot be inserted in another place.

[Mr. Crawford.]

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: It is very unusual, as it is very pleasant, for me to hear that the Home Secretary's speeches are so popular that it is desired that I should speak this afternoon. This is all the more so when this is said by my political opponents. I should like to say one word with regard to the appeal made to me by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Grinstead (Sir H. Cautley). I wonder if he realises why I was not able to attend this Committee. My hon. and learned Friend kept me at another Committee by his persistent and very relevant criticism of a particular Bill of which I was in charge. It is not even possible for a Secretary of State to attend two Committees at the same time. I wish I could. I think the House ought to realise that the Amendment stating that a copy of the contract should be forwarded to the borrower within seven days was part and parcel of a second Amendment inserted in Sub-section (3) of Clause 5. That Amendment inserted in Committee provides that before the actual signature of the borrower is affixed to a document the moneylender has to deliver to the borrower a statement in writing signed by the moneylender saying that the rate per cent. per annum represented by the interest charged calculated according to the provisions of the first Schedule of the Act.

Sir H. CAUTLEY: I did not want to go into the details of the point. That only refers to Sub-section (3) of Clause 5 where the rate of interest is not stated. It does not apply to the whole of the contract. I only ask the right hon Gentleman to reconsider that.

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: That was part and parcel of the kind of compromise arrived at in regard to the matter. I admit that there is something to be said for the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Harney) and, as some responsibility in the matter rests upon the Home Secretary, I will consider that point between now and the time when the Bill is dealt with in another place.

Mr. CRAWFURD: It is not only a question of the rate of interest. It is a question also that the borrower shall have clearly in black and white before him what will happen if at any time he should be in default.

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: Under the provisions of the Bill, he knows that within seven days. It may be possible to shorten that period of seven days. I will consider the point. I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the details of the Bill, because they have been sufficiently discussed by the hon. Member for Westhoughton (Mr. Rhys Davies) and other hon. Members opposite to prevent the second Bill on the Paper—Seditious and Blasphemous Teaching to Children Bill—being reached this afternoon. That is probably the reason for the great interest that has been displayed in the details of this Bill. I congratulate the hon. Member and his friends opposite on the success of their manoeuvre.

I should like to congratulate all those who have been concerned in the passing of this Bill. It is a Bill which has been required for a great many years. It is a Bill which has been demanded by many anxious fathers whose sons have got into difficulties through moneylenders. It is a Bill which has been demanded by the conscience of the people of this country, and has been promoted by hon. Members in this House, and the two Noble Lords in the other House, Lord Carson and Lord Darling, who are to be congratulated on the interest which they have taken and the efforts which they have made to get the Bill through. The question was made the subject of a Bill in 1925 and of another Bill in 1926. Subsequently, it was considered by a Committee of this House presided over, I think, by the hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon (Major Glyn), or, at all events, he took a great interest in it. It has come forward this year as a private Member's Bill, piloted by the hon. Member for Duddeston (Mr. Burman). It passed through Committee after a very full investigation, and I think one may safely say that, as it leaves this House, coupled with the Acts of 1900 and 1911, it forms a very real charter of useful legislation which will effect very great improvements in the law relating to moneylenders, and will prevent many of those abuses which have obtained in the past.

I wish to pay a personal tribute of gratitude to my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Paddington (Commodore King) for the part which he has played. This has been an exceedingly busy Session for the Home Office. We have had a great number of private Member's Bills, all of which seem to impinge upon the duties of the Home Office. I wish some of my hon. Friends would bring in a Bill relating to foreign affairs, and then I should not have to attend to it. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs might have to do a little Committee work in that respect. Hon. Members' Bills seem mostly to touch the Home Office. It was impossible for my colleague, the Under-Secretary, or for myself to attend the Committee on this Bill, and my hon. and gallant Friend very kindly undertook the duties of piloting the Bill through Committee, in conjunction with the hon. Members in charge of the Bill. I want to pay him my personal tribute of gratitude for the efforts he has made, the successful work he has put in, and I also wish to congratulate the hon. Member for Duddeston upon the success which has attended his efforts.

Mr. J. BAKER: I, too, wish to congratulate the promoters of the Bill upon their success and their persistence, because I believe they have done a public service. I was a very active member of the Committee, and had a good deal to say in opposition to some of the proposals in the Bill; so much so that other hon. Members were inclined to think that there were ulterior motives. Now that we have reached the congratulatory stage, I am sorry to have heard the Home Secretary say that we have taken a keen interest in the details of this Bill to-day for some purpose other than that of trying to straighten out the Bill. I assured the Committee, and I assure this House, that I was not influenced by anybody either inside or outside this House. I criticised my own Leader on more than one occasion. I opposed the arguments he put forward because I did not agree with his illustrations and his conclusions. I said from the first that a Bill of this sort was required in order to deal with what has become a public danger. I prefer this Bill to no Bill at all, although I should like to have seen the present Measure deal with some of the cases we put forward. All sorts of motives were imputed to those who served on the Committee upstairs, but I have never served on a Committee which was more like a Committee. No one could forecast, before a Division, which way any particular group of people would vote, and the hon. and gallant Member who was in charge of the Measure must have felt dismayed at times by the number of his own supporters who voted against the proposals he brought forward.

The promoters of the Measure also accepted Amendments which they did not like and, speaking on behalf of my colleagues, we appreciate that consideration. It is true that discussions became rather heated at times and things were said on both sides which it would have been better to have left unsaid, but when we got outside the Committee Room we realised that we had said things which we should not have said. The Committee did its work well, notwithstanding the fact that there were five legal gentlemen on it. We certainly needed help at times. After we had heard the lawyers arguing the proposals of the Bill one wondered what was the real interpretation and effect, and we should have been glad if someone had told us in plain English what it was so that we could understand it. The promoters of the Bill, and the hon. and gallant Member in charge of it, did admit on occasion that it was time they consulted some other person, and at those times we should have been pleased to have had the presence of the Home Secretary or the Solicitor-General. Not that they would have been right in their interpretation because we should have stuck to our own point of view, but we should have accepted them as an authority. I am pleased to have been able to serve on the Committee. It required a little courage. If you expressed your own opinions it was easy to incur suspicion, because there are many stories going round the House as to what happened on similar occasions in times past. I think the promoters of the Bill have done good service in bringing it forward, and those who have criticised it have done so believing that they were doing a good service.

[Mr. J. Baker.]

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

SEDITIONOUS AND BLASPHEMOUS TEACHING TO CHILDREN BILL.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

CLAUSE 1.—(Offences.)

Mr. SCURR: I beg to move, in line 8, to leave out the words "or blasphemous."

The Bill after passing the Committee upstairs returned in somewhat different form from that in which it was given a Second Reading by this House and two very important Clauses which gave a definition of seditious and blasphemous matter have been struck out. After all, the Bill is one which deals with any person who teaches seditious or blasphemous matter. There may be an argument advanced for dealing with questions affecting the attitude of persons towards the laws and the Government and the State, and their expressions of opinion may be regarded as seditious and therefore liable to come under those laws. But when it comes to a question of what is blasphemous matter, I find myself absolutely in a quandary as to what exactly we are going to deal with in such a definition. After all, blasphemous matter varies according to the particular theological or religious opinion that a person may hold.

As I remarked upstairs in the course of a Debate in Committee, there has been circulated to Members of the House a letter from a gentleman who is the pastor of a particular chapel and who is objecting very much to a certain action which is proposed to be taken regarding the administration of a trust in regard to his chapel, and he goes on to say that if this Measure, to which he objects, passes, it would mean that the chapel belonging to his particular organisation would be given over to what he describes as the idolatrous and blasphemous teachings of members of the Church of Rome. I have no doubt that that gentleman is perfectly sincere in his opinions, but, on the other hand, those who hold to the Catholic faith would also regard that gentleman as expressing blasphemous opinions. After all, if I happened to be in one end of Belfast, for example, and made an observation regarding His Holiness the Pope, I should be regarded as expressing blasphemy, but, on the other hand, if I expressed certain opinions concerning King William III, of pious memory, at the other end, I should be equally guilty of blasphemous expressions and I should probably produce a riot in that most respectable city of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I do not think that proposals in this Bill ought to encourage anything of that kind.

There has been going on now for a considerable number of years a very large amount of what is termed "Biblical criticisms," which is the result of investigations that have been made and the discoveries of various books and papyri and documents of the past, and this is causing very many different points of view to be taken in regard to certain theological conceptions of the Christian faith. Even a distinguished Bishop of the Church of England itself has actually cast doubts upon the reality of the Virgin Birth, which is, after all, one of the most sacred doctrines of the Christian religion. Is that blasphemy or is it not? If a teacher under this Bill, speaking to a class of children under the age of 16, ventures to put before them some of the discoveries which have been made in regard to Biblical criticism, is he guilty of teaching blasphemous matter? I contend that under the terms of this Bill he would, and I am merely giving an instance where, no matter what one may say or do, with regard to what is termed blasphemy, he can be brought under the terms of this Bill—

It being Four of the O'clock the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next (4th July).

SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee.

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House, without Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3.

Adjourned at One Minute after Four o'Clock until Monday next (4th July).

CORRECTION.

In the Daily Part of Thursday, 30th June, in the report of Mr. A. V. Alexander's speech in column 725, in line 30, the word "salaries" should read "position," and in line 31 the word "take" should read "pay." In line 43, the sentence beginning "In regard to the inquiry," should read:

"With regard to the request for an inquiry, the matter, of course, has already been fully examined, and the Report of the Buxton Committee of 1905 and the Royal Commission of 1919 are largely agreed in principle. The Buxton Committee stated that the private traders had failed to make out any case for a change"

In column 726, in Mr. Alexander's interpolation, the sentence beginning "The profit is taxable profit," should read:

"The question as to whether a profit is a taxable profit does not depend upon the use to which it is put, but upon its source, and the manner in which it is made. The whole of the surplus, whether distributed in discounts or placed to reserve, is the result of the mutual trading of the members."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 4th July, 1927.

[OFFICIAL REPORT.]

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Westgate and Birchington Water Bill,
Lords Amendments considered, and agreed to.

St. Catharine's College, Cambridge
(Canonship of Norwich) Bill [Lords],

Read the Third time, and passed, without Amendment.

Abersoch Water Bill [Lords],
Bedford Corporation Bill [Lords],
Coventry Corporation (Boundary Extension) Bill [Lords],

Hospital of St. Mary the Virgin (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) Bill [Lords],

Salford Corporation Bill [Lords],
Sunderland Corporation Bill [Lords],

Read a Second time, and committed.

Gravesend, Rosherville, and Northfleet
Tramways (Amendment) Provisional
Order Bill,

Read the Third time, and passed.

POOR LAW RELIEF.

Return ordered,

"showing the number of persons in receipt of Poor Law relief in England and Wales on the night of the 1st day of January, 1927 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 134, of Session 1926)."—[Sir Kingsley Wood.]

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

INDIA.

RHONI TEA ESTATE (DISTURBANCE).

3. Mr. KELLY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can give any particulars of the disturbances at the Rhoni tea estate, near Kurseong, in May?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Earl Winterton): My Noble Friend has received a report that on the 11th May about 600 out of a total of about 4,500 labourers employed at the Rhoni Tea Garden, near Kurseong, Darjeeling, struck work owing to the new manager of the garden endeavouring to enforce longer hours and to cut down the men's wages for bad work. The strike ended on the 15th May on the intervention of the Sub-Divisional Officer and the Additional Superintendent of Police, Kurseong, at whose instance a compromise was effected and the men's demands in the main conceded.

Mr. KELLY: Is there any report as to whether anyone was injured in these disturbances?

Earl WINTERTON: As far as I know, no one was injured, but, even if there had been, I do not think it would be reported to us; it is purely a matter for the local authority. These were certainly not serious disturbances.

DETENUS, BENGAL.

4. Mr. KELLY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that Mr. Subodh Kumar Lahiri, a State prisoner who was interned at Sirajganji, was released unconditionally on 27th May on the grounds of ill-health; and whether it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to keep these prisoners interned without trial unless their health gives way?

Earl WINTERTON: My information is that the detenu in question was released, on conditions, on the 23rd May from the restrictions under the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act which had required him to remain in his own home. I am not aware of the ground on which the restrictions were removed; but the second part of the question is not a correct statement of the policy in this matter which I have frequently explained.

Mr. KELLY: Will the Noble Lord give consideration to the case of these men and see if it is possible to release them before their health reaches the point of breaking down?

Earl WINTERTON: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that I have dealt with this case on three occasions in Debate, and I must respectfully ask him to put down any further questions, if he wishes to continue the Debate on the subject.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Can the Noble Lord say whether the question of a general release of these prisoners is under consideration?

Earl WINTERTON: I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the speech which I made on the Estimates when the subject was last before us.

ALL-INDIA CENTRAL KHILAFAT COMMITTEE.

5. Mr. KELLY asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether any steps are being taken with regard to the resolution of the All-India Central Khilafat Committee sent to the Viceroy, and urging the Government without delay to cause a thorough inquiry to be made by a representative commission of impartial officials and non-officials into the root cause of frequent communal upheavals in every province, and to introduce the necessary legislative measures in the September Session of the Legislative Assembly with a view to eradicating any future chances for riots?

Earl WINTERTON: I have no information as to any such resolution.

BENGAL PILOT SERVICE.

2. Mr. LEE (for Mr. W. BAKER) asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he has received a resolution from the Indian Chamber of Commerce in connection with the Bengal pilot service, submitting that Indians cannot reasonably be expected to seek admission to the Bengal pilot service on equal terms with Europeans when the facilities and opportunities for gaining the required qualifications are being deliberately held back from the Indians, so as to create a permanent bar to their admission to the Bengal pilot service and to a sea career generally; and whether any steps are being taken to meet this protest?

Earl WINTERTON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. The second part does not, therefore, arise, but I may mention that the Government of India propose to open a training ship at Karachi in September.

CALCUTTA "FORWARD" (BURMA).

6. Mr. CECIL WILSON (for Mr. WALLHEAD) asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the prohibition of the introduction of the Calcutta daily newspaper "Forward" into Burma; whether any intimation of the Government's intention in this respect was given to those responsible for the production of the paper before the imposition of the ban; and whether he will make a statement as to the reasons for this action?

Earl WINTERTON: I have seen only Press notices, which suggest that after a warning the paper may have been excluded from Burma. My Noble Friend is expecting further information.

Mr. WARDLAW-MILNE: Can the Noble Lord give the House any indication as to the nature of the warning?

Earl WINTERTON: I think it was based on an article of a very offensive and inaccurate character, charging the Government of hon. Members opposite and His Majesty's Government with having fomented disturbances in China, and containing a very aggressive attack on the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Is the Noble Lord aware that the article complained of suggested that the military concentration was to take place in Burma instead of as at present?

Earl WINTERTON: Yes, inter alia, but it also accused the Government of hon. Members opposite of having fomented disturbances in China by bribing the Cantonese, and referred to the Leader of the Opposition as "a mealy-mouthed Labour leader who has been playing the dirtiest of games." The article contained some most offensive and inaccurate statements, and a letter was written from the Government of Burma to the editor of the paper in question saying that, if his paper continued printing these articles, it would be excluded.

Mr. THURTLÉ: May we take it that the Government of Burma now constitute themselves defenders of the Leader of the Opposition in this country?

Earl WINTERTON: No, but it is concerned to see that lies are not told in newspapers.

Mr. LANSBURY: Can the Noble Lord say whether the editor of this newspaper has been in consultation or correspondence with the Noble Lord who is at the head of the India Office?

Earl WINTERTON: No. But I have had the advantage, or disadvantage, according to the way in which you look at it, of reading the article in question.

KENYA (SOMALIS).

7 and 11. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies (1) whether he will now make any official statement as to the recent conflict with Somalis in the district of Nyeri, in Kenya Colony; and whether he has now definite information as to the casualties reported to be sustained;

(2) whether his attention has been drawn to the published appeals in Kenya Colony urging the Government to take strong and vigorous measures to remove the Somali from the area in which they have settled to some more distant area, and at the same time to teach the Somali the lesson that the Government must be obeyed; and whether he will see that no such action is taken until the cause of the recent disturbance has been inquired into by an impartial Commission?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Amery): I have received no report from the officer administering the Government of Kenya regarding the incident, nor as to the casualties sustained, but he has been asked by despatch for a full report. I am aware that the Press in Kenya, as in this country, is not backward in offering advice to the Government; but I see no reason to intervene, as it appears from the proceedings in the Legislative Council on the 18th May that full inquiry was being made by the Colonial Government.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think it would be better if he sometimes took the advice of the Press?

Mr. AMERY: I do not know if the hon. and gallant Gentleman, in this case, would take the advice of the Kenya Press.

COLONIES (SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH).

8. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any action is being taken towards creating a single Colonial scientific and research service, as recommended in the Report submitted by Lord Lovat and his colleagues to the recent Colonial Office Conference?

Mr. AMERY: As my hon. and gallant Friend will recollect, the Committee of the Colonial Office Conference, over which Lord Lovat presided, while recommending the ultimate creation of a single Colonial research service, recognised that the natural method of growth of such a service was the organisation, in the first instance, of workers in the various fields of science into separate services. I have already appointed a Committee in accordance with the recommendation referred to by my hon. and gallant Friend to formulate practical proposals, for submission to Colonial Governments, to give effect to the resolution of the Colonial Office Conference, on the subject of a Colonial agricultural research service; and it is proposed that the recently appointed Colonial Medical Research Committee should, as one of its first tasks, consider the organisation of a Colonial medical research service. I may also say that steps are now being taken to set up another Committee to inquire into the present condition of the Colonial veterinary services. This Committee will no doubt consider the possibility of establishing a veterinary research service common to all the Colonies, Protectorates, etc. As regards forestry, I proposed to defer consideration of the question of constituting a Colonial forestry research service until after the meeting of the Empire Forestry Conference to be held at Melbourne in 1928.

IRAQ (SHEIKH MAHMUD).

9. Colonel DAY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will publish the text of the agreement, signed by Sheikh Mahmud, with the Iraq Government; and what is the number of British casualties to the forces engaged in the province of Sulaimani during the last three years?

Mr. AMERY: I am not in possession of the text of the agreement between Sheikh Mahmud and the Iraq Government, nor am I aware whether that Government proposes that it should be published. As regards the second part of the question, there have been two British casualties during the period in question, namely, one officer killed, one officer slightly wounded. A Royal Air Force officer and airman captured owing to a forced landing were subsequently released.

Colonel DAY: In view of the signing of this agreement, is it proposed to reduce the British force in Iraq?

Mr. AMERY: No, Sir. I am not aware that the Sheikh Mammud has in the past been responsible for such a substantial diversion of our forces in Iraq as would now involve any large alteration in our programme, which is, anyhow, one of steady reduction of our military force in that country.

NYASALAND (ISA MACDONALD LAWRENCE).

13. Mr. CECIL WILSON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has now received a report on the case of Isa MacDonald Lawrence, who was sentenced to three years' hard labour at Blantyre, Nyasaland, in October for taking into Nyasaland copies of the "Workers' Herald," a Johannesburg native paper edited by Clements Kadalie; and whether he has now any statement to make to the House?

Mr. AMERY: I have now received a report from the Governor of Nyasaland and am satisfied that Isa Lawrence was given a fair trial, and that the sentence was not excessive in the light of the evidence. I may add that Lawrence pleaded guilty and that he has entered no appeal against the sentence although he has been offered the necessary facilities.

Mr. WILSON: Is the justice who tried the case still in Nyasaland?

Mr. AMERY: Yes, as far as I am aware.

IMPERIAL COLLEGE OF TROPICAL AGRICULTURE.

14 and 16. Mr. RAMSDEN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies (1) whether work has begun on the hostel required for the students of the Imperial College of Tropical Agriculture;

(2) the number of pupils that have attended the Imperial College of Tropical Agriculture during the past session; and whether a greater number is expected for the next one?

Mr. AMERY: Work on the hostel has begun. There were 42 students during the past academic year. It is not yet possible to say whether this number is likely to be exceeded next year.

Mr. RAMSDEN: When is it expected the hostel will be finished?

Mr. AMERY: We are pushing it on as rapidly as we can, but I could not give the exact date of completion. I hope it will be soon.

Sir FREDRIC WISE: What is the number of the staff?

Mr. AMERY: I have given that in answer to a question on a previous occasion.

AMANI INSTITUTE.

15. Mr. RAMSDEN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the staff of the Amani Institute has now been appointed?

Mr. AMERY: An entomologist and a plant geneticist have recently been selected for appointment to Amani, but the staff will not be completed until the Director, who is now investigating the position in East Africa, submits his final recommendations as to the organisation of the institute.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH (TEMPORARY WRITING ASSISTANTS).

24. Mr. E. BROWN asked the Minister of Health why the director of establishments of his Department informed a deputation from the Association of Ex-Service Civil Servants on 17th March last that he proposed to employ only a very small number of new entrants to that Department as temporary writing assistants arising out of the work in connection with the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act when, in fact, he immediately took steps to employ over 100 of such temporary employés while there were ex-service temporary clerks redundant on the pool of the joint substitution board?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Sir Kingsley Wood): The statements in the question are not in accordance with the facts of the case. The deputation received on 17th March were informed that it would be necessary, pending the result of the writing assistants' examination, and the assignment of successful candidates, to offer temporary employment to a number of the candidates who had entered for that examination, but no intimation or guarantee was given that the number would be very small. The number to be engaged clearly depended upon the exigencies of the work. No steps were in fact taken to offer employment to any of the candidates until 26th April. I may add that the work for which these officers were required was new, permanent, non-clerical work, appropriate to the writing assistant grade.

Mr. BROWN: How many ex-service men were among those employed?

Sir K. WOOD: I must ask for notice of that question.

DISTRICT AUDITORS.

26. Miss BONDFIELD (for Miss LAWRENCE) asked the Minister of Health whether he will state the procedure by which he exercises his power of appointing district auditors; whether any advertisement is issued for this post or whether recommendations are invited; if so, from whom; and what qualifications are prescribed?

Sir K. WOOD: District auditors are appointed by my right hon. Friend on the recommendation of the Departmental Promotions Board, from among assistant district auditors. Assistant district auditors are recruited either by means of an open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commissioners or by the selection, in accordance with the usual Promotions Board procedure, of suitable established civil servants already serving in my Department.

Before the appointment is confirmed an assistant district auditor is required to pass an examination in accounts and audit, and in audit law and local government.

Mr. HARRIS: Are we to understand that it is not true to say that any auditors are nominated by the Government?

Sir K. WOOD: No; that is an entirely unfounded statement.

GRAVEYARD, TOOTING GRAVENEY.

25. Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Health whether if his request to the Privy Council for an Order in Council to the effect that burials be discontinued forthwith in the churchyard of the parish church of St. Nicholas, Tooting Graveney, in the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth, has been granted?

Sir K. WOOD: The notice required by Section 2 of the Burial Act, 1852, of the representation which my right hon. Friend has made for an Order in Council and of the time when the representation will be considered by the Privy Council, has been published and will expire on the 8th August.

Colonel DAY: Have any interments taken place in this graveyard since the hon. Gentleman's letter to the authorities on 27th May?

Sir K. WOOD: That is an entirely different matter from the subject of the question, which merely deals with the Order in Council.

Colonel DAY: Yes, but the Ministry wrote to those authorities saying they were applying for an Order in Council, and that in the meantime there were to be no interments. Can he say whether any have taken place?

Sir K. WOOD: That may very well be so, but it has nothing to do with the question on the Paper.

PERSIA (BRITISH RESIDENTS).

27. Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs how many British subjects, approximately, are resident in Persia?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson): I am unable to give even approximate figures.

PALESTINE (MATCH FACTORY, ACRE).

12. Miss BONDFIELD (for Miss LAWRENCE) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has yet been able to make inquiries with regard to the strike at the match factory at Acre; whether he is aware that on 24th June the pickets, including 13 girls, were beaten by the British police; that they have been arrested and that bail has been refused; and whether he is aware that the owners have attempted to negotiate with the Jewish workpeople on the condition that they shall abandon the interests of the Arabs and, on the Jews refusing, declared that they would dismiss all employes?

Mr. AMERY: I have no knowledge of the circumstances referred to in the question. If the hon. Member will furnish me with any information in her possession, I shall be glad to make inquiries.

EMPIRE SETTLEMENT.

17. Mr. RAMSDEN (for Viscount SANDON) asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs whether there is any change of policy on the part of the Victorian Government as to immigration; whether this has any effect on the loan and settlers' ratio agreement of 1924 between Great Britain and Australia or the scheme of 1925; whether the result will be that emigrants for that State will be refused; and, if so, for how long?

Mr. AMERY: I understand that the position at present is that recruiting for the Victorian Government Land Settlement Scheme is suspended, but that other classes of settlers, i.e., persons nominated by friends or relatives in Victoria, experienced farm workers, youths for farm work and women for household service, are being accepted as hitherto. The 1925 Agreement is an agreement between Great Britain and the Commonwealth Government. It is impossible to say how far that agreement may be affected by any temporary change of policy by an individual State.

18. Mr. RAMSDEN (for Viscount SANDON) asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs whether the Overseas Settlement Committee will give any facilities or make any arrangements for the proposed propaganda visit of Scottish settlers in Australia to the United Kingdom next year; and whether he will encourage visits being paid to overpopulated industrial districts where unemployment is severe in England, and to the Clyde rather than to the Highlands, to which visits are contemplated, and where it is highly undesirable that further depopulation should take place?

Mr. AMERY: My attention has been called to Press statements on this subject, but I have received no information from official sources. I am, however, making inquiries through the Development and Migration Commission of the Commonwealth Government.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask for a report from these Australians as to the means of transport in the Highlands when they do come there so that they may be able to make some comparison with the means of transport in the back blocks of Australia?

NEWFOUNDLAND (CORNERBROOK TIMBER SALE).

19. Mr. RAMSDEN (for Viscount SANDON) asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs whether he is likely to have any further information to report on the subject of the Cornerbrook paper concern?

Mr. AMERY: As my Noble Friend was informed by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on 28th June, it is not possible to make any statement on this subject while negotiations are still in progress.

VICTORIA GARDENS.

23. Miss BONDFIELD (for Miss LAWRENCE) asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether, in view of the pleasure to the public caused by permitting part of the grass in Victoria Gardens to be used by children, he will consider whether this permission might be extended to the whole of the grass space?

Captain HACKING (for The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS):

Children are at present admitted to the section of grass next to the sand pit, and my Noble Friend is prepared to extend the privilege to the central section during the summer holidays to children only.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Could it be extended over September? At present it is only till the end of September. Would that be considered as well, if it is fine in October especially?

Captain HACKING: The reason why it is not extended later than it is is because the grass gets in very bad condition, and unless we disallowed the use of the grass fairly early in the year, it has not a chance of recovering.

Commander WILLIAMS: Surely they do not do very much harm in September?

Captain HACKING: It would not have a chance of growing in October.

COAL MINING INDUSTRY.

OUTPUT.

31. Mr. LEE asked the Secretary for Mines whether the output per man-shift in the coal mines is calculated upon the coal-winding time at each colliery or upon the actual time during which work is proceeding at the coal face?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Colonel Lane Fox): The output of coal per man-shift is calculated by dividing the total output of coal by the total number of manshifts actually worked. The length of the shift does not enter into the calculation.

Mr. PALING: Do we understand that in all cases where short time is being worked any time put in is counted for a full shift?

Colonel LANE FOX: A man-shift is the basis of calculation—the total number of man-shifts into the total amount of coal produced.

Mr. LEE: If on any one day a man only works a quarter-day, would that be a full shift or a quarter-day?

Colonel LANE FOX: I think, if the hon. Member wants an answer on that point, he had better put his question down.

EIGHT HOURS ACT.

32. Mr. LEE asked the Secretary for Mines whether the Department is receiving any complaints from any part of the British coalfield respecting men being kept at work for longer than the eight hours allowed by the Eight Hours Act?

Colonel LANE FOX: The only complaint that I have received recently is that men working on Sunday night shift at a particular pit in Scotland are returning to work again on Monday afternoon before the expiration of the interval which the law requires.

SOVIET INSTITUTIONS (BRITISH EMPLOYEES).

35. Captain FOXCROFT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British subjects were employed by the Soviet diplomatic Legation, trade delegation, and Arcos, respectively, at the time of the severance of our relations with the Soviet; and how many of these are still thus employed?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Captain Hacking): I am informed that, according to the latest figures available, the numbers of British subjects employed before the severance of diplomatic relations by the Soviet institutions named were: Soviet Legation, 18; Trade Delegation, 27, and Arcos, 224. The Legation and Trade Delegation, having left this country, there are no British subjects employed by them. According to a list furnished by the director of Arcos, the number of British subjects employed by that company on 1st July was 127.

Captain FOXCROFT: Am I right in the supposition that all these British subjects are still in the pay of Arcos and in the employment of the Soviet Government?

Captain HACKING: Those people who are employed by Arcos are still in the pay of Arcos.

Mr. THURTLÉ: Can the hon. and gallant Member say whether the Government are taking steps to find employment for those British subjects who have been displaced as a result of the action of the Government?

Captain HACKING: No. Although we regret the unemployment, still, there are things to be put on the other side of the balance-sheet which more than compensate it.

BETTING DUTY (TOTALISATOR).

39. Colonel DAY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any applications have been made to him for the purpose of installing the totalisator machines on racecourses; and whether he is considering the approval of such applications?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Ronald McNeill): The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. I understand that the totalisator could not be installed on racecourses without an amendment of the Betting Laws. The second part does not, therefore, arise.

Colonel DAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether his Department have been making any tests with regard to the totalisator at all, or whether his representatives have been examining into it?

Mr. McNEILL: No, I cannot say that.

GOLD (LEGAL TENDER).

40. Sir F. WISE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the rates of gold to legal tender on the 31st March, 1914, and on the 31st March, 1927?

Mr. McNEILL: Apart from any gold coin that there may be in the hands of the public, the ratio of gold to the legal tender money (notes and coin) in active circulation on the 31st March, 1927, is estimated at 34·5 per cent. No estimate is available for 31st March, 1914, but the ratio at that date probably did not differ materially from that at 30th June, 1914, when it is estimated to have been 86·5 per cent.

TRADE FACILITIES ACT (NEWFOUNDLAND PAPER AND PULP COMPANY).

41. Sir F. WISE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the interest has been paid on the loan of £2,000,000 Newfoundland Paper and Pulp Company, guaranteed under the Trade Facilities Act, without the assistance of the Treasury?

Mr. McNEILL: Up to date, the interest on the £2 million A debentures of this company, which were guaranteed by His Majesty's Government under the Trade Facilities Act, has been duly paid by the company, without any charge on the Treasury.

TRANSPORT (PASSENGER TRAFFIC, GREATER LONDON).

44. Sir F. WISE asked the Minister of Transport if he has anything to report of the co-ordination of the local passenger traffic of Greater London?

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Colonel Ashley): I have nothing to add to the reply given by me on the 14th June last to the hon. Member for North Tottenham (Mr. R. Morrison), a copy of which I am sending to my hon. Friend.

Sir F. WISE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when he is likely to have some information to give?

Colonel ASHLEY: I am afraid I could not say.

ROYAL AIR FORCE (DISPLAY, HENDON).

The following question stood upon the Order Paper in the name of LIEUT.-COMMANDER KENWORTHY:

To ask the Secretary of State for Air if he is aware that the posters illustrating mimic warfare at the Hendon Royal Air Force display show the bombing of a village which, as the minaret and mosque clearly indicate, is a Moslem village; and whether in future care will be taken to avoid the use of obviously Moslem buildings for air attack in such displays, in order to avoid the risk of offending our Moslem fellow subjects?

Lieut.-Commander KENWORTHY: In putting this question, may I point out that there is an inaccuracy in the last part of which I was not aware when I put down the question, but the first part is perfectly accurate.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for AIR (Sir Philip Sassoon): I have seen the poster referred to, and I suggest to the hon. and gallant Member that he is taking the designer's fanciful effort altogether too seriously.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: Would it not be possible to have a poster which did not contain religious buildings at all, so as to offend nobody's susceptibilities? As the hon. Baronet knows the East, is he not aware that only Moslem villages have buildings of the type depicted?

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Would the Noble Baronet arrange next year to have a poster illustrating the bombing of the hon. and gallant Member for Central Hull (Lieut.-Commander Kenworthy)?

Sir P. SASSOON: I presume the hon. and gallant Member has seen the poster. I must say the impression made on my mind was that it was more like a western lighthouse than an eastern minaret.

Mr. THURTL: Is the hon. Member aware that at the demonstration on Saturday, while the natives were properly bombed in accordance with Christian practice, the building itself was left intact?

Colonel DAY: Can the hon. Baronet say how many of these posters were issued?

Sir P. SASSOON: I am afraid I could not say that.

PARISH COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

36. Mr. RENNIE SMITH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now in a position to report on a scheme to alter the present system of voting at the election of parish councillors which has been submitted by the County Councils Association; and if, in view of the many complaints to which the present method gives rise, he can inform the House whether it is proposed to take an early opportunity of amending the existing practice?

Captain HACKING: No decision has been reached upon the scheme referred to. The whole question will be carefully considered, but I may add that the number of complaints which have reached the Home Office as to the working of the present system is inconsiderable.

STANDING COMMITTEE (CHAIRMAN).

48. Mr. ARTHUR GREENWOOD asked the Prime Minister whether he proposes to provide facilities at an early date for the Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for Nelson and Colne, Standing Committee (Chairman)?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): No, Sir.

Mr. GREENWOOD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that since this Motion was put on the Order Paper there have been further irregularities in this Committee, and does he not think it is a little unfortunate that this Motion should be allowed to stand on the Order Paper indefinitely?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have had no information of any definite character given to me, though I understand there has been a certain amount of friction. Of course, it is inconvenient that this Motion should stand on the Order Paper indefinitely, but it is also extremely inconvenient to find a day for its discussion. It would be a great pity that the hon. Member should leave a Motion of this kind on the Paper.

Lieut. - Commander KENWORTHY: As one who is not in any way concerned with the matter directly, may I ask you, Sir, how we can raise questions affecting Chairmen of Committees? What is the machinery for doing it?

Mr. SPEAKER: The ordinary method is by tabling a Motion, but it would be very unfortunate if the House were to make a practice of discussing the way in which Chairmen upstairs carry out their difficult duties.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. A. V. ALEXANDER: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House to make a very short personal explanation of a matter connected with the OFFICIAL REPORT of the Debates.

[Mr. Alexander.]

In reply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Thursday last, I made one or two references to the co-operative society position, and, unfortunately, the Report is inaccurate. In column 725 of the OFFICIAL REPORT it states:

"if you take the salaries to-day, we take far more under Schedule A than is estimated."

What I actually said was:

"If you take the position to-day, we pay far more under Schedule A."

Another point is that I am reported as saying:

"In regard to the inquiry, the Taxation Committee of 1905 and the Royal Commission of 1919 said that private traders had made their case."

Whereas what I actually said was:

"The report of the Buxton Committee of 1905 and the Royal Commission of 1919 are largely agreed in principle. The Buxton Committee stated that the private traders had failed to make out any case for a change."

The other point is that I am reported in column 726 as saying:

"The profit is taxable profit."

What I said was:

"The question as to whether a profit is a taxable profit does not depend upon the use to which it is put, but upon its source, and the manner in which it is made."

I apologise to the House for raising this matter. It is only because this question is followed so widely in the trade Press, who take their information from the daily OFFICIAL REPORT of the Debates, and I did not wish them to be under a misapprehension.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

STANDING COMMITTEE A.

Mr. WILLIAM NICHOLSON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee A: Major MacAndrew; and had appointed in substitution: Major Elliot.

Report to lie upon the Table.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

NATIONAL SAVINGS CERTIFICATES.

Colonel DAY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the amount of savings certificates sold to the last convenient date?

Mr. McNEILL: The gross sales to 31st May were £636,114,953. The net capital amount actually outstanding on that date was £370,267,591.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH (OVERTIME).

Mr. E. BROWN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the number of hours of overtime worked in the Ministry of Health since the 16th May, 1927?

Sir K. WOOD: I have been asked to reply. The number of hours of overtime worked in my Department from 16th May to 22nd June amounted to 1,971, of which 1,174 hours were worked by the messenger staff, and 474 in provincial offices. My right hon. Friend is taking steps to strengthen the messenger staff.

TYPISTS.

Mr. HAYES asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, what is the number of temporary staff employed by his Department in England as Grades I and II shorthand typists and Grades I and II copying typists, respectively; whether any of the staff concerned use any foreign language; whether any allowance is paid for this; and what is the average length of service of those concerned?

Mr. LOCKER - LAMPSON: The numbers are as follow:

Ten shorthand typists, Grades I and II. Average length of service, 11½ months.

Twenty copying typists, Grades I and II. Average length of service, 4 years 10 months.

The shorthand typists are required to have a knowledge of French, but this is not required in the case of copying typists.

No language allowances are paid to temporary shorthand typists or copying typists.

Mr. HAYES asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the number of Grades I and II shorthand typists and Grades I and II copying typists, respectively, employed by his Department; and what is the average length of service of those concerned?

Mr. AMERY: The following are the particulars requested:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I (including three secretary shorthand-typists) ... 11
Shorthand-typists—Grade II ... Nil.
Average length of service four years.
Copying-typists—Grade I ... 21
Copying-typists—Grade II ... 1
Average length of service five years.

The above staff is common to the Colonial Office and that part of the Dominions Office which is housed in the same building.

Sir W. de FRECE asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs what is the number of the temporary staff employed as Grades I and II shorthand-typists and Grades I and II copying-typists, respectively, in the Dominions Office, Empire Marketing Board, and Overseas Settlement Office, respectively; and what is the average length of service of those concerned?

Mr. AMERY: As regards the Dominions Office headquarters, the shorthand and typing staff are common to the Dominions Office and the Colonial Office, the figures being as follows:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I (including three secretary shorthand-typists) ... 11
Shorthand-typists—Grade II ... Nil.

Average length of service four years.
Copying-typists—Grade I ... 21
Copying-typists—Grade II ... 1
Average length of service five years.

Old Queen Street Branch:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I ... 1
Shorthand-typists—Grade II ... Nil.
Copying-typists—Grade I ... Nil.
Copying-typists—Grade II ... Nil.
Length of service five years.

Pensions Appeal Tribunal, Dublin:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I ... 1
Other grades ... Nil.
Length of service five years.

Empire Marketing Board:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I ... 3
Shorthand-typists—Grade II ... 2
Average length of service 10 months.
Copying-typists—Grade I ... 2
Copying-typists—Grade II ... 2
Average length of service two years.

Oversea Settlement Department:

Shorthand-typists—Grade I ... 1
Shorthand-typists—Grade II ... 2
Average length of service six years.
Copying-typists—Grade I ... 1
Copying-typists—Grade II ... 3
Average length of service five years.

Mr. VIANI asked the Home Secretary what is the number of temporary staff employed as Grade 1 shorthand-typists, Grade 2 shorthand-typists, Grade 1 copying-typists, and Grade 2 copying-typists, respectively, in each of the following Departments under his control: General Staff (Headquarters); Irish Business Liquidation; London and Provincial Factory Inspectors' Offices, respectively; Anthrax Disinfecting Station; and Prison Commission for England and Wales?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: The figures asked for are as follow:

	Grade I Shorthand- typists.	Grade II Shorthand- typists.	Grade I Copying- typists.	Grade II Copying- typists.
General Staff (Headquarters) including Factory Inspectorate at the Home Office.	6	1	13	1
Irish Liquidation Business ...	3	—	2	—
London Factory Inspectors' Offices (other than Headquarter Staff at the Home Office).	1	—	—	1
Provincial Factory Inspectors' Offices ...	1	1	2	2
Anthrax Disinfecting Station ...	—	—	—	—
Prison Commission for England and Wales ...	—	1	1	—

COUNTY COURT OFFICES (CLERK-TYPISTS).

Mr. DUCKWORTH asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what is the number of Grades 1 and 2 clerk-typists, respectively, employed in the County Court offices?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I have been asked to reply. The number of established clerk-typists employed in County Court offices is 44, and the number of temporary clerk-typists, 15. Neither of these classes is sub-divided into Grades I and II.

CHIMNEY STACK, HOMERTON.

Captain GARRO-JONES asked the Home Secretary whether his attention has been drawn to the imminent danger of collapse of a chimney stack in the Homerton district, which is split to the extent of 100 feet of its length; and whether he is satisfied that adequate measures have been taken to ensure the safety of the public in the immediate vicinity?

Captain HACKING: Yes, Sir. I am advised that all necessary precautions have been taken to prevent danger either to the public or to persons employed on the factory premises. The stack is being demolished, and I am informed that the upper half was successfully taken down yesterday.

DANGEROUS DRUGS (ILLICIT IMPORTATION).

Sir R. THOMAS asked the Home Secretary whether the illicit importation of drugs into this country has increased since the War; from what countries they are principally introduced; and whether there have been any recent arrests for this offence?

Sir W. JOYNSON-HICKS: No, Sir. While it is not possible to speak positively in a matter of this kind, all our experience goes to show that the illicit importation of dangerous drugs has diminished since the passing of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920. No arrest of any importance has been made this year. I shall be happy to send the hon. Member—as soon as it is available—a copy of the Report made by His Majesty's Government to the League of Nations on the control of the drug traffic in respect of 1926, which contains a table giving particulars of all cases during the year in which seizures were made.

SOLICITATION LAWS.

Colonel DAY asked the Home Secretary whether he can now give the names of the members who have been appointed on the Committee of Inquiry on the Solicitation Laws; and what will be the terms of reference?

Captain HACKING: I would refer to the reply which I gave to a question on Wednesday last by the hon. Member for the Sutton Division of Plymouth (Viscountess Astor).

MILK REGULATIONS (HOLLAND AND DENMARK).

Mr. EVERARD asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he has particulars of the Orders and Regulations under which the milk supply is governed in Holland and Denmark; and how these Regulations compare with those in operation in this country?

Sir K. WOOD: I would refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Lamb) on the 12th May. My right hon. Friend is making more detailed inquiries into the scope of the Regulations in force in the countries to which my hon. Friend refers.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. HURD asked the Minister of Agriculture if his attention has been called to a Resolution adopted by the Bath and West of England Society urging the retention of the feet of pigs on the sides of bacon imported into this country, so that it may be possible to detect lesions of foot-and-mouth disease and ascertain whether or not the animals have had that disease; and what steps he proposes to take?

Mr. GUINNESS: My attention has not been called to the Resolution referred to in the question. I am afraid that the retention of the feet of pigs on sides of bacon imported into this country would not help meat inspectors to determine whether or not the carcasses had come from animals which were affected with foot-and-mouth disease.

question on Thursday last, and which appears in the OFFICIAL REPORT of that date.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS (Mr. W. PRITCHARD).

Mr. W. THORNE asked the Minister of Pensions if he is aware that Mr. W. Pritchard, of 136, New Barn Street, Canning Town, E.16, was discharged from the Army on the 1st April, 1916, through deafness caused by the War; that his pension is reduced to 8d. per day; that in 1910 he completed 16 years military service, six of which were spent abroad in various campaigns and eight years in the Army Reserve; that he volunteered for active service in 1914 and was accepted; and that he served in campaigns in the South African War and was in the attack upon Pieters Hill and at the siege of Ladysmith; and if he will consider whether the man's pension can be increased?

Lieut.-Colonel STANLEY: The deafness which led to Mr. Pritchard's discharge from the Army in 1916 was held to be neither attributable to nor aggravated by service in the Great War, and this finding was upheld, on appeal, by the Pensions Appeal Tribunal, whose decision is final. He is, consequently, not eligible for any award of disablement pension under the Ministry Warrants. As, however, his total service with the Colours and Army Reserve amounted to over 14 years and he was finally discharged on medical grounds, he was entitled to a pension of 8d. a day for life under Article 1163 of the Royal Warrant of 1914, but there is no authority under which this can be increased.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Sir F. HALL asked the Prime Minister if he will arrange for the issue as a White Paper of a comparison of the outline proposals of the Government for the reconstitution of the House of Lords and the proposals with this object in view which were formulated in 1921 by the Government then responsible?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the reply which the Prime Minister gave to this COAL MINING INDUSTRY (MERTHYR TYDVIL).

Mr. WALLHEAD asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the industrial conditions prevailing in the borough of Merthyr Tydvil, caused through the closing down of collieries, he proposes to take any action in order to meet the necessities of the case?

Colonel LANE FOX: I have been asked to reply. I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 23rd June to a similar question by the hon. Member for Houghton-le-Spring (Mr. R. Richardson).

AGRICULTURE (INQUIRY).

Mr. DIXEY asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the desire in the country that the position of the agricultural industry should be considered by the Government owing to the seriousness of the depression in the industry, he will consider setting up a Commission forthwith to inquire into the position of the industry?

The PRIME MINISTER: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave to an almost identical question addressed to me by my hon. Friend on the 28th June.

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY (HIGH-TENSION CABLE).

Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Health if he has received any information of any municipalities that have decided to purchase high-tension cable from abroad during the next 12 months?

Colonel ASHLEY: I have been asked to reply. Neither the Ministry of Transport nor the Electricity Commissioners have received any such information.

TRANSPORT.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT, WIMBLEDON.

Colonel DAY asked the Minister of Transport when it is intended to hold an inquiry on the accident which happened to two electric trains on the District Railway, outside Wimbledon station, on Monday, 27th June, in which several persons were injured; and whether the Report will be published?

Colonel ASHLEY: I have ordered an Inquiry into the causes of this accident, which will be held on Monday next. The Report of the Inquiry will be published in due course.

TOLL-GATE, CARDIFF AND PENARTH.

Captain A. EVANS asked the Minister of Transport if his Department has received at any time any proposal from the local authorities concerned for the abolition of the toll-gate between Cardiff and Penarth?

Colonel ASHLEY: Up to the present none of the local authorities concerned has put before me any proposal for the abolition of the toll-gate on the road between Cardiff and Penarth.

KABUL (BRITISH MISSION).

Sir A. KNOX asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of what officials the British mission to Kabul consists; and whether it includes a commercial attaché?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The permanent staff of His Majesty's Legation at Kabul consists of a Minister, a Counsellor, a Secretary, an Oriental Secretary, a Military Attaché and a physician. There is no commercial attaché serving with this mission, but His Majesty's Minister maintains close relations with the Senior Trade Commissioner for India in all matters pertaining to Afghan trade.

CONCRETE SHELTERS (GERMANY).

Sir F. HALL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government propose to take advantage of the invitation which has been conveyed by the German authorities to the military experts of the Powers, formerly represented on the Inter-Allied Military Commission of Control, to inspect the work of demolition of the concrete shelters in the eastern fortresses of Germany; whether this invitation has been referred by the experts of the Governments of the interested Powers; and will he arrange for the Report of the results of any inspection that may take place to be circulated to the House as soon as it has been received?

Mr. LOCKER-LAMPSON: The answer to this question, which was originally put down by the hon. and gallant Member for the 30th June, may be read in columns 586-7 of the OFFICIAL REPORT for that date. I have nothing at present to add to that statement.

INDIA.

BURMA OIL COMPANY.

Mr. J. HUDSON asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Chief Presidency Magistrate at Madras in connection with the shooting incident during the recent strike against the Burma Oil Company; and whether Messrs. Scott and Farmer, officials of the Burma Oil Company, have been sent for trial (under Section 324 I.P.O.) on a charge of causing hurt with a dangerous weapon, as recommended by the Chief Presidency Magistrate in his Report?

Earl WINTERTON: I have not yet seen the report referred to, but I have ascertained that Messrs. Scott and Farmer have been charged and are now under trial.

INDIA HOUSE, LONDON.

Colonel DAY asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can now state when it is proposed to begin work on the new India House in London?

Earl WINTERTON: I have nothing to add to the reply given on the 9th May to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Kelly).

MEDICAL SERVICE.

Sir R. LUCE asked the Under-Secretary of State for India how many European and how many Indian medical officers, respectively, have entered and retired from the Indian Medical Service in each of the years 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 and 1927; what is the total number of each category now serving; and what is the proportion of Europeans to Indians that is considered requisite for the satisfactory working of the service in the military and civil branches, respectively?

Earl WINTERTON: The table below shows the recruitment of, and casualties among, permanent officers of the Indian Medical Service during the years 1923-27.

Year.	Recruitment.		Casualties from all Causes, i.e., Retirements on Pension, Deaths, Removals, and Resignations.
	European.	Indian.	European.	Indian.
1923 ...	17	—	41	4
1924 ...	21	—	17	1
1925 ...	11	10	31	1
1926 ...	12	3	29	3
1927 ...	12	2	16	1
to date.

According to the latest Army List, there are now 489 British and 158 Indian officers holding permanent commissions in the Indian Medical Service.

The ratio of approximately one Indian to two European officers has been accepted for both the civil and the military sides of the Indian Medical Service.

KENYA (ALIENATED LANDS).

Mr. RENNIE SMITH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies the total acreage of land alienated to Europeans in Kenya and the total in occupation; and what amount of land is still available for alienation to Europeans?

Mr. AMERY: I am unable to give exact areas, and the following figures, which relate to surveyed land only, must be taken as approximate:

Alienated.—6,000,000 acres.

Under occupation.—4,750,000 acres.

Remaining available for alienation.—1,500,000 acres.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.

Further considered in Committee
[Progress, 30th June.]

[Mr. JAMES HOPE in the Chair.]

CLAUSE 29.—(*Amendment of 12 and 13
Geo. 5, c. 17, sec. 21.*)

Mr. DENNIS HERBERT: I beg to move, in page 15, line 38, to leave out Sub-section (1).

If you will allow it, Sir, I think it would be for the general convenience of the Committee that we should take a short preliminary general discussion on this Amendment. It might lead to a saving of time on other Amendments.

The CHAIRMAN: A general discussion on Clause 29?

Mr. HERBERT: Yes. I am moving this Amendment formally for the purpose of raising a general discussion. I would like to indicate those Amendments which some of us are particularly anxious to see accepted, and which we hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to accept. It may be useful to consider how the Clause will stand if those Amendments are carried. I take no responsibility for any one else in what I say here, and no one else is in any way pledged to the views which I may express. I desire to say at the outset that the Chancellor has met some of us with the greatest sympathy and consideration, and obviously with the most genuine endeavour to try to meet the alarm which was caused in business circles by this particular Clause. For my part, if the Clause is amended as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with certain further Amendments which I hope I have rightly understood from him he will be prepared to accept, then I shall be prepared to support the passing of this Clause; but, in saying that, I want to make it quite clear why I do so.

The Committee should remember that we already have had in operation, ever since 1922, Clause 21 of the Finance Act of that year, which establishes the scheme for, if I may say so, catching the man who tries unfairly to avoid Super-tax by means of limited companies. The scheme of the Act of 1922, I said at the time, and I say now, is to my mind objectionable. It has turned out to be ineffective, and I think it will be made very little more effective by the present Clause—and the present Clause is included to extend the operations of that Clause. But the Committee must also remember that, under Clause 34 of this Bill, this particular Clause 29 is not to come into operation until after next year's Finance Act has been passed. Therefore, it is the hope of some of us, who have already given considerable attention to the subject, that within that time we shall be able to place before the Government suggestions for a scheme that is totally different from that of Clause 21 of the Act of 1922; and, from my conversations with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I understand that he will be prepared to accept the suggestion, and I hope he will make a statement on some such lines as this, that if, before next year's Finance Bill is brought in, proposals are submitted which, in the opinion of the Government and its advisers, are not less effective than Section 21 of the Act of 1922 and Clause 29 of this year's Finance Bill for the purpose of stopping the avoidance of Super-tax through the medium of limited companies, and which are more acceptable to the business community, then the Government, if the present Government is still in office, will incorporate those proposals in the Finance Bill of next year in place of Section 21 of the Act of 1922 and Clause 29 of this year's Finance Bill.

I understand that something of that sort is at any rate assented to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I specially invite him, in the course of this Debate, to make a statement to that effect, because it will do a very great deal to allay the alarm which has been felt in business circles, and which must inevitably have an evil effect upon the business of this country. That is a point on which, perhaps, we may be able to say a little more when we come to the question that Clause 29 stand part of the Bill, and, therefore, I will not say anything at the moment about it, except this, that it is quite clear, from facts which are within my own knowledge, that a certain amount of harm to business, a certain stoppage or withdrawal of business, has already taken place by reason of the fear which has resulted from this proposal. As I have already said, my own view is that, with the Amendments which stand on the Paper in the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and with other Amendments which I hope he will accept, the position will be, at any rate, no worse than it was under the Act of 1922, and will in one respect be definitely better than it was under that Act, because every company which comes within this legislation will have the benefit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's second Amendment, which gives a kind of preliminary reference to the Board of Referees, and will enable the Board of Referees at once to stop all further proceedings if they come to the conclusion that there is no prima facie case of tax-dodging, if I may use that expression—it is an expression which has been used very much in this connection, and, perhaps, it will be useful to use it here.

We realise that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a very strong case indeed for endeavouring to stop that tax-dodging by very rich men which, although it is within the law, and is, therefore, quite permissible as long as they can do it, is not quite according to the rules of cricket, and has the effect of casting an additional burden upon the other taxpayers of this country. If we recognise that, it stands to reason that we must have some sympathy with the Chancellor's efforts, and, provided that his proposals are not calculated to do more damage to industry than is already the result of the Act of 1922, then I think we should support them, for I consider that no other choice is open to us. It may, perhaps, be convenient at this stage to see what Amendments are likely to be accepted, and what will be the general effect of the Clause if those Amendments are accepted, when Members are beginning to make up their minds whether they will support the Clause in that amended form, which I propose to do, or whether they will still think it is necessary for them to vote against it.

Of course, the most important Amendments are those, three in number, put down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"]—I speak with all respect to hon. Members, and I am sorry I put it in a manner which was not agreeable to them. I will put it in a different way. There are two extremely important Amendments in the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—three, in fact, but two of them must be taken together as one. Those Amendments undoubtedly contain a very great concession. The first of them is the one which excludes from the purview of this legislation subsidiary companies or companies in which the public is substantially interested. It proceeds, of course, to define what is meant by subsidiary companies and companies in which the public is substantially interested, but that is not a matter for discussion now; we shall come to it when we come to that Amendment. The Chancellor's second Amendment is the one to which I referred a little earlier as giving a certain advantage to the honest company which it has not got at present under the Act of 1922. That is the Amendment to add at the end of the Clause a new Sub-section providing, in substitution for paragraph (5) of the First Schedule to the Act of 1922, that directly any step is taken under the Act of 1922—a step indicating that the company is suspect—then the directors of that company may make a statutory declaration on the lines set out in the Amendment, that that, with the reply by the Inland Revenue Department, may be referred to the Board of Referees, and that, if they consider that no prima facie case is established, the whole proceedings shall stop at once. Again, I do not, of course, want to discuss that Amendment now, but merely to indicate what the effect of it generally is.

There are also other Amendments on the Paper, many of which are, if I may say so, rather on points of detail, and deal, perhaps, with slight points which have been overlooked in the drafting of the Clause or of the Government's Amendments. One of those is of very considerable importance. It was only put down very late. It proposes to leave out the words "not as" and to insert the words "may be regarded as not." I hope the Chancellor will indicate whether he is prepared to accept that Amendment because if he does, we shall understand what the Clause means, but as it reads at present, it is quite impossible for anyone to arrive at what was the real intention of the drafting in that part of the Clause. There are two Amendments down to the Chancellor's first Amendment in the name of myself and another hon. Member which I understand the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to accept, and then I want to refer to one which deals with this situation. A large number of companies distribute either under profit sharing schemes or otherwise, a large part of their annual profits among their employes. It is obvious that it would never be the intention of the Government to interfere with arrangements of that sort and to say that profits used in that way were unfairly withheld from distribution among the shareholders.

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. WALLHEAD: By a large part do you mean the major part?

Mr. HERBERT: It does not matter in the least what part it is. If the hon. Member takes an interest in it, the amount distributed among the employes should not be regarded as being improperly withheld for tax dodging purposes. There are certain other Amendments with which I gather the Chancellor is in sympathy, and I hope he will accept them in principle. They provide that the Board of Referees which deals with these cases shall be so constituted that in every case that comes before it there shall be a member or members of the tribunal who are experienced in and familiar with the business carried on by the particular company. These are very reasonable, and I hope they will be accepted.

There is another group of Amendments which may be described as intended to do away with what has been suggested as the penal effect of this Clause and of the Section of the Act of 1922. What happens where a company is, if I may use the expression, convicted of tax dodging, where it is decided that it has unreasonably withheld profits from distribution? Then, according to the scheme of this legislation, the man or men, or women, who control the company and use it for purposes of tax dodging are put in the same position as if the company had never been formed. If the Chancellor refuses, as I understand he will, to accept those Amendments, he has a very good case for doing so subject to this, that under the Clause as it may turn out to be in its final shape, there is no appreciable danger of any honest trading concern, which has no idea of tax dodging, being brought within the operation of the Section.

Sir ROBERT HORNE: There is none.

Mr. HERBERT: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is only justified in tearing off the cloak of the company from the particular taxpayer provided this legislation does not affect in practice the honest trading company. That will be discussed later on. It depends what Amendments are carried and what are not. But this raises the question of the objectionable nature of the whole of this scheme under the Act of 1922. There again it is obviously the duty of the Government—it is the duty of Parliament, as well as the duty of business men who are affected by it—to set their brains to work at once, and not to wait until the next Finance Bill, to find a way of legislating against the offending taxpayer in such a way that it does not interfere with the honest trading company, and I have every reason to believe—I hope I am not too optimistic—that that is not impracticable. Certain schemes to that end have already been roughly thought out and will, I hope, be further developed very soon. Here in this Finance Bill we are troubled with the fact that we have already got Section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, on the Statute Book, and presumably we cannot expect to repeal that now, and unless and until we can repeal it, it is our duty to try to stop the loopholes under that Section, provided we can do it without making things worse for the honest trading company than they are at present. Whether we are doing that or not may be a matter on which there will be difference of opinion. It is undoubted that if this Clause passes it will bring companies under the operation of the Act of 1922, which do not come under it at present. But those companies, and also those already under the Act of 1922, now get what I consider to be a very strong and useful defence in the Chancellor's second Amendment, which enables the preliminary reference to be made to the Board of Referees.

I do not think at this stage it would be proper to go more into detail into any of the Amendments on the Paper, which will be dealt with in due course, but, if the right hon. Gentleman will indicate those Amendments he is ready to accept, and perhaps some others that he is prepared to accept in principle, it will obviously tend to simplify and shorten our discussion on the Clause as a whole, and I hope, besides doing that, he will make a declaration as to what the Government will have to do between now and the next Finance Bill in order to allay anxiety. In regard to that, business people themselves are not altogether free from blame for the position that has arisen. The time when they ought to have taken up this question was when the 1922 Act was before the House as the Finance Bill of that year, but they did not think it necessary to interfere in the matter or to assist the efforts of old friends. Even this year, after the Finance Bill was printed, it took a very long time to get any of them to realise what was the effect of this Clause. When the effect was realised, they saw that it undoubtedly had done harm. Cases have actually occurred, and have been brought to my notice, where orders for shipbuilding have been cancelled. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows, of course, that there are large numbers of private companies which would come within this legislation which own steamships or ships of some kind or other, and that it is the invariable and the only reasonable business practice that the whole of the profits resulting from the building of those ships should be set aside until the greater part of the cost of them has been provided for. I hope that these companies will be properly protected when this Clause is carried through.

I take another case where I was personally approached only a few days ago by a man concerned in the intended registration in this country of a company with a capital of several millions, intending to do all their finance in this country, build most of their factories in this country, and thus do a very great deal for employment and for the revenue. When they heard of this Clause, they practically decided to go to another country. [Interruption.] Perhaps hon. Members will listen till the end of the story. I was able to persuade that gentleman that without a shadow of doubt that great company would be safe from this particular legislation, and the result is, I hope, that that company will be registered here after all. But this does show the very great importance that, when taxation proposals of this kind are made, they should be made with care. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the Clause, as it was originally drawn, was nothing short of being amazingly ridiculous. I think it is unfortunate that more care is not taken by somebody when Finance Bills are drawn to consider what is likely to be the effect of them upon business, instead of waiting, as is, apparently, the practice of the Inland Revenue at the present time, for criticisms and then saying what should be done. In the meantime an immense amount of harm is done by the destruction of confidence in business. Let there be no doubt about my dislike of this Clause and of the Section of the old Act, but, considering all things, I believe that we ought to support the Clause if we can get such Amendments as I hope we shall do. I do so, because I honestly believe that the chances will be something like 999 to one against any honest company ever knowing in practice of this existing legislation.

No. 92

The whole thing depends on whether the Clause makes it reasonably certain that no company will come under the operations of this Clause and be taxed for Super-tax unless and until it is established beyond doubt that that particular company have been trying to avoid taxation. If this be the case, then I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have the sympathy of the Committee behind him, but, on the other hand, it is our duty, in protecting the business of the country generally, to see that there is practically no risk of any company being assessed for Super-tax under these Clauses unless they have been definitely convicted of attempting to dodge the tax. On that basis, I hope we may have a reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer which will satisfy some of us that the Clause will be as little unsatisfactory as can be hoped for, and, under those circumstances, I shall then ask leave to withdraw this particular Amendment, which is to leave out Subsection (1). Then we shall follow on, of course, with the Amendments which are calculated, I hope, to be of a constructive and not of a destructive character.

The CHANCELLOR of the EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Churchill): I think the speech of the Member for Watford (Mr. D. Herbert) who is so exceptionally well-informed on these subjects, has been a helpful one and has been intended to facilitate the task of the Committee.

B 2

[Mr. Churchill.]

this afternoon. Nevertheless, I intervene in this early stage of the discussion, because I propose to take advantage of this occasion to clear away some of the misapprehensions and the misrepresentations which have played such a large part in upsetting public opinion, quite groundlessly, during the last few weeks. The first of these misconceptions that I should like to deal with is a rather unfair attack upon the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue, which has found its way into a great many newspapers and even figures in a leading article of the "Times." It is suggested that Somerset House is at the bottom of these Clauses; that they have allowed themselves to be carried away by a desire to add to their inquisitorial powers, and that, reaching out further each year and, this year, finding a simple and ingenuous Chancellor of the Exchequer not able to penetrate into these deep matters, they have very readily made him the dupe of their purposes, and his connivance or default has involved the whole Government in this blunder. I think I have stated the case fairly.

Now let us have the truth. These Clauses did not originate at Somerset House. The need for dealing with this matter was not brought forward by the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue. The cause for action arose here, in the House of Commons. It arose on the Debate which we had last year. Speeches were made on both sides of the House alleging a growing abuse. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury first, and afterwards, on another occasion, I myself promised the House that we would look into this matter during the autumn and that if we found it had attained serious dimensions we would not hesitate to make proposals upon it. In consequence of these pledges, I made inquiries of the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue, who said that the allegations, as to the serious character of the abuse, were fully sustained, and that the remedy was comparatively easy, but they did not recommend that action should be taken, on account of the prejudice that would be aroused and the Parliamentary difficulties which had manifested themselves in 1922 when my right hon. Friend the Member for Hillhead (Sir R. Horne) first dealt with this matter. He was our pioneer on the subject. Therefore, so far from the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue having been the motive power in this, in so far as they advised as to what ought to be done, the advice they gave was that it might perhaps be advisable not to press the matter.

The responsibility rests with His Majesty's Government, where it should rest, with the responsible Ministers of the day. The Cabinet set up a Committee to consider the matter, of which my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General was a prominent Member. We examined the matter in great detail for a great many weeks, and we put the issues and the result of our deliberations to the Cabinet and asked them to consider whether, on the whole the needs of the occasion justified the legislation despite the difficulties which it would encounter. Their decision was that action was necessary and that it was our duty to take that action. Thereupon, we went forward, and having gone forward I need scarcely say that we must carry our policy through to its conclusion. I hope I have completely removed the misconception that the officials of Somerset House were responsible. Ministers and Ministers alone were responsible, and no Minister has any responsibility in this matter comparable with my own.

What is the second misconception; a widespread misconception? It is that these proposals are of a novel and exceptional character. Even the "Times" newspaper writes in its leading article that they are revolutionary proposals, and at length in other quarters, whether in letters or articles, we are told that these proposals will give the Inland Revenue power to interfere in the internal management of every company, will strike at the foundations by which the reserves of companies are built up, just at a time when we all know how important it is to add to the growth of those reserves; that this will spread want of confidence; that it will impose a hobble upon initiative and enterprise, and that the business of our country may receive a most serious and formidable blow. What are the facts? In principle and in method the measures which we propose in Clause 29 have been the law of the land for the last five years. The same powers of investigation, the same powers for fixing the liability to Super-tax, have ruled for the last five years, ever since the Budget of 1922. All that Clause 29 in the present Bill does is to extend the range of those powers to a somewhat larger number of companies and, in addition, as my hon. Friend has just said, it affords certain safeguards to the companies who have been previously involved and those that will now be involved in the scope of our legislation, which were not present in the legislation of 1922.

Let us look at some of the figures. I am advised that there are, approximately, 80,000 non-derelict private companies in the United Kingdom at the present time. Does anybody know how many of those were brought into the ambit of the legislation of 1922? I think the figure will surprise the Committee. I think it may even surprise my right hon. Friend the Member for Hillhead. Forty thousand private companies were brought into the scope of the legislation of 1922. One-half of the whole of the private non-derelict companies in this country. That is to say, half the private company businesses of this country have for the last five years been living under this very revolutionary system, under this cruel inquisitorial investigation, under this absolutely fatal bar to business of every kind, and they have not even known it. They have not even been conscious of the fact that they were involved in it. That is a remarkable and significant fact. Let me impress this point upon the Committee and upon those who are outside who are particularly concerned. Forty-thousand, or one-half of the private company businesses of this country have been during the last five years under exactly the same administration in regard to this particular point as we now propose to apply to a somewhat larger number.

Of those 40,000 companies which have been in this terrible zone of potential inquiry 550 have in the last four years—the Clause has been on the Statute Book five years but has been working only four years—been called upon to make returns by this tyrannical, inquisitorial, oppressive Board of Inland Revenue which, once having got the power to do these things will, we are told, always use it in a very unfair manner. Of the 80,000 companies, on an average 135 per annum have been invited to make returns, I would like to point out that in those four years we have had four Governments, including one Socialist Government, in which the Financial Secretary to the Treasury was specially interested in this question of evasion. The administration has worked in a perfectly harmonious manner during the whole of those four years.

A little later I will analyse what has happened to the 550 companies, that is, an average of 130 or so per annum, who have been called upon to make returns. For the moment, I will content myself by saying that the evil with which we are trying to grapple is the same as that which existed in 1922. The remedies we are applying are the same, but the evils having moved on to a somewhat wider field the remedy must be made to move on into that field. What were the evils which required the legislation of my right hon. Friend in 1922? Let me explain them. It is now possible for anyone who chooses to avoid taxation to do so by turning himself into a company: by selling his own business to a company. He retains the whole control of that company. Sometimes it is done in the form of a vote which the founder or proprietor has: a very peculiar vote: a vote which I have seen in some prospectuses described as giving him a voting power, in virtue of this vote, equal to all the votes cast against him, plus one. I think that is the sort of vote which some of us would be very glad to have in this House. While retaining,

4.0 p.m. under various devices, the full responsible control, the proprietor is able to draw out, in the form of a loan, or in payment for debentures, whatever money he requires for his personal expenses, and these moneys are drawn out free of all charge to Super-tax. These cases are quite well known to the Inland Revenue. The law renders them completely immune, but what is going on is absolutely apparent. I am going to give some instances, but I should like to make it perfectly clear that I have no personal knowledge to whom these instances refer. The Inland Revenue officials are governed by secrecy, very wholesomely and very necessarily, and, in consequence, the instances I give are in every way chosen so as to respect and safeguard the principles of that code. All I know is that they are actual and authentic cases.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Let me show a few cases of the kind with which we think it our duty to deal. The first case is that of a firm of manufacturers. In one year this company made a profit of £75,000 and paid dividends to the extent of £3,300. The two people in control of the company drew in that year £33,000 in so-called loans, on which no interest was payable. The second case is that of a textile company. The profits were £66,000. The dividends amounted to £6,900. The controlling shareholder drew out by way of loan £19,000, free of Super-tax. In the previous year he drew out £54,000 by way of loan, free of Super-tax. The third case was one of food supply, the profit being £9,000, the dividends paid £700, and a loan of £6,000 being made to the controlling shareholder. In another case, the profits were £13,000, the dividends £1,000 and the loan £10,000. In the previous year, the controlling shareholder had drawn by way of loan £33,000 out of the accumulated profits. All these cases are selected, not from the whole range, but simply from the pre-1914 classes which were specially exempted from the legislation of my right hon. Friend. Even in that small class, these are some typical cases.

I think I am right in saying that it is common ground with all of us that we are bound to do our duty to arrest an evil of that kind, and that the Government must do it before it has reached serious dimensions. A swift, sure, easy means of avoiding taxation exists. The knowledge of it is increasing every day. The advertisement it has received from Debates in this House last year, from articles in the newspapers, and from Debates we are having now, undoubtedly will bring it home to vast numbers of people who were unaware of the fact before, and if the Government, having introduced these Clauses which they have regarded as their duty to pass into law, were to withdraw from this task, it would give a warrant, a charter from Parliament for the widespread adoption of those practices. [An Hon. Member: "No!"]. I say if we were to avow ourselves incapable of dealing with the matter, it would give a charter to the widespread adoption of these practices, which, if they were to attain any general vogue, would unquestionably result in dividing the taxpayers of this country into two classes—those who pay their taxes and those who do not, it being perfectly and clearly understood that those who were willing to pay their taxes would have to pay the share of those who would rather not, with the result that, undoubtedly, there would have to be an increase in the standard rate of Income Tax.

I am bound to point this out, because the Government have no choice whatever, having raised this matter, but to see that they deal with it in an effective way. I have accepted, and am willing to accept, many Amendments which reassure the general mass of the taxpayers and of business firms. I will accept no Amendment which in the slightest degree blunts the efficiency of the Clause. My hon. Friend who spoke suggested that the Amendments we had accepted, or had put down ourselves to our Clause, showed how carelessly the Clause was drafted. I repulse that suggestion. I believe the Clause, as drafted, would have done no harm to bona fide businesses. I believe the reassurance I have given in the form of Amendments which I have put down, or will accept, will in no way prevent our achieving the perfectly clear and definite object we have in view. When, in the year 1922, the first provisions on this subject were introduced by my right hon. Friend, there were, of course, the most extravagant predictions of the misfortunes that would follow. All the language which we have heard on this occasion—and some people who are good judges tell me even more—was poured upon his head and upon his proposals.

But how have the powers of 1922 been used in practice by the Inland Revenue authorities? I have said already that the business world has been hardly conscious of the fact that one-half of the private companies were already in this sphere. They have only just heard about it. Let us see what has been the actual procedure under the Section. The Inland Revenue acts in cases where they have reason to think there is tax evasion. The Special Commissioners then hear the taxpayer, and they adjudicate. The taxpayer may then, if he chooses, appeal to the Board of Referees and so may the Inland Revenue if dissatisfied with the decision of the Special Commissioners. What is the Board of Referees? People have discussed this matter as if the Board of Referees were a body of gentlemen under the control of the Government, or an appanage of Somerset House. They are a body of independent, unpaid, impartial people, chosen and set up for the express purpose of standing as a bulwark between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue.

Sir R. HORNE: By whom?

Mr. CHURCHILL: In the first instance by the Government. Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that he did not exercise his choice with impartiality?

Sir R. HORNE: I make no suggestions at all.

Mr. CHURCHILL: If by his interruption my right hon. Friend meant anything, he meant that he doubted their impartiality.

Sir R. HORNE: No.

Mr. CHURCHILL: If my right hon. Friend does not doubt that impartiality, I need not pursue the point. They are appointed in exactly the same way as His Majesty's Judges are appointed, and I have no doubt they discharge their functions with the same absence of fear, favour or affection. There is no power on the part of anyone to interfere in the management of companies, but the decision whether any particular company within the scope of the legislation is immune from Super-tax can only be taken by an impartial, non-official body, and I am going to show how that impartial, non-official body has exercised its powers. In 1922, there was a very careful definition for the guidance of the Special Commissioners and the Board of Referees of what was a reasonable sum to carry to reserve, and I think in the framing of this the Committee of those days had a great deal of assistance from my hon. Friend who opened the discussion this afternoon. Although perhaps the words are not exactly his, they are words which, I think, he had a great deal to do with framing, and words with which he was satisfied in the end. It is laid down for the guidance of the Special Commissioners and the Board of Referees that "In determining whether any company has or has not distributed a reasonable part of its income as aforesaid, the Commissioners shall have regard not only to the current requirements of the company's business but also to such other requirements as may be necessary or advisable for the maintenance and development of that business."

Sir JOHN MARRIOTT: Is that by Statute?

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is in Sub-section (1) of Section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922. So that the answer is in every way satisfactory to my hon. Friend. I said a little while ago that, under this legislation, in four years of its working, on an area of 40,000 companies, or half the private companies in the country, 550 cases had been selected as cases in which the directors of the company had been asked to furnish returns. Let us see what happened to those 550 cases. After the returns had been furnished, the Inland Revenue claimed Super-tax in 250 cases, or rather less than half. There were 128 out of those 250 cases in which there was an appeal to the Special Commissioners. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayer in 60 cases, and against the taxpayer, in whole or in part, in 68 cases. Only 11 cases were carried to the Board of Referees, the parties concerned on either side having recognised the justice of the decision of the Special Commissioners in all other cases. But 11 cases in four years, on a scale of business comprising 40,000 companies, went to the Board of Referees. Of those 11 cases—I said they were an impartial body, and I think the actual results ought to confirm that statement—in five cases the Board of Referees decided in favour of the taxpayer and in six cases against the taxpayer. Therefore in six cases only that were appealed against in four years has a decision been given against the taxpayer.

Mr. HERBERT: Would the right hon. Gentleman mind repeating the figures after the 128?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I shall be very glad to do so. There were 128 appeals made to the Special Commissioners, and in 60 of those cases the Special Commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayer and in 68 cases, in whole or in part, against the taxpayer. Of those 68 cases, 11 were carried to the purely impartial body, the Board of Referees, and of those 11 cases, five were decided in favour of the taxpayer and six against the taxpayer.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Did the Board of Inland Revenue appeal in any of the cases decided against it?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Of course, the Crown can appeal, if it think fit. These figures, of course, apply not to the 68 cases but to the 128 cases. That is perfectly true. I am much obliged to my hon. and learned Friend for pointing that out, but, whether 68 or 128, it is exactly the same for the purpose of the very serious argument I am employing. I was going to give to the Committee some examples of the decisions which have been given in favour of the companies by the Special Commissioners and the Board of Referees. We are told that business is going to be hampered. Let us see the kind of practice which has been adopted. Here is the case of a company of manufacturers. In the first year it made a profit of £27,000, and in the second year £36,000, and declared dividends of £3,000 and £5,000. The Inland Revenue drew attention to this, and there was an appeal to the Special Commissioners, who were satisfied that the retention of the undistributed profits was necessary for the development of the business and the extension of the company's premises.

In the second case the actual income was £13,000, and the dividend distributed was nil. The company satisfied the Special Commissioners that the retention of the income of the company was necessary in order to provide for depreciation of the property. The third case, a manufacturing company, the actual income was £15,000, and the dividend declared £5,000. The company satisfied the Special Commissioners that the retention of the undivided profits was necessary for the purpose of extending the company's buildings and plant. The fourth case, a manufacturing company, the actual income was £13,000, and the dividend declared £700. The company satisfied the Special Commissioners that the undistributed income was needed in order to meet the current requirements of a growing business. The fifth case, a textile company, the profits were £54,000, and the dividend declared £5,000. The company satisfied the Special Commissioners that it was necessary for them to retain the undivided income in order to provide reserves to meet trade competition. The sixth case, a multiple shop company, the income was £44,000 in the first year and £48,000 in the second year. The dividend declared was £13,000 for the first year and £14,000 for the second. The company satisfied the Special Commissioners that the retention of income was necessary for the maintenance of the existing business and the acquisition of further shops.

I now come to the decisions given by the Board of Referees. The first case is that of a company engaged in stock and share dealing. Its income was £7,000 for the first year, and £8,000 for the second year. No dividend was paid in either year. On appeal to the Board of Referees, the company showed that its issued capital was inadequate, and that it was necessary to retain the profits in order to provide the normal means of development. In this case, the Board of Referees reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners. In the second case, hotel proprietors, in the first year the income was £13,000 and in the second year, £21,000. No dividends were paid in either year. Upon appeal the Special Commissioners decided in favour of the company. The Board of Inland Revenue were not satisfied and considered that the case should go to the Board of Referees, and the Board of Referees after full investigation were satisfied that the withholding of the profits was reasonable in view of the requirements of the company's business. The fourth case, timber merchants, the income was £28,000 for the first year and £18,000 in the second year. No dividends were paid in either year. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the company. The Board of Inland Revenue considered that the case should go before the Board of Referees, and the Board of Referees upheld the decision of the Special Commissioners on the ground that the company had reasonably withheld a distribution of profits. This is typical of the manner in which the provisions of my right hon. Friend have been working during the last four years under four separate Governments, and the way in which the powers have been used shows that the ordinary course of business has not been interfered with in the slightest degree.

Sir BASIL PETO: All the cases which the right hon. Gentleman has given are of decisions one way; that is in favour of the trader. Has he any decisions in favour of the Government?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have chosen these decisions in order to show how very wide is the latitude of the Special Commissioners and the Board of Referees. There are a number of decisions which have been given the other way, and in my figures I have stated that 68 decisions were given by the Special Commissioners against the taxpayer, as compared with 60 decisions in his favour, and that six decisions were given against the taxpayer by the Board of Referees as against five decisions in his favour. All I want to show is how broad-minded has been the interpretation placed by the Special Commissioners and the Board of Referees on the words of the Statute of 1922. That is the process which will rule when Clause 29 is passed into law.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us one or two of the most flagrant cases which obviously show the need for this legislation?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have already read out a number of cases in which, in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, there should be an examination, and those are the cases which under the present legislation we shall be able to put through this very carefully considered and safeguarded process.

Mr. MACQUISTEN: I understand that those cases were the ones which the law is unable to deal with.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have not furnished myself with examples of those cases. It would be quite possible to give such, and they would be cases where the distributed profits fell so far below the average of the trade that it was perfectly clear that the object was not one of trading but a deliberate evasion of their fair dues to the State. My contention is that there has been no harm done to any business in the past, large or small, which has been conducted for bona fide commercial purposes, and I submit that the future does not differ from the past, and cannot be made to differ from the past, because these impartial authorities with their judicial functions are interposed between the taxpayer and the tax collector. All we are trying to do is to extend the zone of potential inquiry and adapt new safeguards which are appropriate to the larger number of companies brought within the scope of the legislation. One of these safeguards will be to attach to the panel of referees a business man connected with the trade in regard to which cases may be discussed, or, conceivably, to give power to the Board of Referees to co-opt a representative of the trade in a particular case. This is under discussion and the actual words will be inserted on Report when they are in a completely satisfactory form.

Let us see what are the actual proposals of Clause 29. I am sorry to detain the House so long but I feel bound to do so. The first step in extending the powers of the Act of 1922 was to try and reassure as many people as possible that they would not be included within its extended scope, and therefore, we have attached four conditions of an exclusive character. It does not mean that everybody within this is going to be interfered with. It means exactly the opposite. All it means is that those outside the scope may immediately regard themselves as not affected in any way by the legislation. There is the old provision of not more than five persons. We have added to that, as a reassuring amendment, any company which is quoted in the Stock Exchange List official or supplementary of the United Kingdom and on which 25 per cent. of the voting power is held by the public. We have also arranged a provision dealing with subsidiary companies of ordinary companies. By that a turnstile is set up so narrow that while it includes by far the greater part of the private companies, nevertheless it excludes 90 per cent., by volume, of British business. Ninety per cent., by volume, of British business and 85 per cent., by volume, of company business is absolutely outside the scope of Clause 29, subject to the Amendments I have put down.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Would Lever Brothers be excluded?

Mr. CHURCHILL: How can I possibly on the spur of the moment answer that, and I should be paying less consideration to the question than it deserves if I were to try and answer it. Although 90 per cent. of the general business and 85 per cent. of the company business is excluded by these provisions, 35,000 more private companies are added to the 40,000 companies which were included within the scope of the legislation of my right hon. Friend. To the vast majority of these nothing will happen. They will be asked no questions, and they will be no more conscious that anything is taking place than the 40,000 companies have been during the last four years. But where the Board of Inland Revenue thinks there is evasion, and there is no difficulty in selecting really extravagant cases, the directors will at the outset have the opportunity of making a statutory declaration that there is in fact no evasion and state their reasons. The Special Commissioners will in many cases accept this declaration, and in some cases they will, after hearing the counter-statement of the Board of Inland Revenue, refer the matter to the Board of Referees. The new provisions protect the taxpayer, that is the 40,000 companies as well as the 35,000 additional companies, which are now being included. The Crown cannot undertake to prove motive in law, as my right hon. Friend said very well five years ago. All the Crown can do is to deal with the facts as they are disclosed.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. WALLHEAD: In the Trade Union Bill they can.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Let us deal with one Bill at a time. The Crown can undertake to submit a prima facie case to the Board of Referees. That is comparable to the kind of duty which my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General discharges when he is asked to sanction a prosecution. He does not go into the actual case, he does not try the case; he considers whether there is a sufficiently strong case to justify an inquiry. It is also rather analogous to the position of a grand jury which refers cases to the Assizes. The differences are all in favour of the taxpayer, for whereas the Attorney-General and the grand jury decide on ex-parte evidence, in this case a written statement from both sides will be before the Board of Referees. They will hear both sides, and unless they say that in their opinion there is a prima facie case of evasion, nobody would be interfered with in the slightest degree. It will protect the 40,000 companies already in its sphere as well as the 35,000 which it is proposed to bring in. The Board of Referees may, in giving its preliminary decision, decide in favour of the taxpayer, in which case that is an end to it. They may decide in favour of the Crown. If they decide in favour of the Crown, then and then only the provisions of Clause 29 begin to apply, and the turnstile, which I have indicated in Clause 29 is an exclusive turnstile, has been reinforced by a human gate-keeper in the shape of the Board of Referees, with a view of placing a larger number of companies immediately at their ease so that they may not feel the slightest alarm that they are going to be mauled, handled, or interfered with in any respect. What happens when a company actually enters the area of Clause 29? It has all the protection of the Clause, the words which I have read out and those which figure in the legislation of my right hon. Friend. It has all the protection of the Special Commissioners, and in at least half the cases they have decided against the Board of Inland Revenue. It has, in addition, the protection of the Board of Referees, who in practically half the cases have decided in favour of the taxpayer.

Finally, there is an appeal, not on points of fact but on points of law, to the Courts of the land. But if the taxpayer is not covered by these protections and safeguards and finally the Board of Referees includes him among those, or he admits that he should be included among those who have evaded their due share of the taxation of the country, if in the last resort that position should be reached in regard to any particular company, what happens? Then, we are told, the penal clauses come into effect, the penal provision. What is the penal provision? All that happens is that the taxpayer, judged after all these precautions, loses his status as a public company and loses the privileges given to public companies, and drops down to the ordinary position of a private individual or private firm. There is not the slightest difficulty in his adjusting and rearranging his affairs in such a way as to place himself entirely inside the law before the next year comes along. That is the worst of the penal provision, of which we have heard so much.

I think it is impossible to set up a more considerate and careful procedure. All these precautions are not taken for the sake of the tax-evaders; they are taken for the sake of giving reassurance to the vast mass of business by which this country gets its daily livelihood, and to remove the apprehensions that are felt there. I see in some of the newspapers statements made that these Clauses are retrospective to the extent of six years. I should be quite willing to rectify this if the case were made out. There is not the slightest shadow of shade of a shred of vestige of any such thing. In the ordinary working of the Income Tax errors and mistakes may be rectified six years back on either side. This Clause 29, so far from being retrospective, is to come into operation next year, and that means it will start fair from next year. It has no existence before next year. It will refer to what takes place this year, as all Super-tax does: it is calculated on the preceding year. Nothing will be taken into consideration that is not being done this year; nothing previous can ever be taken into consideration under this Bill; and if there were the slightest doubt as to the accuracy of what I say, about the words of the legislation, we would accept any words that were necessary to improve it. But I understand there is absolutely none, and that the legislation in fact begins for all alike next year and refers only to events which are taking place in the currency of the present financial year.

My hon. Friend has asked me whether I hope to reconsider these Clauses. I must admit that in one respect I am certainly not entirely satisfied that they are perfect. I must admit that the methods of evasion are not entirely dealt with in this provision. It may well be that at a later stage some of those who moved out of the sphere of my right hon. Friend in 1922 will be able to move out of the new sphere, the extended zone which we occupy in 1927. But they will have to move to a less comfortable position which alone will be open to them.

Of course Parliament retains control of this legislation until next year, when a general Financial Resolution covering the Income Tax and Super-tax proposals of the year will have to be passed by the House. Therefore, the House is not dealing with this matter once for all. I must not use any language which would give the slightest countenance to keeping alive the sort of campaign of apprehension and alarm and despondency which has been noticeable in certain quarters during the last few weeks; but at any rate the House is in control of the matter until this time next year, and if, in the interval, a better way of achieving the purpose of the Government than that which we have devised can be devised by business men or by the Members of the House, a way which secures the proper protection which the revenue requires and at the same time is more satisfactory to the business men of the country, I am personally ready to consider it. Indeed I should be grateful for any assistance that can be offered on that score.

Meanwhile, I say that the Government have gone to their limit in trying to reassure honest doubts. It is quite impossible to postpone or to withdraw the proposals which we have put forward, still less to accept any Amendments which would render them nugatory. Therefore, I invite the Committee, without distinction of party, to sustain the Chancellor of the Exchequer against a dangerous and growing abuse which, as it develops, cannot fail to be seriously injurious to the revenue, and is in any case, from the very outset, grossly unfair to the general taxpayer.

Sir J. MARRIOTT: Before my right hon. Friend sits down will he make clear one point about the figures he has given, and so remove some misapprehension. He told us that there were 80,000 private companies and of those 40,000 had come within the ambit of the Act of 1922?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Yes.

Sir J. MARRIOTT: Then the Chancellor said, later in his speech, that 35,000 additional companies would be brought within the ambit of the present proposal?

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is so.

Sir J. MARRIOTT: Does that mean that only 5,000 of the 80,000 private companies will remain outside?

Mr. CHURCHILL: That would seem to be a very reasonable conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN: On another Bill I have protested against any hon. Member the moment a speaker sits down, firing a great number of questions at him. There is the less reason for doing so in Committee because both Ministers and others can speak twice. Does the hon. Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) want to put another question on the same subject?

[The Chairman.]

Sir J. MARRIOTT: It is on the same subject. My question was put entirely to enable the right hon. Gentleman to make clear to some of the more stupid Members of the Committee a point which he was endeavouring to make. I was asking him, and ask again, whether his statement means that the 35,000 additional companies brought within the ambit of the present proposal will bring up the total to within 5,000 of the 80,000 whom he had previously mentioned?

Mr. HERBERT: I wonder whether I can explain what I think is in the mind of my hon. Friend?

Mr. WILLIAM GRAHAM: The subject which has been raised in the speech of the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. D. Herbert) and explained at length by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is one of undeniable importance and also of very great intricacy in debate. In what will be said from this side of the Committee, I do not suggest for a moment that it may be possible altogether to escape minor inaccuracies in the statement of the case. May I, first of all, call attention to this rather interesting situation? During the past two or three days scores of millions of taxation have been piled on the taxpayers of this country. They are taxes which have often been debated in what was a practically empty House, and it is rather odd that the first time we have got a crowded House and genuine interest is when we deal with the question of Super-tax. A fact of that kind cannot be lost on the House of Commons, and still less can it be lost on the country outside. Our chief duty this afternoon is to direct our minds as clearly and as plainly as we can to what after all is the central consideration before this Chamber. That central consideration is the prevention of evasion of the payment of Super-tax by companies and individuals, in circumstances described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

May I associate myself at once with the right hon. Gentleman in the defence which he has offered of the officials of Somerset House, and the reply that he has made to some of the mischievous and misleading newspaper criticism in this case? Over and over again it has been asserted in the discussion that we are wholly at the mercy, as a read only this morning, of a small company of bureaucrats, who can do practically what they like with an important section of taxpayers in this country. A statement of that kind is manifestly ridiculous. Civil servants cannot reply in this House for themselves, and they have no opportunity of stating their case in public debate. After all, it is our duty to remember that they are there operating under Acts of Parliament which we ourselves have passed in the House of Commons, and they are very largely, along with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the position of trustees acting for the public and making perfectly certain that the revenue is obtained under the law as it stands. I feel sure that if that consideration had been kept in mind a great deal of the criticism which has been true of the past four or five weeks would never have been offered.

Let us keep clearly in mind also the nature and scale of Income Tax and Super-tax evasion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer argued that the proposals of Clause 29 did not originate in Somerset House, and he went on to indicate that they originated in circumstances round about 1922, when Section 21 of the Finance Bill of that year was passed into law. But, of course, the problem had a much earlier origin. In point of fact it was considered at very considerable length, and after a great deal of detailed evidence, by the Royal Commission on the Income Tax in 1919, and certain recommendations on this specific problem were embodied in the Report of that Commission published in 1920. Let the Committee remember that certain witnesses, by no means unreliable, suggested to the Royal Commission that there was large-scale evasion of Income Tax and Super-tax. Of course, hon. Members recognise that, with the increase of the burden of taxation in recent years, there must be a certain encouragement to a tendency in that direction, apart altogether from the demoralisation which overtook certain departments of our business practice during the War, which familiarised individuals with devices for evasion, which methods a number of them—I do not put it higher than that—have sought to carry into post-War conditions.

Witnesses argued that large sums of money were lost to the Exchequer. But, excluding the admittedly extravagant suggestions—I rule them out altogether this afternoon, because we want to be on the strongest possible ground in this Debate—it was conceded that £5,000,000 to £10,000,000 per annum, at a very low estimate, was lost by evasion, and that if certain administrative and other changes were introduced, at least £7,000,000 to £8,000,000 of additional revenue would be obtained, as I understand them, under the law as it then was. While that was not all attributable to this evasion of Super-tax, a fair proportion of it, no doubt, could be associated with this problem. The Royal Commission recommended substantially what was embodied in Section 21 of the Finance Act of 1922, that is that where there was not a proper, sufficient or fair distribution of the profits of the companies year by year, and where it was perfectly plain, that that distribution was being restricted for the purpose of evading Super-tax, that those steps should be taken.

The hon. Member for Watford (Mr. D. Herbert), with whom I have had numerous discussions on this matter, both while we were in office in 1924, and on other occasions, has suggested that there are certain hardships in that Section of the Act of 1922. I have, in particular, very often heard him use the phrase about the penal effect of that particular Section. The real reply to that was given this afternoon, in a passage in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when the right hon. Gentleman suggested that all you did when you put an individual into that apparently extreme position, was simply to reduce him to the state he should have occupied if this particular evasion had never been attempted. Let us remember here that it is evasion which is before the House. In the Debates of recent weeks, an attempt has been made to draw a distinction between ordinary arrangements of business such as those which put these profits beyond the reach of taxation on the one side, and what is manifestly evasion on the other. A good deal of attention has been directed to a remark made by Lord Sumner to the effect that the taxpayer was entitled to arrange his business in such a way as not to expose himself to, or to attract the attention of the tax collector, if that could legitimately be done, or what would be called ordinary practice within the law, to reduce the burden on the individual. I make no particular comments on that this afternoon, because so long as this system of commerce and industry lasts, and we have private enterprise, individuals will be entitled, where they can, within the law, in a perfectly honest and bona fide manner—I emphasise that—to arrange their affairs in such a way as not to carry undue burdens.

When, however, we have made the fullest recognition of practice of that kind, it remains true that very often, in industrial and commercial practice in this country, it tends to shade into a form of evasion which, in my judgment, and in that of many of my hon. Friends on this side of the Committee, is an evasion that ought to be stopped at the earliest possible moment, and to which rigorous penalties should be applied. Of course, it is extremely difficult to say when you cross that border-line from the legitimate within the law into this sphere where you are unfairly taking steps to the disadvantage of the mass of other taxpayers at a time when you are raising between £833,000,000 and £850,000,000 of revenue, year by year. It is a very nice point; for our part, we are determined, so far as we have any voice at all, to stop the evasion wherever we can. This evasion, to-day, is worth to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as I have tried to tell him personally, in the aggregate—not on this item alone, but with others—at least from £5,000,000 to £10,000,000 per annum and, I imagine, probably more. The House of Commons, since 1920, when the Royal Commission's Report was published, has never embarked on a proper scheme or programme for the prevention of evasion. Odds and ends have been taken from the recommendations of the Royal Commission, but a programme, as such, has never been undertaken. In point of fact, a very large part of the recommendations of the Royal Commission have remained a dead letter, the adoption of many of which would have prevented so far the emergence of this difficulty to-day and, of course, the embarrassment which has so far overtaken the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although that does not unduly worry us on this side of the House.

[Mr. W. Graham.]

I come now, after that preliminary survey, to Section 21 of the Act of 1922. When we were in office in 1924—a memorable period of legislative history in this country—a great deal of pressure was brought to bear on us, directly and indirectly, on this very issue. Of course, at that time, it was plain that the Section of the Act of 1922 had not had anything like a fair trial, and I was perfectly satisfied, from my experience on the Royal Commission three or four years before, that probably very much more drastic provisions would be necessary. This campaign has continued and developed, until we are in the minor crisis of to-day. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has very largely disposed of the case from the point of view of the ordinary business world in this matter. because, I imagine, until he spoke this afternoon, very few Members of the Committee were aware of the very large part of the field which has already been covered by Section 21 of the Act of 1922. If that be the state of affairs, and if you cover all that in the circumstances described by the right hon. Gentleman as regards the forms of protection which the taxpayer gets, I am obliged to say, that there is a pretty artificial, if not dishonest element, in the agitation of the past three or four weeks. Many of those men who lent their names to those letters in the Press, and who made attacks on Somerset House, and the rest, must have known of the widespread operation of this Section of the Act of 1922, and must have been perfectly well aware of the judgments or decisions of the Court of Referees, and others, which, as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, very amply protected their interests.

I come now to the present proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Clause in the present Bill does not appear to be in any way too drastic for the purpose, because, with all the evasion, in that Clause there are many safeguards as originally introduced. The broad proposition of 1922 remains; there is all this arrangement for sufficient allowance for the current needs of the business, and attention is specially directed in the statute to what is necessary for extension and development, together with the further safeguards to which reference has been made. All these things remain, but in the Clause as originally introduced undoubtedly the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed very widely to extend the field. He made the arrangement regarding not more than five people, and certain other additional provisions, for perfectly good reasons, such as were illustrated in those almost violent cases of downright evasion which he cited to the Committee and which, I have not the least hesitation in describing here, as most valuable material from our point of view, because he has now put on record in the OFFICIAL REPORT what many of us knew was going on in business, but which remained very largely a matter of debate or a confidential thing between the Inland Revenue and the taxpayer.

My criticism of the right hon. Gentleman is that, even if you only have a handful of cases of the extreme character which he cited to the Committee, what you require is not a modification of this Clause in the Bill but the original Clause. Accordingly, I am very sorry, indeed, that he has modified his proposals, and all the more so because there was another year of investigation before us before this would come into strict and practical application. That is a phase of his speech which I specially regret. The right hon. Gentleman went on to intimate that, of course, his own two Amendments on the Paper would be applied and that probably, also, certain other Amendments, which we shall reach later on, will be accepted. At this stage, we are only in the realm of general debate. The right hon. Gentleman comes along with proposals regarding these subsidiary companies and the public holding in a company—these two grouped together—and in the second place, a Clause regarding machinery and other devices giving the taxpayers the right of declaration, with all the other safeguards thrown in. The two Amendments, taken together, undoubtedly modify, at all events in my judgment, to an appreciable extent, the rigour of the Clause as originally introduced. Later in the discussion we shall find out what is the scope of the intention, but all I am going to say at the present stage is that it is regrettable that, bending to some extent under the agitation, the right hon. Gentleman has yielded. Probably it will be our duty to try to assist him in standing to the document which he has already offered to the Committee and saying that, subject to minor Amendments here and there, the Clause as now modified represents the limit of his concession.

Mr. WALLHEAD: It does not go far enough.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. Friend reminds me that it does not by any means go to the limit which we ourselves would desire. May I say one or two words in conclusion? It has been suggested in some quarters that a Clause of this kind is a veritable gift to the Labour Socialist movement. That has certainly been argued very strongly in connection with the later Clause which, presumably, we shall discuss at some time to-day. I can imagine no argument which is more thoroughly misleading, if not dishonest. Our sole concern is to see that taxation imposed by law in this country is paid; that is, that the revenue is thoroughly safeguarded. To those who suggest that there will be an interference with legitimate business I would say that you have got the safeguard under Section 21 of the Act of 1922 still open to you, and that now you have the advantage of the two suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman which, apparently, have so far satisfied the hon. Member for Watford, and have left only what I may call the die-hards in business to continue the fight.

Against any attempt further 5.0 p.m. to weaken the Clause we shall offer strenuous resistance. There is still in this country substantial evasion, and that we are very far indeed from having overtaken the whole field of the evasion of taxation on profits. The right hon. Gentleman reminded his supporters this afternoon that there was a year of grace, and if during that time they could suggest anything better than that which we have devised—I presume the right hon. Gentleman alludes to the Clause in the Act of 1922—he was open to consider suggestions. I have a suggestion to offer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The way to deal with evasion is not to deal with it in this piecemeal fashion. If I had my way, I would ask a small body of men to collect all the relevant passages in the Report of the Royal Commission of 1920 dealing with evasion into a very clear and, it might well be, a very simple programme. I would also draw attention to the suggestion which was made by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in a Debate in this House that in this Clause the phraseology might be greatly simplified, because there is no human being that I have ever met, outside a very select circle, which understands in the least what these Clauses mean, and it is left to what we call Income Tax experts, a most misleading term, to explain these Clauses to them. I fail to see, in the light of our experience in 1919, why this should not be stated in perfectly simple terms, but a very large part of the difficulty in this matter arises from the great Consolidation Act of 1918 and legislation by reference which has resulted. Accordingly, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is going to deal with the evasion of Super-tax, Income Tax and all the rest of it, let him embark upon a bigger and a more comprehensive programme. With such a programme it can be confidently suggested that in a period of 12 months the Chancellor of the Exchequer could collect from £10,000,000 to £15,000,000 of additional revenue, under the law as it stands, from individuals who are at present evading a part of their duty to the State.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made quite clear what, I am sure, is in the minds of all Members of the Committee, and that is that evasion is not the issue before the Committee this afternoon, for the truth is that there is no Member of the Committee who would get up and defend the evaders. I doubt if there is any Member of the Committee who would not do his utmost to catch them if he could. Therefore, there is no question, while we are criticising the Clause and the Amendments, of our being in favour of a further evasion of Super-tax. I can only speak for myself in this matter, but I am quite ready, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer requires any information upon the industry with which I am connected, to advise my friends to give him the fullest possible information in the frankest possible way. We have endeavoured to do that already, and during the next 12 months we shall carry our inquiries further, to the utmost of our ability. We have nothing to hide and nothing to retract, and we certainly are extremely anxious that in this matter full justice shall be done to all.

[Mr. Runciman.]

payers alike. But when I heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that it was difficult to find any fault with the drafting of this Clause, I must say that I opened my ears in astonishment. It is suggested that the drafting should not be blamed, and that it is so perfect that we need not criticise it. Our trouble is that the drafting is so obscure that we do not know where we are.

Let me take a very important instance. I am not dealing with a small and obscure concern, but with a very large one that has come under my notice in the last few days. A very important company in this country has two or three foreign branches abroad. Under the law of the foreign country they are bound to be registered companies in the foreign country, but they are most anxious to know whether or not they come within the purview of this Clause or of the Amendment put down. They have taken the best legal advice they can find and what is the result? The eminent lawyer who advises them tells them that there are two possible constructions which may be put on the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

"A.—(i) the Section shall apply to a company which is not a subsidiary company.

(ii) The foreign company is a subsidiary company."

Therefore, the Clause does not apply to a foreign company.

"or B.—(i) The Clause shall apply to a company which is not controlled by a company to which the provisions of Clause 29 do not apply.

(ii) The foreign company is a company controlled by a company to which the provisions of Clause 29 do not apply."

Therefore, the Clause applies to the foreign company.

It is when we receive advice of that kind that I think all those of us who are not lawyers consider that this kind of drafting renders the Clause, to say the least of it, extremely difficult to understand. The suggestion which I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make, that he is going to accept the proposal that we should have a wider representation of individual industries on the Board of Referees, is a matter of great importance. I am not now arguing against the proposals as a whole. I am doing my best in the circumstances to see if they can be improved. One of the directions in which undoubtedly improvement is necessary is in the constitution of the Board of Referees. Let me point out through the industry with which I am personally connected, the necessity for this. There is full provision made in the Income Tax Act and in the Act of 1922 without having it in the present Bill, for allowing a company to accumulate reserves which will now come under survey, but what does the survey mean? What about the question of maintenance? It is a different problem in every industry. The maintenance of cotton mills is very different from the maintenance of a shipping company, and in the case of shipping maintenance might mean that you would have to keep your funds together in order that from time to time if you desired to build new ships in place of others that have become obsolete. My hon. Friend who represents one of the Divisions of Newcastle if he had been present now would have agreed with me, for he is one of the best representatives of the shipbuilding industry in this country, in stating the fact that in the last 20 years we have seen great changes in the types of ships.

Again, there has been every year a chart in one of the technical papers circulating in this country showing the variations in the prices, in the market value, of a vessel of about 7,500 tons. There are no more remarkable curves to be seen in the history of commerce than the zigzag up to enormous heights and down to surprising depths. At times when there is great demand for these vessels and when steel and labour are dear, those are the times when prices are enormously high, but at other times, during periods of depression when shipbuilders will take orders at a loss in order to keep their works going, prices are much lower. Of course if a shipowner were clever enough only to buy in times of depression instead of at the top of the market, he would be able to carry on shipping at a profit, but all progressive firms actually go on buying constantly year after year, and they keep a part of the profits for this purpose, and the first thing they have to do out of the profits of their vessels is to set aside a portion to meet changes in value for which provision must be made if the company is to remain sound. That comes under the heading of "maintenance" but it would not be maintenance in a great number of other industries. It ought to be the practice of all the shipping companies to retain sufficiently large sums to provide for long-dated obligations. If you give an order for shipping this year, you may not get delivery of it for five or six years hence; consequently, you have to provide for obligations long before the vessels are delivered, and those obligations have to be provided for out of current revenue. They cannot be provided for in any other way, and if that were not done it would mean that a great many shipping companies would be in deep water and their misfortune would reflect upon people in other industries which depend upon shipping. There might also be a prolonged depression and if a shipping company is to survive at all it must have big reserves and be prepared to look forward to the time when trading is more profitable.

One of the reasons American shipping companies have failed so largely in the past is that they have not provided for continuity, which is the very essence of the shipping business. If that provision is to be made it can only be justified, I would suggest, before a tribunal that has some knowledge of the industry itself. If it goes before the ordinary Board of Referees, it will go before a board of admirable gentlemen who know nothing at all about shipping, and they may easily do very great harm to a most important branch of British industry. It would be quite possible for them to apply rules which might well apply in other circumstances and to make a very great blunder in regard to shipping companies. I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer sees the possibility of that, and that he will do what he can to carry into the Board of Referees representatives of the industry who understand the question.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I did not say that. I said it would be done by Treasury Minutes, and not on the basis of Statutes.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I was going to ask the hon. Gentleman how he would provide for that. If it is done by Treasury Minute it is not as permanent as though it were done by Statute, but, at all events, it is better than nothing. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for having made that concession in the constitution of this tribunal.

But what is to be the effect of this upon business as a whole? The right hon. Gentleman said that the Act of 1922 applies to about 40,000 private companies; that there are 35,000 roped in under this and that 5,000 are left in doubt. Inquiries are made about them, to which we got no specific reply. The question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Sir J. Marriott) was the question of the 5,000 who are or are not outside. I do not know whether the answer to that is that they are to be left entirely outside. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham) has better information on that subject. I did not gather from his speech what his view was on the matter, but if we are to have anything like 35,000 more companies brought within the purview of this legislation, I can see no justification for leaving any out. If they are to be in, let them all be in. It would certainly be unfair to some of the concerns which are not depending upon the Stock Exchange to provide them with quotations for their shares, or on public subscriptions for providing them with their capital, if they are to be treated on a different basis from other concerns. Let me point out in passing that a very large number of business men in this country, particularly in the North, do not care to float their concerns in the ordinary way by advertisements in the Press and the circulation of prospectuses. They are not at all anxious to see their shares quoted on the Stock Exchange for the very good reason that they know that that gambling on the Stock Exchange has been one of the most pernicious influences in modern industrial life.

The case made out for bringing in the remaining number of the companies appears to be firing your artillery over a very wide area in order to catch a very small number of evaders. It is very remarkable that according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day, as far as I can make out the calculation, under the 1922 Act, the Inland Revenue bagged only 180 evaders out of 40,000 companies. I expect a good many of these were of a very small type, and the fact is that the apprehensions which have been aroused among all the remainder, for the sake of these 180, have been scarcely worth while. Yet I feel certain that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to spend the next twelve months conferring with business people in all the various types of industry which have been mentioned here this afternoon, he would be able to do all that is required without disturbing industry at all. One of the safeguards for which we are asking now—it is a comparatively small one in point of drafting, but it would have a considerable effect in easing the minds of business men—is that when the Inland Revenue come across any of these questionable cases, the fact to set them moving should be that reserves have been made with a view to the avoidance of payment. To use the words of the 1922 Act, they should move “with a view to preventing the avoidance of payment.” I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer prefers having those words inserted later on, but if they are inserted later on, it means that a prima facie case is not that there has been anything done with a view to the avoidance of Super-tax, but that there has actually been an avoidance of Super-tax. We are advised that an avoidance of Super-tax would take place if half-a-dozen extra chairs were bought for the office, if there were any addition to the amenities of the staff or any one of a great many other things of that kind. That would be money actually used out of the revenue of the year and not, therefore, available for the calculation as to the Super-tax assessment. What we wish to have made clear is that we are not to have cases started against private or public companies which come within the purview of this Bill unless there is a prima facie case that they are doing something with a view to avoiding the payment of Income Tax. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool (Sir L. Scott) and I have put down an Amendment on that subject—in line 39, after the word “effect,” to insert the words:

[Mr. Runciman.]

“as if after the words ‘assessment to Super-tax there were inserted the words ‘a reasonable part of’ and”— which would define more clearly what I believe to have been the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope he will see his way to accept it. One thing that weighs with us, and must of necessity weigh with business men who have to go through their accounts very carefully in these difficult times and make wise provision for future liabilities, is that we do not know exactly what are the boundaries. Either owing to ingenious drafting or bad drafting—I do not know which it is—we cannot tell, even now, what the Bill means. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Edinburgh said the boundaries were very vague, and I entirely agree with him. They are so vague that some of the companies do not know whether they are in or out. I quoted one very important instance. I can quote another of very great importance. There are a good many of the private banking houses in the City of London who are not at all certain that they will not be drawn into the purview of this proposal, and, as it stands, they cannot tell whether they are to be in or out. They have alliances in this country and outside this country, and they do not know how far this is to be carried.

If the boundaries are so vague, if it is impossible for a man to know whether he is in or out, is it not unreasonable that you should subject him, if he happens to make a mistake in judgment in deciding whether he is in or out, to the penalty not only of having Super-tax charged on the amount which has been improperly withheld in the judgment of the Court, but also on the whole of the gross profits of that year? That is, I understand, how the law stands at present. I can scarcely believe that was the intention of Parliament in 1922. At all events, it is a very severe penalty when the boundaries are so vague, and I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman, in improving the law, ought to improve it on that side as well as on the other. If he is now going to be more severe to the evader than he or his predecessors have been in the past, he ought to make it clear when it comes to penalties that he is not going to impose heavy penalties on those whose position is doubtful and who cannot ascertain their position until they have passed two or three tribunals. I make a plea to the Committee not to do anything which would endanger one of the first-class qualities of British commercial concerns. It is a prime element of British commercial policy that good concerns build up solid reserves. Shipping companies, of which I have had some knowledge, have been almost entirely built up out of small capital and very large provisions out of revenue.

I could give instance after instance of tramp companies which started with one or two ships and, perhaps, £10,000 or £12,000 to £20,000 capital, and which had accumulated huge fleets up to the time of the War out of their surplus revenue. They were thrifty in the way they used their profits. Some went so far as to limit themselves to a distribution of profits of 6 per cent., and devoted all the rest of the money to increasing their fleets. They did a first-rate service for the British mercantile marine. Their policy was of great service to the shipyards and ironworks of this country. It enabled us before the War to build up a huge fleet. I could give from my own experience the cases of three tramp fleets with which I have been connected in one way or another. The first is that of Messrs. Hain's, of St. Ives. They started with a very small number of sailing ships and they transferred to steamers in the course of the change over in the seventies, and at the outbreak of the War they had no less than 50 of the best cargo ships in the country. Lord Macleay, who was a very well-known Member of this House, and was very highly respected throughout the shipping community, started with a small capital and the whole of his great fleet before the War was built up out of surplus revenue.

Then there is the instance—I hope I may allude to it with due modesty—of the firm which my father built up. It began in the smallest possible way, and at the time of the outbreak of the War it had 42 first-rate cargo vessels. Those vessels were not produced by constant flotations on the Stock Exchange, but were built up out of surplus revenue. These men one after another were so prudent and so careful that they did not divide their profits up to the hilt; they were satisfied with smaller incomes in order that they might increase their concerns. That was ultimately not only a matter of great profit to them, but of great advantage to the country. But for these services and but for those great fleets, of which the three I have mentioned are only samples, we should have been in a sorry plight at the outbreak of the War.

Sir R. HORNE: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Swansea (Mr. Runciman) has made a most important speech, the weight of which I hope will be realised by the Committee. It goes directly to the Amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. D. Herbert), an Amendment which I regretted to hear my hon. Friend say he was prepared to withdraw. It is an Amendment of the utmost importance, because the feature of this Bill which is struck at by his Amendment, is that it makes impossible the building up of those fleets to which my right hon. Friend the Member for West Swansea has referred. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to look with some derision upon that suggestion, but I would beg him to observe that what he proposes as a change in the Act of 1922 in this regard, falls outside of any ameliorating Amendment which he proposes to make to the Clause. By the Statute of 1922 it was provided that, in taking into account what was a reasonable distribution, regard was to be had to necessary current needs, to business maintenance and to development in the future. I paraphrase the words, but I think I convey more or less accurately what they imply. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to alter that provision of the Act of 1922 by providing in the present Finance Bill that no longer shall you be entitled to take those things into account; that, in fact, in estimating what is a reasonable distribution you shall not be entitled to take into consideration anything that is being paid for the acquisition of property by the company or anything that is being paid by way of repaying the borrowings upon which you have built up the property of the company.

These are the very things about which my right hon. Friend the Member for West Swansea has been speaking, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer cheered his remarks. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that these shipping fleets have been built up by men starting with very small capital. Probably they only had a portion of the capital required for the first ship, and they borrowed the rest. According to this provision, anybody who does that, in future will not be allowed to regard the repayment as part of reasonable distribution, as they were allowed to do under the Act of 1922. Under the three separate sub-heads of my right hon. Friend's proposal with regard to his new Clause everything is struck out which enabled the shipowner, in the position which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Swansea described, to build up fleets such as he mentioned. Apparently, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not understand the process. Here is a practical method which to my certain knowledge was applied in the building up of one of the big fleets to which reference has been made. An individual shipowner with a small amount of capital—about 40 per cent. of what he required—borrowed the remainder, and he did so under an arrangement by which he was steadily and as rapidly as possible to pay off what he had borrowed. Surely that was good business? But according to these provisions the use of his revenue to pay off what he had borrowed would not be allowed. He would be regarded as evading Super-tax.

[Sir R. Horne.]

Let me give him a further example of what occurred only the other day. This is a case which has come to my knowledge. Last year a shipowner ordered four ships from the shipbuilder. He was to pay 50 per cent. in cash and the remainder over a period of six years. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Swansea knows, that is a very common kind of transaction. An arrangement had to be made with the banks. The banks discounted bills in connection with this transaction, with the stipulation that there was to be no division of profits over a certain figure, and that all else that was made was to be devoted to paying for the ships which were being built. That kind of transaction can no longer occur under these provisions as I read them. Another transaction of the same kind was being initiated this year and has been abandoned owing to this Clause in the Finance Bill. I can give my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer another example which was brought to me personally to see if I could help. It is the case of a very important shipbuilding firm in this country which requires large sums of money at the present time, unfortunately, owing to the depression in trade. One of their customers was prepared to advance them £350,000 in order to help them through this time of difficulty and trial, but when the Finance Bill appeared with this particular Clause which provides that you cannot pay off borrowed money as part of your reasonable distribution of what you have earned, they said, "This is no longer of any use; we cannot complete the transaction."

I do beg my right hon. Friend to appreciate what is involved in these Clauses, because I am perfectly certain that those who drew them have never understood or appreciated what the business results of what they have drawn will be. I, for one, do not at all assent to my hon. Friend withdrawing this particular Amendment, and I would go into the Lobby against the Government if I were forced to do so. I hope my right hon. Friend will really take into serious consideration what is involved in these provisions. I must observe that they lie outside any Amendment that he makes. It is apparently proposed that money borrowed and property acquired are not to be regarded as a proper charge against the earnings of a company, and if that is to be the policy of the British Government in an industrial country, I am very sorry for our industries.

Mr. HERBERT: If the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of this Clause is correct, then I am entirely with him and should not wish to withdraw my Amendment, but it is only fair to say that my impression is that the construction he puts on this Clause is quite incorrect. It is very difficult to understand.

Sir R. HORNE: I cannot find anybody else who differs from the view I have of it, either legal opinion or lay opinion, and unless our minds can be very clearly satisfied upon this matter, and we can have such a statement from the right hon. Gentleman as will reassure us, we cannot, as a serious body of business men dealing with this problem, vote for it. At least, as far as I am concerned, my mind is clear. I pass from that to the speech of the right hon. Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham). There were two matters which he raised which, I think, deserve to be noted by the Committee. In the first place, he makes it perfectly clear that from the view of his side of the House these provisions are not strong enough. Therefore, we get an idea of the way in which this Clause will be operated if we have a Labour Government, not merely in office, but in power. All my right hon. Friend's references to what the Labour Government did when it was in office, fall far short of what would happen if we once get a Labour Government in power.

He gave us a variety of instances showing how very little the Clauses had been operated by the representatives of the Treasury, and with regard to these gentlemen, I should like entirely to endorse what he says on the subject of their competence and faithfulness. I know of no body of men that more completely deserves the support of the country than do the representatives of the Treasury and the bodies of Special Commissioners who operate their business throughout the country. Of that I am assured from a very close and intimate experience of their work, but my right hon. Friend is making a mistake if he supposes that the Treasury officials have had time to do all that they might have done under the Clause. It is true that only a certain number of cases have been dealt with, but that has not been because it was all the cases with which they might have dealt, and I am afraid we should be living in a fools' paradise if we were to imagine that the operations of the future were going to be confined to the comparatively small proportion which have been dealt with during the last four years. This is a new enactment, and it has not been taken advantage of to anything like the extent—I speak on a subject of which I know—to which a very much larger staff might have operated it.

Mr. CHURCHILL: We are not adding to the staff.

Sir R. HORNE: But other Governments might think it well to do so, and we have some indication of the way in which they will look upon the powers conferred on the Government by this Clause. But there was another matter to which the right hon. Member for Central Edinburgh referred, and that was the evasion of taxation in this country. I agree that it is very considerable. I am also entirely with him in his suggestion that the Report of the Commission, which sat to discuss the Income Tax, should be carefully gone through and all the various classes of evasion should be put together or, at least, in some document to show what is the real problem with which we have to deal. I am sure that every Member of this House, no matter where he sits, is eager to root out this kind of evasion that is going on in this country, because it is obvious that the innocent taxpayer has a very much heavier burden imposed upon him, I will not say by the frauds, but at least by the neglects of duty, which, as taxpayers, we see on the part of the evaders. That leads me to say that, although I was the author of the particular plan with which we are now dealing, or the initial stage of it at least, I am of opinion that we shall never really seriously achieve our object of stopping tax evasion along this particular line. My own impression is now that we are proceeding on a wrong assumption. All this legislation is on the assumption that somehow or other the putting of money to reserve is wrong and that we ought to watch the man who is putting money to reserve. But that is not where the wrong starts. It is by the use that is made of the reserve afterwards, and that is where we ought to tackle the evil. I heartily endorse the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh.

With regard to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said this afternoon, he was good enough to refer to me in several instances, and I quite recognise that if there is an evil, to a large degree I am the author of it. I do not seek to disguise it. I supported this plan in 1922, and perhaps I ought to stand in a white sheet, but I very early came to the conclusion, during the Debates of that year, that there was every probability of grave injury being done to trade if the matter was carried too far, and as my right hon. Friend, who has evidently gone into the old Debates, would realise when he read them, I ultimately came to a position in which the original plan was greatly whittled down and the whole arrangement was confined within the narrowest limits. For example, it was provided that the scheme should not apply to companies with more than 50 members, that it should not apply to any company that had ever issued a public prospectus, and that it should not apply to any company which was registered before 1914. The reason that that year was taken was this, that it was not until Super-tax became heavy in 1914 that the temptation to make this evasion really began, and it was thought that we should stop this tax dodging if we started the operation of this scheme in 1914.

[Sir R. Horne.]

I am still of the belief that that was a wise and proper method to adopt. But my right hon. Friend in the present Measure proposes or at least he originally proposed to extend it very much further because as his Bill was originally drawn it would have applied to many very large public companies. I could name a few if he liked, but he can think of some of them himself. It would have applied to some of the large public companies in this country whose control happens to be in the hands of five families or even less, and accordingly my right hon. Friend shifted his ground and put in a provision that it should not apply to companies in which the public have a substantial interest. I have no belief for the "Times" in this matter but the "Times" was right in describing his original Clause as a revolutionary proposal. It certainly was. It was a great interference with the life and method of management of some of the biggest companies in this country or it could have been if the Treasury officials chose to take action, and there was nothing to indicate that they were only to take action in the case of the real tax dodger. My right hon. Friend will remember that I put into the Bill for which I was responsible a preamble to the Clause to make it clear that it was designed to catch the tax dodger—I am not using the language of the Statute I need scarcely assure the Committee—but the Courts disregarded that preamble, and they said, the rest of the Clause was clear and that they had nothing to do with what the motive of the taxpayer was. I gather that my right hon. Friend opposite is anxious that there should be put in the body of my right hon. Friend's provision the fact that it should only be operative if the intention was to avoid Super-tax. As my right hon. Friend's new Clause stands at present the Special Commissioners would be entitled to take action and the Board of Referees to decide against the taxpayer if—whatever his intention was—there was avoidance of taxation provided only that they thought a reasonable proportion of the revenue had not been distributed. I hope accordingly my right hon. Friend will take that into his serious consideration and try to put that aspect of the matter right. Obviously it would be intolerable to the business of this country if people who are managing large concerns were to have their policy dictated by any outside body no matter how competent. Imagine men who are applying all their time devoting all their energies to these problems being told by somebody outside no matter how clever that they need not provide against the contingencies they feared and in fact that they ought to divide much more of the money than they are doing. I ask my right hon. Friend to imagine how great the power would be in the hands of people who take a different view from that which we take of the merits of the conduct of industry by individual enterprise. There are people whose doctrine it is that the more the State interferes the better. Imagine them in the control of a power like this.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Even if it were true that the Special Commissioners could be superseded, how can the Government of the day influence the action of the Board of Referees.

Sir R. HORNE: These appointments fall to be filled up from time to time and one knows that all parties tend to put people in positions of that kind whom they know.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Whom they know and in whom they have confidence that they will do their duty, not that they will pervert it.

Sir R. HORNE: We must remember that this is a matter not of law but of individual opinion and discretion, and I venture to think that it would be a day of disaster for this country if ever we were to get to the stage at which the man whose duty it is to manage a business has that operation taken out of his hands by somebody else. I hope we are all going to stand firm on that principle and to say that whatever is done in this Bill this duty must not be taken away from the people who are primarily responsible. My right hon. Friend has departed from his attempt to include large public companies or some of them and he has now provided that the Clause is not to apply to those companies in which the public are substantially interested but there still remain some very large private companies which will be subject to the operation of this Clause. I can think of one which has lasted now in this country for at least 80 years. I think there are four generations of families which have been associated with it and because of the family tradition and their pride in their business it has been as well managed as any company of which I know. It is one of the most important companies in Great Britain, but this company under my right hon. Friend's provision would become suddenly subject to this kind of inquisition if the Special Commissioners asked as to how they distributed their profits. I venture to say with regard to this company that it started with little capital and that the whole of its success and all of the employment which it has given and all the wealth which it has brought to this country have been built up through laying far more to reserve than under modern circumstances some members of the Treasury—and many of us perhaps—might think necessary. It is because they have denied themselves the use of these profits for their private ends that they are in their present position. Now this company may be subjected to this inquisition.

May I put this point to my right hon. Friend? He has used as a strong argument the statement that on the whole very few people have been caught, very few business people have engaged in the evasion of taxation. I think a statement was made that 128 had been brought before the tribunals and that 60 had been caught. I wish the Committee to observe that the trouble in connection with this matter does not lie entirely in being found out. The trouble lies also in the uncertainty which attends one of these inquiries. What is the position in which people stand during all the time this inquisition is being held? Think of the process which has to be gone through. First of all the Special Commissioners have to inquire as to the details of what the firm have been doing. Then the firm have to make a declaration if they think they have not done anything which would avoid the payment of Super-tax. Thereafter the affair comes before the Special Commissioners again. The Special Commissioners are to consider the matter within 28 days, and thereafter, if they are not satisfied, they pass it on to the Board of Referees without any limitation at all as to the time within which the Board of Referees shall deal with the matter. While this process is going on, the firm do not know where they stand. Suppose the firm have a certain amount of revenue and have determined to use three-quarters of it in embarking upon some new equipment or some new machinery. All the time this inquisition is going on they do not know whether that sum will be at their disposal or whether it will not be, and all their operations during that period, whatever the period may be, are stopped, in reality, by the fact that they do not know whether the sum is going to be available.

Mr. CHURCHILL: It is not in any case the sum itself, but only the Super-tax upon the sum.

Sir R. HORNE: Certainly, but the Super-tax upon the sum may in certain instances amount to a considerable sum of money; and during the whole of this period there is that uncertainty. These are the things which are troublesome. I am one of those who desire to make every effort to stop evasion, but I would warn the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if we are on the wrong plan, as we may be, if we push this thing to extremes, the result to the revenue will be unfortunate. The proposals which the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes in his further Amendments are really not yet sufficient to meet the difficulties of the people who have to carry on the trade and industry of this country. I revert to the suggestion that the Chancellor should make it clear that the preliminary upon which any action shall be taken shall be that there is evidence of an intention to avoid the Super-tax.

My right hon. Friend referred to a remark of mine in a previous Debate in 1922, when I said that you cannot get inside the head of a taxpayer to discover his motive, but what you can do is to see by his previous practice whether, before this kind of question was raised, he did this kind of thing or not. That would be very good evidence of his intentions. Let us take the case of one of the shipping firms to which reference has been made. If it were found that in the course of that company's history they had always put large sums to reserve, in order to build up their fleets, then one could really come to the conclusion with complete certainty that they were not now attempting the business of tax evasion. I would beg my right hon. Friend to give way to this suggestion, and to meet many of us who are very much troubled about this matter. Another thing I would venture to put to him is that he should stand where we previously stood in 1922. I say that because I believe he is not going to get much in the way of revenue from any further extension of the period of time within which the Clause is to operate, and I say it also because I believe that during the next year we shall find it to be our duty and a necessity to stop evasion in some totally different way, rather, perhaps, according to the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh than according to the plan upon which we are at present engaged. I believe there are many ways of avoiding even what my right hon. Friend is designing now. I can think of many already; and the Chancellor will find himself at the end of another few years in a position in which he has again to review the procedure. I do not believe that in this matter we are proceeding on the best lines, and I think we ought to start not at the point where money is put to reserve, but at the point at which the reserves are being nefariously used. With these reflections I venture to appeal to my right hon. Friend to give consideration to some of the suggestions which I have made.

[Sir R. Horne.]

MR. GILLET: I was surprised, in listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, to note, after he had seemed to advise the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to proceed with the proposal because there was very little money in it, that a minute later he told the Committee that so much evasion went on that it would be necessary to attempt something on bigger lines in order to check this evasion, as was suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Edinburgh (Mr. W. Graham). It seems to me the right hon. Gentleman has been trying to prove too much this afternoon. In the first place, he has been anxious to make us all exceedingly nervous about what is going to happen to various companies, and then there was his point about the real meaning of this Bill. I am not in the legal profession, and I do not want to enter into the dispute which the right hon. Gentleman had with the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. D. Herbert) as to the actual meaning of the Clause now before us. I prefer to draw the attention of the Committee to the real object of this Clause. When this question was mentioned in the House last year, and the year previously, by an hon. Member sitting opposite, no word of objection was raised to any action being taken, in fact, the Government were strongly urged by certain hon. Members sitting opposite to take action on those lines. I wish the Committee would recall the instances that were brought before us at that time by the hon. Member for South Salford (Mr. Radford). I think it is a most unfortunate thing that he and his friends have not come forward in reply to the newspaper campaign which has been carried on against the proposals made a year ago, which then had the support of large numbers of Members in the Committee. I very much hope he will not allow us to be turned away from the main point he has in view, and that is the question of preventing the evasion of taxation.

It has been my experience and I expect it has been the experience of other business men in the Committee, that taxation in connection with the companies has worked quite satisfactorily until there has come on the scene some of the very clever gentlemen who think they are going to score. A man appears who is trying to evade taxation if he can, running as near to the wind as possible; he wants to do the thing legally, and so he gets the very best advice he can. The Board of Inland Revenue get information like that which the hon. Member reported to us a year ago. Then what happens? In the action taken to prevent this astute gentleman from continuing his systematic evasion, a large number of other people are very much inconvenienced. Over and over again we have found that certain privileges which were granted have been withdrawn because of the abuse of them by men of this class; and it is because of what such men have done that in this case the Government are introducing legislation which is going to impose certain hindrances and hardships upon other classes, and that people who are in no way attempting to evade tax are going to be made to suffer. If we listen to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hillhead (Sir R. Horne) we are to abandon, seemingly, the attempt to prevent these gentlemen from doing what they want. I agree entirely with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the thing has gone too far already, and it is quite impossible for the Government to recede from the position they have taken up. Nothing is to be gained by giving way to this campaign, though I agree that there are certain dangers connected with the question before us, and also certain difficulties.

